The wax was hardly cold upon this treaty, when a new quarrel had like to have arisen between the two kings; for the earl of Hertford, pursuant to the last article, going on to complete a fort which he had begun about three weeks before the treaty, the French set to work in erecting another fort, called Chastillon's Garden, at Portet, near the mouth of the harbour of Boulogne, on pretence that the marshal de Biez had formerly began one there, by entrenching himself on the place; but the difference between a trench and a fortification was too well known to Henry for him to suffer this piece of chicanery, and the lord Grey demolished it by his orders. The peace was hereupon proclaimed in London, on the thirteenth of June, though it was not ratified by the king of France till the first day of August, fifteen days after the term prescribed for the ratification was expired.

Some time before the treaty was in agitation, the Protestants of Germany sent Philip, brother of the elector Palatine, to demand succours from Henry, and in particular to solicit a supply of one hundred thousand crowns, for the defence of the league;

but, instead of money, he sent them seven propositions, containing the terms upon which he was willing to engage in a defensive league with them. In the mean time the emperor and the pope formed an alliance for their destruction; his holiness supplied him with money and a strong body of troops, under the command of Octavian Farnese. The Protestants armed in their own defence, under the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse; but neither side cared to hazard an engagement. At length the king of the Romans falling into the territories of the elector of Saxony, that prince was obliged to go to the relief of his own subjects; and the landgrave being weakened by his departure, retired into his own dominions, so that the emperor, being left master of the field, reduced Francfort, Ulm, and several other towns of the league.

While Henry, against all the maxims of right policy, continued an unconcerned spectator of Charles thus swallowing up the liberties of Germany, those who favoured the reformation in Scotland, were persecuted by that hot-headed zealot cardinal Beaton, who governed every thing with an uncontrouled sway, though under the mask of the regent's authority: several persons were condemned to the flames for heresy, and the cardinal is said to have taken an inhuman pleasure in being spectator of their sufferings: but he did not long triumph in his cruelty, for he was himself this year assassinated by Norman Lesly, eldest son to the earl of Rothes, on account of some quarrel between them.

Nor were the Protestants less harrassed in England, where daily persecutions were carried on against them. This severity was chiefly encouraged by Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and the lord Rich, assisted by Wriothesley the chancellor; nor was the duke of Norfolk behind-hand in promoting the same cruel measures: and Henry's natural ferocity being increased by the anguish of an inveterate ulcer in one of his legs, he readily gave into all the schemes of bloodshed and barbarity that Gardiner and his popish counsellors thought proper to inspire him with. Among other persons who suffered on account of their opinions, was Mrs. Anne Askew, or Aске, a gentlewoman of good birth and excellent parts, who was well known to many persons at court: this lady, being convicted of denying the real presence in the eucharist, was condemned to the flames, and chose to suffer death, rather than purchase pardon at the expence of abjuring her faith. Chancellor Wriothesley, who was a zealous papist, imagining that her resolution proceeded from the encouragement given her by persons of distinction about the court, who were friends to the reformation, caused this poor woman to be put to the rack in prison, though already under sentence of death; and is even said to have assisted with his own hands in administering the torture, which was done in such a merciless manner, that almost all her bones were dislocated. This she bore, however, with amazing fortitude; nor could they extort a syllable from her in accusation of any one: at length she was conveyed to the stake, where she suffered with four men, condemned on the same account; Shaxton, bishop of Salisbury, who had been imprisoned for refusing to conform to the Six Articles, but had saved his life by recanting, attending them to the place of execution, where he preached a sermon, reproaching them in the harshest terms for their obstinacy and heresy.

Gardiner

Gardiner and the popish faction perceiving that the king was now more furiously than ever incensed against the sacramentarians, made another effort to destroy Cranmer, but still without effect; for Henry, retaining his affection for the archbishop, preserved his person from the plots of his enemies, and even obliged them to be outwardly reconciled to him; but they were very near wreaking their vengeance on a person of still higher dignity.

The queen was then past the bloom of life, but continued still agreeable; she had lived with prudence, and free from envy; and in the main, her conduct was irreproachable. In her heart she was a favourer of the reformed, but she understood the king's humour so well, that she never presumed to stand up openly in their defence: this prudent conduct, and her extraordinary submission to Henry's will, had so greatly won upon his affections, that he even suffered her to have sermons preached in her privy-chamber, before some of her ladies. The popish faction could not observe this without great regret, and they at last ventured to whisper in the king's ears, that she was the life of all the heresy with which the land was pestered. The king, at first, took no notice of these insinuations, and even suffered her to dispute with himself on some religious points, imagining that she did it only for instruction. This liberty, however, being by custom carried somewhat too far by the queen, Henry expressed his dislike at her presuming to differ in opinion from him, and shewed more coolness than usual towards her; he even went so far as to discover his dislike to Gardiner, who failed not to cherish his resentment by aggravating the queen's known attachment to the Lutheran principles, and the pains she took to instil her religion into the ladies of the court, who attended on her. This being also confirmed, and other accusations of the like sort laid against her by Wriothesley, who had the bloody impudence to propose taking off the queen's head, as the only means to crush for ever those of her sect, Henry was at once so weak and inhuman as to subscribe the articles urged against her, and upon which she was to be tried for her life.

The two blood leeches, Gardiner and Wriothesley, now exulted in the supposed success of their schemes, and looked upon the queen's ruin as inevitable: but Heaven, who delights to turn the wisdom of the wicked into folly, interposed to snatch the innocent victim from the toils of her enemies. The lord-chancellor dropping the copy of the articles, with Henry's subscription to it, it fell into the queen's hands, who, upon seeing it, concluded her life lost: however, being advised by one of her friends to go to the king and try to appease him, she took their advice, and, being a little recovered from her consternation, she went into the king's apartment, who received her with his customary kindness, and began with her, as usual, upon the head of religion; but she declined the subject, and expressed uncommon deference to his majesty's opinion, to whose learning and judgment she said she perfectly resigned herself. "Not so, by St. Mary! (replied Henry, in some perturbation), you are become a doctor, Kate, to instruct us, as we take it, and not to be instructed or directed by us." The queen, feigning much surprise, answered very mildly, "that she should never have presumed to argue with him upon any subject, except to amuse the pain of his infirmities, or with a view to profit by his superior erudition in these matters." "And is it even so, sweetheart (replied Henry, kissing her with great tenderness), then we are friends again." He then dismissed her, with very tender assurances of his inviolable love to her.

This reconciliation passed in the presence only of a third person, the lady Herbert, the queen's sister, so that Wriothesley and Gardiner still thought their work of death went smoothly on; but they were soon undeceived, to their no small mortification; for on the morrow, which was the day appointed for carrying the queen to the Tower, the king, going to take the air in the garden, sent for her; and soon after came in the chancellor, with forty of the guard, in order to arrest her; but the king, taking him aside, was observed to speak to him in a very angry tone of voice, and even overheard to order him, with reviling language, out of his presence. Upon the king's return to the queen, she perceiving him in a rage with the chancellor, endeavoured to intercede for him; but she received no other answer from Henry, than that she little knew how ill he deserved at her hands.

However liable Henry was to be wrought up to a fury by the artful suggestions of evil-intending persons, to the prejudice of any one, he never liked the accusers: this appeared strongly in the present instance, for he took such a dislike to Gardiner, for the base part which he had acted with regard to the queen, that he could never after bear the sight of him; and though the bishop sought by the vilest adulation to reinstate himself in his favour, he totally discarded him; and Henry at this time being to make his will, it was proposed that Gardiner should be one of the executors; but the king would not hear of it, saying "that he was so contentious and troublesome a fellow, that he would be continually stirring up dissention amongst the other executors."

If the reformed were over-joyed at the disgrace of their rancorous persecutor Gardiner, they had still greater cause to triumph in the downfall of the duke of Norfolk, a nobleman equally averse to their religion, and, by his great credit and influence at court, capable of hurting them in a more effectual manner than even the bishop. It is more than probable that Norfolk had a hand in the late attempt against the queen; at least it is certain that he took the lead in all the designs formed against Cranmer, whom he had lately treated with the greatest indignity at the council-board, for which he received a most severe reprimand from the king himself. Whether the part he had acted in these affairs contributed to his disgrace, or whether Henry, who had lately began to discourage the popish party in his councils, and, finding his end approaching, thought it unwise to leave them in a capacity of making head against the future government, the ruin of the duke of Norfolk and his son, the earl of Surry, seems about this time to have been concluded on.

The duke, though possessed of no great genius, had all the requisites of a complete courtier, and had acquired no inconsiderable degree of military fame; long experience in business had rendered him wise and cautious; and he had served the king with fidelity and success. His son, the earl of Surry,

Surry, was a young gentleman of great courage, an aspiring mind, quick parts, and uncommon learning for the age he lived in; but proud, ambitious, headstrong, vindictive, rash; capable of saying any thing in a passion, and of doing every thing to gratify his resentment. He had been greatly incensed at being recalled from the government of Boulogne, and at the earl of Hertford's being sent to command the forces in that country; this had provoked him to say, that "within a little time they should smart for it," and to use other expressions favouring of revenge, and shewing as well a dislike of the king as a hatred of his counsellors.

The old duke, his father, to prevent the ill consequences of his son's resentment, and the ruin which the dissention between him and the Seymour family might one day beget, as the earl of Hertford was likely, after the king's death, to be at the head of the administration, as guardian of the minor successor, would fain have had the earl of Surry, then a widower, marry one of the earl of Hertford's daughters, to which the latter was not averse; he likewise proposed a match between his own daughter the duchess dowager of Richmond (relict of the duke of that name, the king's natural son), and sir Thomas Seymour, brother to Hertford.

The high spirit of Surry would not brook this alliance, and the contemptuous manner in which he rejected it so exasperated the Seymour family, that they insinuated to Henry, that the earl entertained the ambitious hope of a marriage with the princess Mary, in which case the great interest the Howard family had, might endanger the government of young Edward: they even hinted, that he raised his aspiring views to the crown, and that he actually bore the arms of Edward the Confessor, without any mark of difference or diminution. This was a matter which affected Henry in the most sensible part; and this consideration, added to the sentiments he already entertained, determined him to sacrifice the Howards to his jealousy; and the division that prevailed in that illustrious family contributed greatly to facilitate his design.

There was a secret grudge subsisting between the earl of Surry and his sister, the duchess of Richmond: the earl had also had a dispute with his father, and they were scarcely reconciled at this time. The duke of Norfolk had also a quarrel upon his hands with his own duchess, Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford, late duke of Buckingham; and, by an effect of his free way of living, or her jealousy, they had been parted for four years, and expressed their rancour against each other so openly as gave no small scandal. On this occasion, the duchess, eager to satisfy her revenge, informed against her husband to the ministry, and disclosed all she knew of his secrets or resentments; and was joined in this perfidious part by Mrs. Holland, a woman whom the duke had kept for some years, but had lately turned off; though all their evidence amounted to scarcely the colour of an accusation. That of the duchess consisted in little more than complaints of the duke's infidelity to her, and his using her ill. Mrs. Holland swore that the duke had, in confidence, told her that he was hated by the king's council, many of whom were upstart noblemen; and, because of his affection to the popish doctrines and sacraments, that he even thought himself slighted by the king, who had not of late called him to the cabinet or privy-council: she likewise said, that the duke bore the arms of England, with a badge of labels of silver, which were appropriated to the prince of Wales.

The duchess of Richmond deposed against her brother, the earl of Surry, that he had expressed an aversion to the earl of Hertford; and that he had said, if the king died, the new men (meaning the council) should smart for the affront they had put upon him, in sending that nobleman to supersede him in command. She said also, that her brother had dissuaded her from reading the scriptures; and disclosed some other trifling indecencies of which he had been guilty. Upon these general accusations the king ordered both father and son to be arrested, which was accordingly done on the twelfth of December; the one was carried to the Tower by water and the other by land, without either knowing of the other's apprehension. After that, declaration was publicly made in the king's name, that all persons who had any accusation to prefer against the two imprisoned noblemen, should be graciously heard; and that the royal pardon and protection should be granted to any one concerned in any plot with them, who would come and make a discovery. Upon this sir Richard Southwell, a member of the privy-council, declared that he had some matters of treason to disclose against the earl of Surry; but the latter disclaimed his charge, and offered to maintain his innocence against his accuser in single combat, which was denied him.

In the beginning of January, 1547, the unfortunate earl was brought to his trial, by a jury of commoners, picked by the court, and before the lord-chancellor, the lord-mayor, and other commissioners, at Guildhall in London; when, notwithstanding a most spirited and eloquent defence made by the noble prisoner, the jury, being commanded rather than instructed, found him guilty of high-treason, and he received sentence of death, which was executed by beheading him upon Tower-hill, on the nineteenth of January*.

The old duke presaged his own fate in that of his son; and, by the advice of the few friends adversity had left him, he endeavoured to appease the king's resentment by the most submissive letters: but Henry's breast was insensible to all the emotions of pity; and neither the duke's submission, nor his innocence, could satisfy the tyrant, unless he should own himself guilty, under his own hand. A com-

* Henry Howard (eldest son of Thomas, third duke of Norfolk, by Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham) died much pitied, being a man of great parts and high courage, with many other noble qualities. His sentence was generally condemned as an act of high injustice and severity, which loaded the Seymours with a popular odium they could never overcome. Sir Richard Southwell deposing, that he knew certain things of the earl, which touched his fidelity to the king, the earl vehemently affirmed himself a true man, and offered to fight in his shirt with his accuser. As to the using the arms of the Confessor, he said he did it according to the opinion of the king's heralds. His sister Mary, duchess of Richmond, being examined, confessed that the earl her brother should say, "These new men, (meaning the Seymours) loved no nobility; and if God called away the king, they should smart for it;" with some other passionate words and circumstantial speeches little for his advantage. He was buried at Framlingham in the county of Suffolk. Herbert, p. 263, &c. Burnet, vol. i. p. 345, &c. Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii. p. 275.

mittee of council was sent to examine him; and, after some conference, obtained from him, partly by threats and partly by promises of the royal clemency, a paper intituled his voluntary confession, signed by his own hand, and containing the following articles: "I. That he had, at sundry times, and to different persons, disclosed the secrets of the king's council. II. That he had concealed his son's treason in using the arms (called Edward the Confessor's) appropriated to the king of England, and to which neither he nor his children, nor his ancestors, had any title. And, III. That he had, ever since his father's death, borne in the first quarter of his arms the arms of England, with a difference of the labels of silver, being the proper arms of prince Edward, which was done to the prejudice and disherison of the king and prince, and gave occasion for disturbing or interrupting the succession to the crown, and destroying the prince's inheritance." This he acknowledged to be high-treason, and confessing he deserved to be attainted for it, humbly threw himself upon the king's mercy.

The parliament, which was then sitting, taking this paper into consideration, and having been properly prepared for the bloody compliment they were to pay their inhuman master, passed a bill of attainder against the duke of Norfolk and his son, the earl of Surry, well knowing that the accusation against the duke was too frivolous, and too ill supported, to bear his being brought to a public trial before his peers; and this act received the royal assent on the twenty-seventh of January, by the lord-chancellor and other commissioners appointed for that purpose by Henry, who was unable to stir abroad, and immediately thereupon a warrant was ordered for cutting off the duke's head: and this seems to have been the last act of Henry's life.

He had, so far back as the thirtieth of December, made his will; but before that time he was grown so unwieldy and diseased that he could not write: sir Anthony Denny, John Gates, and William Cheek, three of his domestics, were empowered to sign all acts of government; as were a committee of council to put a stamp, imitating the king's hand-writing, and the royal signet, to all acts which required either. Those circumstances furnished matter to the advocates for the posterity of his eldest sister, Margaret, who apprehended they were unequally dealt by therein, to dispute the validity of this will, denying that it was ever signed by Henry: and even so late as the reign of queen Anne, this dispute was again revived, when a committee of the house of commons were appointed to search for it, but the original was not to be found; they did indeed find, in the chapter-house of Westminster, a roll consisting of several sheets of paper tacked together with a braid of green and white ribbond, written in a mean and slovenly character, and pretended to be signed by king Henry's own hand on the top of the first and the end of the last page; but, upon comparing the same with his stamp and his usual hand-writing, it agreed with neither, being fairer than ever he could write, and stiff like a counterfeit hand: and Maitland, secretary to Mary, queen of Scots, in a letter of his to Cecil, queen Elizabeth's secretary, insisted, "that as this will was not signed, but only stamped, and that not being according to the act of parliament, which in such extraordinary things must be strictly taken, the will was of no force." The objections of the Scottish writers have, indeed, been strenuously opposed, and an attempt made to refute them by the late learned Mr. Horrabin, in his treatise of the Hereditary Right of the Crown of England. But, be this matter as it may, it was taken for granted that Henry had made his will, in which, according to the power given him by parliament, in the year 1543, he settled the succession to the crown of England in the following manner.

"First, upon the prince of Wales and his posterity. Secondly, upon the children of his present queen, or those of any future marriage he might make. Thirdly, upon the princess Mary and her issue, but with the express condition, that she should marry with the consent of the executors of his will and testament. Fourthly, upon the lady Elizabeth, with the same proviso. Fifthly, upon the lady Frances Brandon, daughter to his sister the queen of France, by the duke of Suffolk. Sixthly, upon the lady Eleanor Brandon, youngest sister to Frances. Lastly, failing all those, upon the next of kin." By other clauses of his will he named sixteen executors, who were as follow, viz. the archbishop of Canterbury, lord chancellor Wriothesley, the earl of Hertford (young Edward's uncle), lord St. John, lord Russell, lord viscount Lisle, bishop Tunstall, sir Anthony Brown, sir Edward Montagu, justice Bromley, sir William Paget, sir Anthony Denny, sir William Herbert, sir Edward Wotton, and Dr. Wotton his brother. To the lords who were his executors he left five hundred marks each, and to the commoners three hundred; and ordered his executors to pay all his debts. He made the prince of Wales heir to all his moveables, but charged him to be subject to the advice of his council until he was eighteen years old. He left three thousand pounds a year to each of his daughters, with ten thousand pounds of addition, as their whole fortune, if the executors thought proper. To the queen he left three thousand pounds in jewels or plate, with a thousand pounds in money."

Henry perceiving that his dissolution was fast approaching, was absolutely bent to send his noble prisoner, the duke of Norfolk, out of the world before him, and had for this purpose sent to the lieutenant of the Tower to have the duke executed on Tower-hill, on the twenty-ninth of January; but, fortunately for that nobleman, Henry himself was called to answer for the wickedness of his past life the very night preceding.

The rapid approach of Henry's last moments was very visible to all about him; but as, by an act passed in his reign, it had been declared high-treason to foretel the king's death, no one would run the risk of acquainting him with his situation, not knowing but, in the violence of his passion, he might execute the law in all its rigour upon the author of such friendly intelligence, especially as he had so lately given an instance in his treatment of the Howard family, that his cruelty was not at an ebb with his life.

At length, however, sir Anthony Denny ventured to disclose to him the fatal secret, and exhorted him to prepare for that transition which was so near at hand, as his legs were already mortified; for which Henry, contrary to all expectation, thanked him, and desired that Cranmer might be sent for; but he was speechless before the archbishop arrived. When that prelate besought him to give some sign of his trust in God, through the merits of Christ, he squeezed his hand with great fervency, and immediately afterwards expired, in the fifty-fifth year and seventh month of his life, and the thirty-seventh year and tenth month of his reign, on the twenty-eighth of January, 1547, about two in the morning.

The conduct of Henry VIII. was so different and inconsistent with itself in the several periods of his life, that it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to give a just description of his character, which, as his historian, the lord Herbert, observes, may be best learned from his actions. While the natural modesty of youth restrained the violence of his turbulent passions, Henry's government was the admiration of foreigners, and caused him to be almost adored by his own people: but in his more advanced years he became rapacious, arbitrary, forward, fretful, and so cruel that he seemed to delight in the blood of his subjects. The gratification of his own sensual and brutal appetites appears to have been the grand object of all his pursuits: to this he sacrificed every obligation of justice, every dictate of conscience, and every feeling of humanity: the cruel fate of the unhappy Anne Boleyn will fix an eternal mark of infamy on his character. Nevertheless, it must be owned, that, with all his vices, foibles, and imperfections, Henry had many great and agreeable qualities, both by nature and education: he had a deep judgment in all affairs to which he applied; he was not only liberal and indulgent to his family and court, but even to strangers. He made choice of able and good men for the clergy, and of able counsellors for his state affairs. It is full as undeniable (as sir Thomas More observed) that he was superior to all the princes his cotemporaries in knowledge and learning; that he was a great encourager of the sciences, and literature; that his court was fuller of learned men than most universities, he making them his companions as well as counsellors, and advancing them to high dignities both in church and state. He was particularly careful to give his children a taste for learning; and by his example introduced a fashion among the nobility, of educating theirs in the same manner. There were two fundamental defects in Henry's nature, to which all his faults in government may be ascribed, these were pride and avarice; to the latter of these passions cardinal du Bellay, who knew him well, ascribes the prosecution of Wolsey, in order to get possession of that prelate's riches: as for the pride of his heart it was immeasurable, and hence arose that excessive obstinacy and wilfulness, which (as Wolsey with his dying breath told sir William Kingston) "would make him sacrifice half his realm, rather than not have his will." After all, it must be owned, that this nation under him rose to a very high pitch of honour and consideration among its neighbours; and it is incontestable, that he was the first who delivered the English church from its slavish and disgraceful subjection to the see of Rome; and by that step laid the foundation of civil liberty: though in this work he seems to have been actuated rather by the impulse of his vicious and unruly passions, than by the motives of conscience or religion. We shall conclude this short character of the eighth Henry with the following remark, that while his political abilities entitle him to the appellation of a Great Prince, his tyranny, cruelty, and oppression seem to exclude him from the character of a Good Sovereign.

Henry was goodly in his appearance; his presence had the stamp of majesty: he possessed a ready wit, an easy and flowing eloquence, and an incomparable activity, grace, and dexterity, in those military exercises and elegant diversions which were the usual entertainment of those times.

The following account of the ceremonies of Henry's interment cannot be displeasing to the curious reader, as it will furnish him an opportunity of drawing a comparison between the ideas of magnificence in those days, and the taste which prevails in this enlightened age.

His body remaining privately in a chamber, was there cased and put in a coffin of lead, while a sumptuous hearse of virgins wax was prepared within the chapel at Whitehall, with six goodly pillars, weighing by estimation two thousand pounds, under which hearse was a canopy of rich cloth of gold, whose valences were half gold and half black silk, into which the corpse was conveyed, covered with a pall of cloth of tissue; an altar being erected at the east end, richly adorned with black velvet and escutcheons of the king's arms; the hearse was railed about with timber, covered with black cloth, with which the chapel, cloister, hall, and chamber, were likewise hung. Within the rail were seats for the twelve lords mourners, to kneel or sit; and here the corpse remained from the second of February to the fourteenth, served with day and night-watches, a herald standing at the west end of the hearse, and desiring the people to pray, saying, "You shall of your charity pray for the soul of the most famous prince, king Henry VIII. our late most gracious king and master."

On the fourteenth of February, about ten in the morning, the king's body set forward towards Windsor, in a stately chariot, his effigies lying on the coffin, with the true imperial crown on the head, and under it a night-cap of black sattin set full of precious stones, and apparelled with robes of crimson velvet, furred with minever powdered with ermin; the collar of the Garter, with the order of St. George, about the neck; a crimson sattin doublet, embroidered with gold; two bracelets of gold about the wrists, set with stones and pearls; a fair armouring sword by the side; the sceptre in the right hand and the ball in the left; a pair of scarlet hose, crimson velvet shoes, gloves on the hands, and several diamond rings on the fingers; drawn by eight horses trapped with black, adorned with escutcheons and a shaffedon on their heads, on each of which rode a child of honour, carrying a bannerole of the king's arms. Thus, with an exceeding great train, of four miles in length, the body was conducted to Sion, where it was received at the door by the bishops of London, Bristol, and Gloucester, who performed dirge that night, and next morning the corpse, being brought into the church, was placed in a hearse like that at Whitehall, but the effigies was conveyed into the vestry.

The next morning, about six o'clock, after the third sound of the trumpets, the whole company, the marquis of Dorset being chief mourner, proceeded for Windsor, and brought the corpse to the castle college gate about one of the clock; from which place to the west door of the church a large way was railed in on both sides, and hung with black black cloth and escutcheons; the church and choir being likewise hung round with black; the bishops of Winchester, London, and Ely, in their pontifical robes, with the sub-dean of the king's chapel, and all the singing-men of the same, and the dean of Windsor, with all the canons and their whole choir, received the corpse at the aforesaid place, whence, after incensing and such like ceremonies, it was carried into the church, the singing-men of the king's chapel on the right hand, and those of Windsor on the left, preceding it. Thus the effigies was first conveyed into the choir by divers knights and gentlemen, and then the coffin, by sixteen yeomen, with black staves in their hands, was brought into a hearse made in the midst of the choir, under which was provided a goodly vault to bury the corpse in, over which was laid a grate, whereon stood the said hearse with the coffin and picture. The hearse was like that at Whitehall, only it consisted of thirteen great pillars, and weighed, by estimation, four thousand pounds, having about it the twelve banners of descents. Thus the usual ceremonies being performed, the body remained there that night.

Wednesday being the sixteenth of February, about four o'clock began the Communion of the Trinity, performed by the sub-dean of Windsor and the sub-dean of the king's chapel, where, after an offering of gold by the chief mourner, of the knights of the Garter of St. George, and of the king's hatchments, banneroles, banners, and other trophies, as also of the king's hearse, richly trapped, came four gentlemen ushers, and took away the pall of cloth of tissue, the picture being conveyed away before by six knights into the vestry; after which sixteen strong yeomen of the guards took the coffin, and with five strong linen towels, which they had for their fees, put it into the vault, near unto the body of queen Jane Seymour, his third wife, the grate being first taken away: then the lord chamberlain, the lord great-master, the treasurer, the comptroller, and the serjeant-porter, breaking their white staves upon their heads in three parts, as did likewise all the gentlemen ushers, threw them into the grave; when Garter, assisted by the bishops of Canterbury and Durham, declared the state and the name of the most goodly prince their master, king Edward the sixth. Thus the funeral ending, the trumpets sounded in the rood loft, and the company departed.

Henry had issue as follows.

By his first wife, Catherine of Spain, he had a son named

Henry, born January 1, 1511, who died on the twenty-seventh of February following.

Another son, born the latter end of the year 1514, who died an infant. And a daughter, Mary, born February 11, 1516, who came, after her brother Edward's death, to be queen of England.

By the second, Anne Boleyn, he had the famous queen Elizabeth. And

A male child, still-born on January 19, 1539.

By the third, Jane Seymour, he had a son, named

Edward, who succeeded him immediately in the throne.

By his three last, Anne of Cleves, Catherine Howard, and Catherine Parr, he had had no issue.

By Elizabeth, daughter of John Blount, and widow of sir Gilbert Taillebois, he had a natural son, named Henry Fitz Roy, who, not being yet seven years old, was, on the eighteenth of June, 1525, created knight of the Garter, earl of Nottingham, duke of Richmond and Somerset, and made lieutenant of all the king's forces north of the Trent, and warden of the Marches of Scotland. On the twenty-sixth of July next following, he was constituted admiral of England; and, about five years after, made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The handsomeness of his person, the quickness of his parts, his expertness in all kinds of military exercises, his excellent disposition, and the rare endowments of his mind, gained him the character of the finest youth of the age, and raised the expectation of the world very high in his favour. These accomplishments, the honours he had received, and the extraordinary fondness which Henry always expressed for him, raised a notion that, in defect of legitimate male issue, he would have found a way to raise this natural son to the throne. But whatever designs he had for his advantage, they proved abortive by this youth's too early death, when he was about seventeen years old, and before he had consummated his marriage with the lady Mary Howard. He died on the twenty-fourth of July, 1536, and was buried at Thetford, in Norfolk.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES.

In his ninth year happened a sweating sickness, whereof infinite multitudes in many parts of England died, especially in London; and was so violent, that in three, and sometimes two hours, it took away mens lives, and spared neither rich nor poor; for in the king's court the lord Clinton, lord Grey of Wilton, and many knights, gentlemen, and officers died of it. It began in July, and continued to the midst of December.

In his fifteenth year, after great rains and winds, there followed so severe a frost, that many died for cold, and some lost fingers, some toes, and many their nails.

About his fifteenth year, divers things were newly brought into England; whereupon this rhyme was made:

Turkeys, carps, hops, piccards, and beer,
Came into England all in one year.

In his nineteenth year, by extremity of rain in seed-time, there followed a great dearth of corn, which would have caused great calamity, but that it was relieved in London by merchants of the Steel-yard, out of Germany, and a thousand quarters supplied out of the king's own provision.

In his twentieth year, in the end of May, began in London another sweating sickness, which afterwards infected all places of the realm, by reason whereof the term was adjourned, and the circuit of the assize also; many died in the court, as sir Francis Poynes, sir William Compton, knights, and William Carew, esq. of the king's privy-council: the king himself, for a space, removed almost every day, till he came to Tittinghanger, a place of the abbot of St. Alban's, where he, with the queen and a small number, remained till the sickness was passed.

In his thirtieth year, the manner of casting pipes of lead for conveying water under ground without using of solder, was first invented by Robert Brocke, clerk, one of the king's chaplains: a profitable invention. Robert Cooper, goldsmith, was the first that made the instruments, and put this invention in practice.

In his three-and-thirtieth year, there was a great mortality in the realm; and withal so great a drought, that small rivers were clean dried up; much cattle died for want of water, and the Thames was grown so shallow, that the salt-water flowed above London bridge, till the rain had increased the fresh water.

In his six-and-thirtieth year was a great plague in London; so as Michaelmas term was adjourned to St. Alban's, and there kept.

In his seven-and-thirtieth year, on Tuesday in Easter-week, William Foxley, pot-maker for the mint of the Tower of London, fell asleep, and could not be waked, either by pinching, burning, or any other means, till the first day of the next term, which was full fourteen days: and when he awoke, was found in all points as if he had slept but one night, and lived in perfect health forty years after.

EDWARD VI. the third King of ENGLAND of the House of TUDOR. A. D. 1547.

EDWARD VI. the only son of king Henry VIII. by his third wife, Jane Seymour, was, at the death of his father, only nine years and three months old, but a prince of most promising parts, as appears by the united testimony of all his historians, both cotemporary and others. When the eighth Henry resigned his breath, Edward was with his sister, the princess Elizabeth, at Hertford, whither Edward, earl of Hertford, and sir Anthony Brown, knight, were sent by the council to bring the young king to London: but they did not inform him of their message till they had brought him as far as Enfield, where they notified to him his father's death, and paid their homage to him as their sovereign. The next day, the thirty-first of January, they conducted him safe to London, and, having lodged him the Tower, the council repaired in a body to pay their respects to him, and proclaimed him king of England on the same day.

We have before shewn that Henry, by virtue of an act of parliament, had settled the succession of this prince by will; he had also appointed him a privy-council, being the same persons whom he had nominated the executors of his will: therefore, on the first of February, these counsellors met, opened the will, and found that the late king had nominated them regents of the kingdom and governors of his son, till he should attain the age of eighteen years. These were,

Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury.

The lord Wriothesley, lord-chancellor.

The lord Ruffel, privy-seal.

The earl of Hertford, lord high-chamberlain.

The viscount Lisle, lord admiral.

Cuthbert Tunstall, bishop of Durham.

Sir Anthony Brown, master of the horse.

Sir William Paget, secretary of state.

Sir Edward North, chancellor of the court of augmentation.

Sir Edward Montagu, lord chief-justice of the Common pleas.

Judge Bromley, } chief gentlemen of the Sir Anthony Denny, } privy-chamber.
Sir William Herbert, }

Sir Edward Wotton, treasurer of Calais.

Dr. Wotton, his brother, dean of Canterbury and York.

Besides these sixteen, who were to exercise the sovereign authority during the minority of the present king, Henry had nominated twelve other persons to be as assistant counsellors to them, to be called in as need should require. These were

Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel.

William Parr, earl of Essex, brother to the queen dowager.

Sir William Petre, secretary of state.

Sir John Baker.

Sir Ralph Sadler.

Sir Thomas Seymour, the king's uncle, and brother to the earl of Hertford.

Sir Richard Southwell.

Sir Edmund Peckham.

Sir Thomas Cheney, treasurer of the household.

Sir John Gage, comptroller.

Sir Anthony Wingfield, vice-chamberlain.

The executors having taken the proper oaths, notifications were made to all the courts of Europe concerning the new establishment; and all the commissions to judges and justices under the great seal, were renewed. But no sooner had the regents settled the form of government agreeable to Henry's last will, which was publicly read, but a change was proposed: some of the regents observed, that it would be very troublesome for the people, and particularly for foreign ministers, to be forced to apply to sixteen persons of equal authority, and moved that one should be chosen from amongst them, to be head and president, with the title of Protector of the king's realm, and Governor of his person."

How reasonable soever this change might appear to the majority, for the dispatch of business, the lord-chancellor Wriothesley, fearing, as in fact it happened, that the choice would fall upon the king's uncle, the earl of Hertford, who was not his friend, and that this would absolutely deprive him of that sway in the government, which otherwise he might have expected from his high office of chancellor, opposed this proposal with all his might, declaring that the regents had no power to depart from the late king's will, authorised by act of parliament; but matters had been so well prepared before hand, that the chancellor's objections were over-ruled; it was resolved to appoint a protector, and that the earl of Hertford should be the person. He was accordingly declared, on the first of February, Governor of the king's person and Protector of all his realms; but, at the same time, he was bound down to act nothing without the consent of the other other regents, so that, in fact, he had only pre-eminence without power. On the sixth of the same month the new protector exercised the first act of his high authority, by knighting the young king, in the presence of the lord-mayor of London and many other lords and gentlemen; then the king, rising up under his canopy of state, dubbed the lord-mayor (Henry Hobberthorn) knight; which appears to have been the first act of sovereignty done by Edward VI.

The next thing which fell under the care of the regents and council was to make preparations for the funeral of the deceased king, and the coronation of his successor. The first of these ceremonies was performed in the manner we have related at the end of the former reign, on the fifteenth of February; and two days after (on the seventeenth), the regency took an extraordinary step, on pretence of fulfilling the intention of the late king, who had resolved to make some promotions among his courtiers: evidence was examined touching Henry's design, and, in consequence of their depositions, the following promotions were made, though with some little difference from Henry's intention:

The earl of Hertford was created duke of Somerset, with the high offices of lord-treasurer and earl-marshal, vacant by the attainder of the duke of Norfolk, then under sentence of death.

The earl of Essex, marquis of Northampton.

Dudley, viscount Lisle, earl of Warwick.

Sir Thomas Seymour, lord Sudley.

Sir Richard Rich, sir William Willoughby, and sir Edmund Sheffield, had the title of barons, by the names of their families*.

It had been at first resolved, that the coronation should have been performed on the nineteenth of February, and the marquis of Dorset had commission for being high-constable of England that day; but it was thought more proper to defer the ceremony till the twentieth, which was Shrove Sunday, and the lord Russell was made lord-high-steward for the same day. Accordingly, the young king, being conducted in great state from the Tower through the city of London, took up his lodgings in his palace of Westminster on the nineteenth, and the day following was crowned with the royal diadem, anointed in a solemn manner, and consecrated by Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by other bishops and all the chief nobility of the realm. There was a new form for the coronation of this king, which the curious reader may see in bishop Burnet's Collections.

To grace this ceremony forty knights of the Bath were made†; and, on the Tuesday following, the king dubbed fifty knights of the carpet‡. At the same time a free pardon was granted and proclaimed throughout all the king's dominions, out of which were excepted the duke of Norfolk, cardinal Pole, Edward Courtney, eldest son to the marquis of Exeter (lately beheaded), Mr. Throgmorton, and Dr. Richard Pates, or Pate, who, having been bishop of Worcester in the late king's reign, had, some years before, gone out of the kingdom to Rome, rather than acknowledge the king's supremacy over the church of England. It appears as if the council thought that the release of these persons would be too considerable an accession to the Romish party, and check the schemes of reformation that had been already planned.

But now the secret enmity between the protector's family and the lord-chancellor Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, broke out into a violent flame, which brought on the disgrace of the latter, and in the end proved the ruin of the protector. Southampton was an obstinate, restless, proud, man, impatient of the least controul, and, from the time of Somerset's elevation, had determined to make him as uneasy as possible in his high station by opposing all his measures; and, that he might give himself up entirely to the affairs of the cabinet, he, without any warrant from the king, lord-protector, or other of the regency, of his own authority ventured to put the great-seal in commission, and appointed four lawyers, Southwell, Tregonel, Oliver, and Pallasir, to execute, in his absence, the office of high-chancellor of England. A measure so replete with arrogance and presumption, could not fail of giving great umbrage to the government, who, influenced by the protector, gladly seized such an opportunity of ruining Southampton. The judges being consulted, declared, that the commission he had granted was contrary to the laws of the land; and that the chancellor, for such an unconstitutional step, ought not only to be deprived of the seals, but might likewise be subjected to the severest punishment: thereupon the council summoned him to attend, when his behaviour was so indecent and haughty, defending his own power, and calling theirs and the protector's in question, that he provoked them to use him with greater severity than they at first perhaps intended. Accordingly he was commanded to his own house, not to stir from thence till farther orders; and then the council came to this resolution, to deprive him of the chancellorship, and to keep him under arrest, to prevent his interfering in the regency, from which they did not presume to remove him, as he sat there by the same authority by which they themselves acted. The seals were given, on the seventh of March, to sir William Paulet, till another chancellor should be appointed. The earl of Southampton was not released from his confinement till the twenty-ninth of June following, when he entered into a recognizance of four thousand pounds to pay what fine they should be pleased to impose upon him.

* According to the evidence, Henry declared his intention to be that the earl of Hertford should be made duke of Somerset, earl-marshal, and lord-treasurer, two great offices vacant by the attainder of the duke of Norfolk; and his son to be earl of Wiltshire, with eight hundred pounds a year of land, and three hundred a year out of the next bishop's land that fell void; the earl of Essex to be marquis of Essex; the viscount Lisle to be earl of Coventry; the lord Wriothesley to be earl of Winchester; sir Thomas Seymour, to be baron and lord-admiral; sir Richard Rich, sir John Leiger, sir William Willoughby, sir Edward Sheffield, and sir Christopher Danby, to be barons.

The protector, exulting in the downfall of a person from whom he naturally expected much opposition, now thought himself at full liberty to controul the councils of his sovereign, and aspired at nothing less than to engross the sole management of affairs into his own hands. With this view he resolved to get his powers put upon a broader foundation, and obtained from the young king a patent constituting him protector, with full regal power, and appointing him a council, composed of all the former executors, or regents, except Southampton; but he had also power given him of choosing any other counsellors at pleasure, and was at liberty to consult such only whom he should think proper. By this patent, which was passed on the thirteenth of March, Somerset made himself absolute master of the government, though in so doing he entailed upon himself the hatred and envy as well of the co-executors of the late king's will (which had in this case been manifestly infringed), as of many other noblemen.

The commotions and revolutions in the regency did not, however, so far engross their attention as to render them forgetful of the public weal, for we find in the records of state*, two new treaties concluded with France; one to renew the ancient alliances subsisting between the two crowns, and the other to explain the articles of peace which the late king Henry had made with Francis, relating to the bounds and territories of Boulogne, and the fortifications erecting by both parties in the neighbourhood of that place. Both these treaties were signed at London, on the eleventh of March; but Francis I. dying the thirty-first of the same month, prevented their being ratified: he was succeeded by his son the dauphin, who assumed the sceptre by the name of Henry II.

The death of Francis introduced a considerable alteration in the affairs of Europe, and a total one in those of France; for the new sovereign, ruled by the pernicious counsels of the cardinal of Lorraine and his brother, the duke of Guise, could not be prevailed upon to confirm the treaties with England; and the two brothers being zealous champions for the popish authority and religion, resolved at all events to prevent the projected marriage of Edward with Mary, queen of Scots, their niece: with this view they persuaded their master to recover Boulogne out of the hands of the English at any rate, to reject the treaties, and even to disown the ambassadors which had been sent by the deceased king Francis to London, to conclude them. In this state stood affairs at this time between England and France.

As to those of Germany, the Protestants, who had been ill used by the emperor in the last campaign, found themselves, by the death of Francis I. and Henry VIII. wholly deprived of the assistance which they expected from France and England: Henry II's ministers did not think proper that he should engage in a war with the emperor, to support a religion for which they had an implacable hatred; but, as policy seemed to require that some efforts should be made by France to oppose the progress of the Imperial arms, which had, during the last year's campaign, carried every thing before them, they intimated to Henry the expediency of first recovering Boulogne, after which it would be still time enough to protect Germany, in case the emperor grew too powerful there. Mean while, the princes of the Smalcaldic league having sent to Edward for aid, fifty thousand crowns were privately given them by the regency, as it was not thought prudent to offend the emperor just at this time.

In this condition stood matters at the commencement of the new government; and we cannot chuse a more proper place for introducing the reader to a knowledge of the characters and views of the several chief personages that had the management of affairs at home; the more especially as the history of this reign will be found not so much the history of the king himself, as of his governors and ministers.

We shall begin with Edward, duke of Somerset, the protector, whose character is thus collected by a late impartial writer. He was a person of very great virtues, eminent for his piety, courteous and affable in his greatness, sincere and candid in all his transactions, a patron of the poor and oppressed, but a better general than a counsellor: and though he was not without his faults, yet they were only such as human infirmity exposes most men to, when they are advanced to a high station. He had, indeed, a tincture of vanity, and a fondness for his own notions; and being a man of no extraordinary parts, was too much at the disposal of those, who by flatteries and submissions insinuated themselves into his esteem and confidence. He made likewise too great haste to raise a vast estate, to be altogether innocent. But, to balance these defects, he was never charged with personal vices, nor guilty of falsehood, of perverting justice, of cruelty, or of oppression.

Of a very different character was his brother, Thomas Seymour, lord Sudley; he was proud, haughty, and ambitious. Being uncle to the king, he could not bear the distinction made between him and the duke of Somerset by their royal nephew, thinking himself, by his birth and natural endowments, as worthy as his brother Edward, of having a share in the administration of the government, and finding himself excluded therefrom by the will of the deceased king, he immediately made his addresses to the princess Elizabeth, hoping by that means one day to compass the throne itself. However, his project being not like to succeed, he, for the present, fed his ambition by taking up with the relics of royalty, and married the queen dowager, before her royal consort had been dead a month, which he kept private till he found means, unknown to the protector, to procure a letter from the king, recommending him to the queen for an husband. Upon this the marriage was declared, without using any ceremony with his brother. From this event we may date the breach between the protector and admiral, which was never made up, though the protector, who was a man of great moderation, prevented the quarrel from breaking out: But the admiral, looking upon every promotion and act of power in his brother, to be a lessening or eclipsing of his own birth and affinity to the crown, gave way to all the means that passion, envy, and malice, could invent, to supplant him; he joined the discontented and plotting nobles, and attempted to corrupt the king himself in prejudice to the duke.

Wriothesley, the earl of Southampton, seems to have been a man of parts; but he was too troublesome to his equals, and too violent in his measures, to keep his footing in this government. The severity, however, that it had shewn him did not discourage him from continuing his intrigues; and, perhaps, he was the author of that dark management which wrought the downfall of the protector-duke. But he was personally, and not undeservedly, hated for the cruelty of his persecutions when in power.

The character of Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, is sufficiently known by what has been said of him in the foregoing reign; we shall only add two things: the first, that he did not much love to meddle with state-affairs, for which he was not very properly qualified by reason of certain maxims of candour and sincerity, which he followed, and which were very opposite to those generally observed in the government of states. The second thing concerning Cranmer, is that he was extremely zealous to promote the reformation. Since he was no longer restrained by such a master as Henry, he was so far from concealing his opinions, that he even laboured with all his power to establish them by public authority: he was the first mover of whatever was done with regard to the reformation. But his zeal was tempered with a maxim which he believed absolutely necessary, namely, to proceed by degrees, and retrench first the gross abuses, that the people might be gradually accustomed to the changes before the tenets of greater consequence were crushed.

John Dudley, earl of Warwick, was son of Edmund Dudley, who had suffered for oppressing the people in the beginning of the late reign: king Henry VIII. however, was pleased, after he had sacrificed the father to the resentment of the people, to dignify his son John with the title of lord Dudley; and after with that of viscount Lisle. The young favourite improved this happy revolution of his affairs by a diligent observance of the king's pleasure: he made a considerable figure in those employments at court with which he was entrusted, to the king's satisfaction, and distinguished himself so remarkably by his bravery and conduct in the wars, that he was first made governor of Boulogne, and afterwards admiral of a fleet fitted out against France. He was, in a word, both a brave soldier and an artful courtier, but of very indifferent morals: he was blindly addicted to his pleasures, and would sometimes run into excessive debaucheries; nor was he very scrupulous with regard to honour and virtue, for as his ambition was boundless, he did not stick at the worst of means to accomplish his ends; from whence we may readily suppose that he was not very scrupulous in religious matters: while Henry VIII. reigned he kept strictly the bounds prescribed by that prince; and he no sooner saw the majority in king Edward's council for the reformation, but he declared openly on their side, as the only way to please the king, and to advance his own fortune. But as his scheme to make religion only a means to raise himself, was easily discovered by the Protestant party, they never put any confidence in him, nor would consent to his promotion to the chancery, as he expected, upon the disgrace of Wriothesley; and therefore, from this disappointment, we may date his disgust with the protector, and a resolution to try to ruin him, as we shall find he effectually did, though he had attained by his means the titles of earl of Warwick and duke of Northumberland; and gained his daughter in marriage for his son viscount Lisle. So implacable is hatred founded upon ambition, that neither the ties of gratitude, nor affinity, are able to reconcile it.

These characters, properly considered, will furnish the reader with a just idea of the several revolutions in the ministry during this short reign; and for that reason we thought it necessary to introduce them. It may have been expected, that we should have begun with the character of Edward himself; but the reader is to consider, that he was at this time only nine years of age, and consequently could not be said to have any determinate character: he indeed, before his death, acquired a character; but this is not the proper place to treat of it: we shall therefore defer, to another opportunity, any farther account of the disposition of Edward, and resume the thread of our history.

Henry VIII. had, some time before his death, determined to force the Scots to give their young queen Mary in marriage to his young son Edward; and this match appearing most advantageous to the crown of England, Henry had, during his last illness, given positive directions to execute his project at all events; therefore the protector resolved to put in force the dying injunctions of his royal master, and, if possible, to unite the two kingdoms by uniting the hands of their two youthful sovereigns. Previous, however, to taking the necessary steps for that purpose, he thought it advisable to settle the internal government of the kingdom, and to put the reformation, for which he was a staunch friend, upon such a footing as might enable it to baffle the attacks of its open or concealed enemies.

In this he was not a little assisted by the affection young Edward himself had to the reformed principles, and by the cool and politic councils of Cranmer. This prelate had, without being seen to stir in the matter, procured several of the best books written abroad against popery, to be translated and published in England. The queen dowager, Catherine Parr, not only assisted in publishing, but translated great part of the Paraphrase of Erasmus upon the New Testament. Cranmer had likewise published a Catechism, which he translated and improved from the Latin, and which was chiefly aimed against the abolished worship: he also composed several Homilies, to be delivered by priests in the nature of sermons. A book, of which the late king was the reputed author, concerning the true difference between the regal and the ecclesiastical powers, was translated and published: at the same time an excellent treatise of reformation, by Herman, archbishop of Cologne, was rendered into English, and printed; part of the English service for the Evening Prayer, was already, before any act of parliament passed for that purpose, openly performed in the king's chapel: the sacrament had for some time been administered in both kinds, the doctrine of purgatory was exploded among the reformed, and the marriage of the clergy was allowed.

The chief opposers of the reformation were the princess Mary, Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, Tunstall, bishop of Durham, Bonner, bishop of London, and Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, with some other of the bishops, and many of the inferior clergy, consisting of the suppressed monks, who had been recommended to livings; these stuck out against every measure that did not square exactly with the state of things as they were left by king Henry VIII. and the hint was given to all the papists in the nation to pursue the same argument, in which they were warmly seconded by their leaders, who charged the protector with destroying the form of government and religion established by Henry's will, from which alone all their authority was derived.

But all these remonstrances and efforts produced no effect; an act of parliament had bestowed a legislative power on the crown, and royal proclamations, even during a minority, possessed all the force and authority of laws: the protector availed himself of this statute, and, the present juncture being so favourable for the reformation, he, and such of the council as were of his sentiments, resolved to improve it. To that end they ordered a general visitation of all the churches: the whole kingdom was divided into six circuits, each of which was assigned to a certain number of visitors, who were partly laymen and partly ecclesiastics. The chief purport of their instructions was to abolish certain gross abuses that were introduced into divine service, and particularly with regard to images; but at the same time they were directed to proceed with the greatest delicacy and reserve. With this visitation commenced the execution of the design already formed of perfecting the reformation, which was properly but just begun in the former reign.

The protector now turned all his attention to the war with Scotland; and in prosecution of this plan assembled an army of eighteen thousand men, and equipped a fleet of sixty sail, one half of which were ships of war, the other loaded with provisions and ammunition; the command of the fleet he bestowed upon lord Clinton, while himself, assisted by the earl of Warwick, was to conduct the land forces. While this armament was getting ready, the French ambassador, by orders from his court, applied to the regency, desiring them to consent to a negotiation, in order to compromise matters if possible without the effusion of blood. The protector, who was desirous of keeping fair with the French court, readily prevailed on the regents to comply with the ambassador's request, and Tunstall, bishop of Durham, and sir Thomas Rowe, were appointed, on the part of England, to meet the Scottish commissioners at Newcastle, at which place conferences were opened on the fourth of August; but as Tunstall and his colleague had orders to break up the congress immediately, if the Scottish ambassadors had no power to consent to the marriage, and as they declared no such powers were vested in them, the negotiation proved fruitless, and the protector- duke, with his army, entered Scotland, by the way of Berwick, on the second of September.

The pretence for these hostile proceedings was to revenge some depredations committed by the Scottish borderers: but, besides that the protector renewed the ancient claim of the superiority of England, which was pompously asserted in a letter set forth by bishop Tunstall; and the protector himself issued a manifesto, in which he enforced the necessity and expediency of a marriage being immediately concluded between the young queen of Scots and Edward, by a variety of arguments. These were deduced from the situation of the two kingdoms, which nature, by cutting them from all communication with foreign states, and surrounding them by the ocean, seemed to have designed for one empire; from the similarity of the inhabitants in laws, language, manners, and customs, by which means they might the more easily be united into one people; the equality of the young king and queen in point of age and fortune; the imminent danger to which Scotland was perpetually exposed from the hostile attempts of a richer and more powerful neighbour; the many and great advantages that must necessarily result to the natives of both countries from living in a state of peace and security: and the protector added, that, besides all these considerations, positive engagements had been made for concluding this alliance; and that the Scots were bound in honour to perform what their interest and safety so loudly demanded.

He soon found, however, that all these remonstrances were rendered ineffectual by the arts and intrigues of the queen-dowager of Scotland, who was warmly attached to the interests of France and to the Roman catholic religion: and, much against his will, found nothing left but to compel the Scots by force of arms to submit to a measure, which no motives of policy or prudence could induce them to embrace: accordingly, leaving Berwick, he continued his march towards Edinburgh, without meeting with any resistance, except from some small castles which were forced to surrender at discretion.

The earl of Arran, governor of Scotland, had collected the whole force of the kingdom, and his army, which was twice as numerous as that of the English, had taken post at Musselburgh, on a very advantageous ground, secured by the banks of the river Esk, about six miles from Edinburgh. The English army lay at Preston Pans. Several encounters happened while they were in this situation, and one in particular, in which the earl of Warwick was in great danger of being taken prisoner. It is not improbable that the English army, notwithstanding all the precautions that had been taken, found itself greatly distressed in its late march; for we find that the protector- duke, on the approach of the Scottish army, sent a letter to the earl of Arran, in which he assured that nobleman of his good intentions towards the kingdom and people of Scotland, and declared himself ready to return to England, and to pay all the damages they had suffered from his army, provided they would allow their infant queen to be educated in England, and to continue unbetrothed till she should come to years of discretion, and that then she should be left to her own liberty to make choice of a husband. All these offers were rejected by the Scots, and several bravading messages came from their camp, which exposed their insolence rather than discovered their courage.

The protector-duke now resolved upon a general engagement as soon as a proper opportunity should offer for the same with a prospect of advantage. The river Esk ran between the two camps, and both armies continued inactive until the English ships arrived in the Firth of Forth, and lay so as to flank the Scots: the English then made a feint, as if they designed to take up a ground which commanded the enemy's camp; this had the desired effect, for when the Scots saw the protector-duke alter his position, and advance towards the sea-shore, they made not the least doubt that he intended to re-embark and make his escape on board his ships, which at that very time moved into the harbour of Musselburgh. Deluded by these appearances and their own vanity, orders were given for advancing to charge the flying foe, which they could not do without passing through a plain which lay before the English camp, and expose themselves to all the fire as well from the ships in the harbour as the enemy's army.

The Scottish regent drew up his men in three bodies; the earl of Angus commanded the first line, which was formed of their best troops; the second line was commanded by the earl of Arran himself; the third by the gallant George Gordon, earl of Huntley; and the earl of Argyll headed a body of Highland archers, who served upon the flanks of the second and third lines, and as a guard to their artillery.

The protector-duke was not a little delighted when he saw the Scots make their movement, which assured him a cheap and easy victory. He drew up his troops in two lines; the earl of Warwick commanded the first, the protector-duke the second, and the lord Grey of Wilton commanded a reserved body of cavalry, with orders to attack that flank of the enemy which was not exposed to the fire from the English shipping. While the enemy were advancing on the plain, they received a full discharge from the cannon on board the ships in the harbour, which threw the Highland archers into such confusion, that the lord Grey could not resist the tempting opportunity of attacking them before they could recover themselves; but this disobedience of orders had well nigh lost the English the victory, for the Scots rallying behind a deep slough, and Grey attacking them there with his heavy-armed horse, met a severe repulse; he himself was dangerously wounded, lord Edward Seymour, son to the protector-duke, was unhorsed, the English standard was narrowly saved from falling into the enemy's hands: but the earl of Warwick and the duke of Somerset, being determined either to die or to conquer, advanced with so much speed to the support of the cavalry, that the latter formed again behind their infantry, and the battle became more obstinate. The ill-armed Scots could not long sustain the dispute: the camp-artillery of the English, which was planted conveniently for the purpose on an eminence, played full upon their flank, while the ordnance from the shipping (anchored close in shore) galled them on the other; and the lord Grey, eager to repair his error, charged them in front with his rallied horse with so much resolution, that their first line gave way. The Highland archers taking to flight, spread the alarm of a general rout through all the ranks, and rendered the whole one general scene of confusion, terror, flight, and consternation. The bravest of the Scots were put to the sword, and the rout and slaughter became so general, that, from the field of battle to Edinburgh (a space of upwards of five miles) the whole ground was covered with the dead and dying. Never was victory more decisive: according to the lowest calculation, there fell in the fight above ten thousand of the Scots, and about fifteen hundred surrendered themselves prisoners. The Scottish nobility behaved very gallantly, and many of them were either killed or taken prisoners. The loss sustained by the English was so inconsiderable as hardly to deserve mention, it being assured that not above two hundred were slain in the action.

So dreadful a defeat, with other misfortunes that followed it, seemed to threaten Scotland with utter ruin. The regent retired to Edinburgh, and, after he had garrisoned the castle, shut himself and the queen up in Stirling, with the remains of his army. The protector marched directly to Leith, which he took without opposition; and entering Edinburgh, made an attack upon the castle; but being repulsed, to make amends for the disappointment, he plundered the town, while the fleet, under lord Clinton, burned all the places on the sea-coast, and took all the shipping of the Scots in the firth of Forth.

The duke of Somerset, had he taken all the advantages his late victory gave him, must doubtless have forced the young queen out of the Scottish regent's hands, and compelled him to agree to any terms he might have thought proper to impose: but he was impatient to return to England, where he heard that some of the regency, and even his own brother, were forming cabals against his authority. Accordingly, after having given orders for fortifying the island of St. Columba, which, with the help of the English fleet, commanded the Forth and the castle of Broughty, which lay in the mouth of the Tay (the two chief rivers of Scotland), he departed for England on the eighteenth of September, taking his route through the counties of Marche and Tiviotdale: he left a garrison in the castle of Hume, and made sir Ralph Palmer governor of Roxburgh, which he ordered to be repaired; and, at his return to London, on the eighth of October, the mayor and aldermen went in their formalities to meet him in Finsbury Field*.

In the mean time the business of the reformation proceeded with great advances: nor were any of the prelates found hardy enough to obstruct the commission of visitation issued by the crown, except the bishops Gardiner and Bonner, who were thereupon committed to prison: and though the princess Mary, on this occasion, wrote to the protector, signifying her dislike of all the changes which were making in religion, he replied, in very strong terms, that he did not think himself obliged to conform to her sentiments. About this time archbishop Cranmer, in the king's name, invited into England the famous Peter Martyr, a native of Florence; Ochinus, who was made a canon of Canterbury, with a dispensation of residence; Fagus, who was made Hebrew professor at Cambridge, with a pension of one hundred pounds per annum; Bucer, who was seated in the divinity-chair at Oxford, as Peter Martyr was at Cambridge, each with a pension of one hundred pounds a year.

The protector was no sooner arrived at London, than he found that his brother Thomas, who had been lately created by patent lord high-admiral of England, had not only caballed with his enemies, but had made vigorous efforts to supplant him in his high post, having gained such an ascendancy over Edward, that he had persuaded him to write, with his own hand, a letter to the house of commons, recommending him to their choice as governor of the king's person, a post to which he said he was intitled by the former usages of parliaments, as being uncle to the king. This pretension struck at the root of all the protector's greatness, but still he endeavoured to reclaim his brother by methods of gentleness and munificence; but finding him still determined to push his point, the duke saw that nothing but a parliament could either save or serve him. Summons were therefore issued for holding a session on the fourth of the following month.

In the mean time he informed the council of the letter his brother had obtained from the young king, and that he proposed to offer the same to the house at its meeting; whereupon several lords were sent by the council to dissuade the admiral from so gross a proceeding: and when they returned with a report of his confirmed resolution to carry the letter, they next day sent an order to him to appear before them in council, which he at first refused to comply with, till they threatened to deprive him of all his offices, commit him to the Tower, and indict him upon the statute which made it death for any person to disturb the established government. These menaces brought him a little to consider the danger he should run by disobeying the council, and at last to pretend a reconciliation with his brother, and submission to the regency; I say to pretend a reconciliation, for he never ceased privately to incense the king against the protector and his other ministers, which was diligently observed by the spies set over him, and made the protector ever after look upon him as a very dangerous enemy.

The chancellorship being at this time vacant, since the disgrace of Wriothesley, a few days before the parliament met, the privy counsellor lord Rich was made chancellor. He was grand-son to Richard Rich, a wealthy mercer, and sheriff of London; this gentleman had been bred a lawyer, and, by his pliant temper, raised himself to the pinnacle of the law. On the third of November, the day before the meeting of the parliament, the council ordered the great-seal to be fixed to a patent, to warrant the protector "to sit in parliament upon a stool under the cloth of state, on the right hand of the throne, whether the king was present or not." The duke, by the same patent, was intitled "to all privileges and pre-eminences ever enjoyed by any former uncle, either by father's or mother's side, to a king of England, or by any protector of the kingdom during the minority, with a Non obstante to all statutes to the contrary*." These honours were not so necessary as they were invidious, particularly to the old nobility, and created the duke a great many enemies, who scrupled not to take occasion from hence to accuse him of aspiring too high, and of an intention to destroy the form of government established by the late king.

But if Somerset discovered his vanity and weakness in assuming so much state and grandeur, he merits the highest praise on account of the laws enacted, through his influence, in the session of parliament, which now met on the fourth of November, and by whom the rigour of former statutes was greatly softened, and some security given to the privileges of the people. The first act was to repeal all laws which extended the crime of treason beyond the statute of 28 Edw. III. All laws passed during the late reign extending the crime of felony; all the former laws against Lollards, or heretics, together with the bloody statute of the Six Articles; no person was to be accused of words but within a month after they were spoken. By these repeals some of the most severe laws that ever were enacted in England were annulled, and the people began to have the happy prospect of enjoying some share of civil and religious liberty. Heresy, however, was still a capital crime by the common law, and was liable to the penalty of burning; but there was no precise standard by which that crime could be ascertained, a circumstance which might either be advantageous or prejudicial to the public security, according to the rigour or lenity of the judges.

The parliament also repealed that law, the destruction of all laws, by which the king's proclamation was made equal to a statute; they likewise mitigated that other law, passed in the twenty-eighth of the late reign, by which the king was empowered to annul all laws enacted before he had attained his twenty-fourth year: at the same time they left him at liberty, after he should come to the said age, to annul them for the future by his letters patent; but he could not reverse any effects which had already ensued from them.

There were likewise several laws enacted, which contributed greatly to promote the reformation; the cup was restored to the laity; private masses were abolished; the king was invested with a power of creating bishops, without any election of the chapter; and all processes in the bishops courts (those of Canterbury excepted) were to be carried on in the king's name, and sealed by his seal, as in courts of common law.

In this parliament a statute was made against vagrants, by which it was enacted, "That any man or woman not being disabled by age, accident, or sickness, and not having lands or other means sufficient to maintain them, that wandered up and down idly for three days together, without employment, such persons, being brought before two justices of the peace, were to be slaves two years to the person that brought them, and marked with the letter V."

It appears upon the face of this act, that it was chiefly levelled against the ousted monks, and other religious persons, who being destitute of all provisions, except a small ill-paid pension, which some of them had, were obliged to go about the country for subsistence, and, it seems, gave the people unfavourable impressions of the reformation.

But the bill, which made the greatest noise in this parliament, was that which gave chantries and colleges to the crown. The pretext for pushing this bill, was to enable the king to pay part of his debts; the reason was, the hopes which the courtiers had, by sales or gifts of them, to enlarge their own estates. Cranmer and several bishops were of opinion, that the revenues of the church, by the impropriation of the tythes, and other methods of alienation were already too much reduced; he therefore strenuously opposed the bill, and was joined by the bishops of London, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Hereford, Winchester, and Chichester: but it passed the house of peers; and, notwithstanding some opposition, that of the commons likewise. An act had passed in the late reign, granting those chantries to the crown; but, it seems, the commissioners entrusted with this act had neglected to take possession of them, and therefore this new act became necessary. By this act no fewer than two thousand three hundred and seventy-four chantries and other religious foundations fell to the crown, with a few reserves of pensions to be paid to the ousted incumbents.

It was likewise decreed, that all who denied the supremacy of the king, or maintained that of the pope, should, for their first offence, forfeit their goods and chattels, and be imprisoned during pleasure; for the second offence, should be subject to Præmunire; and for the third offence, be attainted of high-treason.

The penalties of this last crime were denounced against all who should endeavour, by writing, printing, or any overt-act or deed, to deprive the king of his estate or titles, particularly of his supremacy, or to bestow them on any other, as well as against the heirs of the crown who should attempt to usurp upon one another, and to break the established order of succession.

The convocation assembled at the same time with the parliament; and as it appeared the freedom of their debates were greatly hampered by the rigour of the Six Articles, the king indulged them with a dispensation from that statute, before it was annulled by parliament.

The lower house of convocation presented a petition, desiring that they might have the liberty of sitting with the commons in parliament; or, if this privilege, which they pretended to claim by ancient right, was denied them, they required that no law concerning religion might be enacted in parliament without their consent and approbation.

But the principles of that age were more favourable to the civil than the ecclesiastical power; and, though it is probable that the lower clergy had a right of sending representatives to the house of commons, yet that practice had been discontinued for above two centuries, and the present juncture was by no means a proper season for endeavouring to revive it.

This parliament, having gone through its business, broke up on the twenty-fourth of December, after having granted the king a subsidy, and passed an act of grace, by which bishop Gardiner and Bonner were discharged from the Fleet, none being excepted but such prisoners as were confined in the Tower of London.

In the course of this year the face of affairs in Germany was entirely changed; the emperor defeated and took prisoner John Frederick, elector of Saxony, and declared his cousin Maurice elector, who at the same time took possession of the electoral dominions. After this disaster, the landgrave of Hesse, finding himself unable to maintain the war, made the best terms he could with the emperor, and came to him upon the faith of a safe-conduct, which expressly ran, that he should not be liable to any imprisonment; but, by a gross fraud, instead of the German word einig, which signifies any, the word einig, which signifies perpetual, was inserted; by this base artifice he was detained a prisoner, to be released at the emperor's pleasure. The imprisonment of the two heads rendered the protestant party very weak, and the emperor's triumphant, who now made sundry alterations, tending to destroy the reformation in Germany*.

In the beginning of the year 1548, the council made several alterations in the ceremonies of religion: it forbade the superstitious blessing of candles on the day of the Purification (February 2, thence called Candlemas-day), the blessing of ashes on the first day of Lent (Ash Wednesday), and of palms on the Sunday next before Easter (or Palm Sunday); all Wakes and Plough-Monday days were forbidden, and ordered to be suppressed. A few days after, they approved of the people's zeal in pulling down images, and ordered that they should be removed out of all churches. They also did what lay in their power to abolish auricular confession, that badge of popish slavery which kept the deluded people in eternal subjection to the tricks and impositions of the priests. But these great points against popery were not carried without some opposition, though confirmed by the king's proclamation, in virtue of his supremacy: Gardiner, though so lately released from confinement, once more attempted to obstruct the great work of reformation, by publicly protesting against all changes in religion during the king's minority. This drew upon him the resentment of the administration a second time, who sent him to the Tower; and this act of severity to their head intimidated the popish party to such a degree, that they conformed to the new ordinances without hesitation.

The lord high-admiral Seymour had for some time continued pretty quiet; but now he returned to his former practices of caballing with the servants about the king's person. As the public had a very indifferent opinion of his morals, it was suspected that the death of his wife (Catherine Parr, the queen-dowager), which happened about this time, in child-bed, was hastened by his arts, that he might be at liberty to renew his addresses to the princess Elizabeth. It is certain that he was charged with this courtship before the council, and that it was afterwards made an article against him; nor did he deny it. But we are now to attend the affairs of Scotland.

Upon the return of the protector-duke last year from that country, he received a letter from the earl of Arran, in Stirling, begging he might be allowed to send commissioners to treat of an accommodation; on which Somerset, who was very desirous of terminating matters with the Scots in an amicable manner, named Berwick as the place of meeting, and invested the earl of Warwick with full powers to settle the preliminaries; but no commissioners from Scotland ever appeared, this proposal of the Scots being only an artifice to gain time, until they could receive assistance from France, whose ministry had given them the strongest assurances of a powerful support; and in the mean time they laid siege to Broughty castle, which the English had garrisoned. This obliged the protector, contrary to his inclination, to continue the war, and to send Francis Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, against the Scots, in the character of his lieutenant-general, having granted him a commission for this purpose by the authority of a new patent, which was afterwards urged as an article of accusation against him. In the mean time the lord Grey of Wilton took and fortified Haddington, which gave him the command of the most fruitful part of Scotland, and from whence he made excursions to the very gates of Edinburgh, from which it was distant not above twelve miles. Soon after he took the fort of Lauder also, without the Scots thinking proper to attempt the retaking either till they heard of the French succours landing at Leith, about the beginning of June.

These succours consisted of six thousand men, the best troops, and commanded by d'Esse, one of the best officers in France; they would not, however, act offensively against England till the young queen of Scotland was put into their hands, and sent into France: she was accordingly committed to the care of Mr. de Villegagnon, the French admiral, who conducted her north-about, in order to avoid the English fleet, under the lord-admiral Seymour, who made several fruitless descents upon the coast; but having missed the chief object of his expedition, he returned home, after doing very little damage to the enemy.

The French having thus obtained their ends, joined the Scots in forming the siege of Haddington, which was nobly defended by Wilford, whom the lord Grey had made its governor. While they were before the place, they had the good fortune to surprize and cut off a party of thirteen hundred men, sent under sir Robert Bowes and sir Thomas Palmer to its relief; but were themselves forced to raise the siege at the approach of the earl of Shrewsbury, with twenty-two thousand men, among whom were three thousand Germans, hired of the princes of the league. With such a force it would seem that the earl had it in his power greatly to distress the enemy; but, by an infatuation not to be accounted for, after having supplied the castle with provisions, he retired abruptly into England, which gave the French so much spirits, that they made an inroad into England as far as Newcastle, and, meeting with no resistance, returned laden with spoil. The French general, d'Esse, flushed with this success, began to behave with so much imperiousness towards the Scots, that the queen-dowager wrote over to his court to desire he might be recalled; but the French ministry, though they granted her request in this particular, gave her and the Scots much greater reason of complaint, by forcing upon them Mr. Montluc, bishop of Valence, to be chancellor of Scotland, who was sent over, under the protection of a new general, Mr. de Thermes.

While the war was thus carrying on in Scotland, the protector was indefatigable in pushing the progress of the reformation. The public offices in the church were reviewed; a new Catechism was published by Cranmer; and a new Liturgy, drawn up after a long consideration and debate. The protector, to take off as much as possible, all opposition to these proceedings, affected an extraordinary regard for the princess Mary, and procured for her a grant from the crown of lands to the amount of three thousand five hundred pounds a year; but we do not find that all those extraordinary indulgences made any impression on her in favour of the reformation, on the contrary, she both spoke and wrote publicly against the late innovations. All this summer the plague raged in London and Westminster, so that the court removed, in September, to Hatfield, from which place a proclamation was published for adjourning the term on the same account; and another was soon after published for preventing the exportation of all corn and other victuals, on account of the prevailing scarcity.

About this time the emperor, on occasion of a dispute between him and the pope, to shew his independence, proposed articles of accommodation to the Protestants: these were known by the appellation of his Interim, because they were no other than expedients to be used until a council should be held in some town of Germany. Though the expressions were softened, they at bottom contained almost all the doctrines of the Romish church; yet they allowed that a man's marriage should be no objection to his receiving the order of priesthood; and that the communion in both kinds should be allowed to those who might demand it in that manner. This interim was presented in a diet convoked at Augsburg, and enacted into a decree, notwithstanding the protests of several towns of the empire. But all this while the emperor behaved with the greatest complaisance to Hoby, the English ambassador at his court, in hopes that by their means he might prevail on the Germans to accept his Interim; but, after repeated trials, finding he had nothing to hope for from England, he began to act with great haughtiness. A tariff had been settled in the beginning of Edward's reign, which was to continue during all his minority, with regard to the English commerce in the Low Countries: this tariff was now broken, higher duties were exacted from the English than what had been stipulated, and they, receiving no redress for their complaints transmitted over to the council here, withdrew from Antwerp with all their effects.

As the proceedings of the French with regard to Scotland, and other matters, since the accession of Edward, had greatly disgusted the court of England, it was thought that a war between the two nations would soon be the consequence of their mutual resentments; hereupon the Danes offered their mediation between England and France, a motion which the protector was far from discouraging. Several steps were taken towards maturing this project, but in the end it proved abortive. Such were the state of affairs at home and abroad, when the parliament met, on the twenty-fourth of November. This parliament distinguished itself by confirming all the orders of council concerning the reformation in religion; and farther, allowed priests to marry, and confirmed the new Liturgy, in compiling which commissioners had been employed the preceding summer. This is nearly the same liturgy which is now used in the church of England.

Whilst

Whilst these things were transacting in parliament, to the no small satisfaction of the friends of the Reformation, the protector found himself called upon to exert all his power and abilities to counteract the attempts of his enemies, and to secure the king's person against the violent projects of the admiral, his brother, who, finding every other step to the supreme power sufficiently guarded against his designs, had determined to convey away the person of the young king to his house at Holt, in Denbighshire, to displace the protector, and seize the government into his own hands, with the assistance of ten thousand men which he had privately enlisted into his service in divers places.

The council having gotten information of these his factious and treasonable designs, issued a warrant, on January 19, 1549, for the apprehending Thomas Seymour, lord Sudley, lord high-admiral, and confining him prisoner in the Tower. They next issued a joint commission to the earl of Southampton, the lord Ruffel, and secretary Petre, to receive the deposition of witnesses against him; when, after having proceeded upon the matter, they reported to the council, on the twenty-second of February, that the admiral was accused "of committing many misdemeanors in the discharge of his office of lord high-admiral; of protecting and taking a share with pirates in their robberies, and of refusing justice to those that demanded it; of having obstinately persisted in his courtship with the lady Elizabeth (notwithstanding the admonitions of the lord-protector and the council), whom he designed privately to marry, as he had done the deceased queen-dowager; and lastly (which served to stamp his offence the deeper), his having engaged in a confederacy with one Sharrington, who had put the Mint of Bristol into the admiral's hands, and had supplied him, by defrauding the king and kingdom, with vast sums of money, to enable him to carry on his treasonable purposes†."

Matters being carried to this length, the protector made another attempt to bring the admiral to a suitable temper, offering to stop all proceedings, if he would make a submission and retire from court and all public business: but nothing could cure his ambition, or moderate the hatred he bore to his brother. This unexpected stubbornness proved fatal to him; for the examinations being laid before the council, as has been already said, a charge was drawn up against the admiral in thirty-three articles, the particulars whereof, (as they are entered in the council-book) were so manifestly proved by witnesses, and by letters under his own hand, as not to admit of a denial. The chancellor and several members of the council went to him the next day, read the charge, and pressed him for an answer thereto, either excusatory or confessional; but he refused to make any answer, and demanded an open trial, and to be brought face to face before his accusers: yet, though he was a peer of the realm, lord high-admiral of England, and uncle to the king, this point of justice was denied him, and a bill of attainder was ordered into the house of lords, which was read on the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth of February, and passed on the twenty-seventh.

This bill being sent down to the commons, met with strong opposition there, on account of passing an attainder in the absence of the condemned party, and it was desired that the admiral might be brought to the bar, and plead for himself: but, on the fourth of March, a message came from the king to the house, importing, "that it was not necessary for the admiral to appear before them; but that, if the house required it, the lords should attend to affirm their evidence*": upon this the bill was read the third time, and passed, in the fullest house known in those days (upwards of four hundred members being present, and only ten or twelve voting in the negative); and the royal assent being given to the bill, the admiral was beheaded on the twentieth of the same month, by warrant from the regency, to which were set the hands of Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, and of his brother the protector. On the scaffold his behaviour was very undaunted, and he persisted with his dying breath in declaring, that he had never committed, or intended, any treason against the king or kingdom. Thus fell Thomas Seymour, baron of Sudley, contrary to the most essential rules of justice, without being heard in his own defence. And here let every Briton congratulate himself on the invaluable accession our liberties have obtained since that period, inasmuch as the proceeding which was then held legal in the case of the greatest subject, would now be deemed infamous in that of the meanest felon. We are told by Strype, that the admiral's hatred to his brother was carried even beyond his life, for he left behind him two letters for the princesses Mary and Elizabeth, calculated to incense them against the protector, whom he charged with endeavouring to alienate the king's affection from them, and to deprive them of their right of succession.

Somerfet, when he signed the warrant for cutting off his brother's head, did in effect lay his own down upon the block; for they who had been most forward in pushing the admiral to his fall, were the first to charge the protector with his blood. The nobility hated both, but thought it most prudent to attack them separately; they received but too good encouragement from the protector's unguarded conduct: he had begun a magnificent palace, since called Somerfet-house, in the Strand; the ashes of the dead were disturbed that its foundations might be laid, and churches robbed of their sacred ornaments to decorate the rising pile. Whatever private sentiments the protector might entertain of those matters, it was certainly impolitic at so critical a juncture for him to give so fair a handle to his enemies; but he trusted to the popularity he had acquired, and in that to a broken reed, as the sequel will shew.

In the last session of parliament, the lords passed an act, giving licence to every one to inclose his own grounds, if he pleased; but the bill was thrown out by the commons: nevertheless the lords and great men went on inclosing their lands. This bred an universal discontent among the lower people, who imagined that a scheme had been formed to ruin them, and reduce them to slavery; and their discontents now broke out into a storm of civil commotion, short indeed, but violent. The populace first took up arms in Wiltshire and Somerfetshire; but sir William Herbert dispersed them, and caused some to be hanged. Soon after there were the like insurrections in Suffex, Hampshire, Kent, Gloucestershire, Suffolk, Warwickshire, Essex, Hertfordshire, Leicestershire, Rutlandshire, and Worcesterhire.

The protector, perceiving the flame was kindling all over the kingdom, sought to prevent the direful consequences of its spreading: pardons upon pardons, and proclamations upon proclamations, were issued in favour of the discontented, even after they had in many places committed overt-acts of rebellion. This lenity, instead of curing, fed the disease; the people thought the protector to be on their side; that both the king and he were under awe of the great men; and that it was the business of the commonalty to give liberty to them, and relief to themselves.

The chief insurrections were in Devonshire and Norfolk; in the former the people assembled in an armed body of fifteen thousand stout able-bodied men, under several leaders, the chief of whom was Humphrey Arundel, esq. It was hoped at court, that this might as easily be dispersed as the other risings; and the protector, being averse to extremities, sent the lord Russel, with a small force, to stop their proceedings. This nobleman being too weak to encounter them in the field, treated with them at a distance, and encouraged them to make known their complaints, offering to send the same to the council. He hoped by this condescension to prevent the flames of rebellion from encreasing to a rage too formidable; but the rebels, who in this county were more united than in other counties, being mostly papists, and the priests having gotten in amongst them, had the insolence to insist on the following articles, without which they declared they would not lay down their arms. They demanded,

"I. That all the general councils, and the ancient canons of the church, should be observed.

"II. That the act of the Six Articles should be again in force.

"III. That the mass should be in Latin, and the priest alone should receive.

"IV. That the sacrament should be lifted up and worshipped, and those who should refuse to do it, should suffer as heretics.

"V. That the sacrament should be only given to the people at Easter, in one kind.

"VI. That baptism should be administered at any hour, and at all times.

"VII. That holy bread, holy water, and palms, be again used, and images set up, with all the other ancient ceremonies.

"VIII. That the new liturgy should be laid aside; and the old offices, as well as the processions, be restored.

"IX. That all preachers, before their sermons, and priests in their mass, should pray for the souls in purgatory.

"X. That the people should be forbid to read the Bible.

"XI. That Dr. Moreman and Mr. Crispin should be restored to their livings.

"XII. That cardinal Pole should be restored.

"XIII. That every gentleman might have only one servant for every hundred marks of yearly rent belonging to him.

"XIV. That half of the abbey-lands should be taken from possessors, and adjudged to two of the chief abbeys in every county; and all the church-boxes for seven years should be given to the said houses, that devout persons might live in them, who should pray for the king and commonwealth.

"XV. That for their particular grievances, they should be redressed, as Humphrey Arundel and the mayor of Bodmyn should inform the king and council."

The regency received these articles with that indignation they merited; and when the rebels found they were entirely rejected by the council, and solidly refuted by archbishop Cranmer, they reduced their demands to eight articles; but, as these were as intolerable as the former, the court broke off all manner of negotiation with the Devonshire rebels, who, on the second of July, laid siege to Exeter, and reduced the citizens, who alone defended it, to such extremities, that they were obliged to live on horse-flesh and every kind of vermin. They were chiefly encouraged to the noble defence they made by an aged citizen, who, in the beginning of the siege, brought forth all his stock of provision into the market-place, and openly declared, "that he would feed with one arm and fight with the other, before he would consent to surrender the city to a rebel army." Which declaration so animated the protestants, that they held out till the lord Grey of Wilton joined the lord Russel with a large body of forces, and giving the rebels battle on the sixth of August, put them to a total rout, numbers of whom suffered by martial law; and Arundel with some of the chiefs were executed at London; while the citizens of Exeter, being relieved, experienced the gratitude of the king by grants of new privileges, and of their country by an universal applause of that loyalty which they inherited from their ancestors.

This, and the other insurrections above-mentioned, and not yet entirely suppressed, made it necessary for the government to put each county into the best posture of defence human policy and the present exigence of affairs required and suggested; and as the number of the king's forces were unequal to the service they were daily called upon, it was prudently resolved in a council to constitute and appoint lords lieutenants of counties, whose commissions are dated July 24, and are therein styled the king's justices as well as lieutenants. They were, amongst other very extensive powers, commissioned to suppress all riots, routs, and rebellions, and to exercise martial law. These commissions were to be renewed every year*.

The Devonshire insurrection was hardly quelled when another broke out in Norfolk, under the direction of one Ket, a tanner, one Flowerden, a gentleman of fortune, and others. There, inclosures were first adopted as the chief grievance, as religion had been in Devonshire; but when their numbers increased to twenty thousand, nothing would serve them but the suppression of the gentry, placing new counsellors about the king during his minority, and that something should be done in favour of what they called the old religion. The government rejecting these insolent demands, the insurgents marched to Norwich, their leader, Ket, assuming the title of Master and King of Norfolk and Suffolk, forcing all persons to follow his camp, and loading with irons all such as made any opposition to his will. The rebels took post at Menshold-hill, which overlooks the whole city, and which being destitute of all fortifications, they entered at pleasure. Their leader, Ket, affecting great austerity and regularity of conduct, held a court of judicature under a great oak (called the Tree of Reformation) on the top of the hill, forcing the neighbouring gentry to obey his lawless ordinances, and committing a thousand enormities, under the pretence of redressing some abuses.

* Strype's Mem. vol. ii. p. 178.

The lord-protector sought to heal up these sores of the commonweal by gentle applications: but the rebels having refused, with aggravating insolence, a pardon that was offered them, the marquis of Northampton, a better courtier than a soldier, was sent against them, with about a thousand English, and a body of Italian horse, under Malatesta, an experienced officer; but the marquis advancing, contrary to his orders, to Norwich, he was routed, with the loss of an hundred men slain (among whom was John lord Sheffield, ancestor of the late duke of Buckingham), and about forty taken prisoners. The king then proposed to send his uncle Somerset, with a royal army, to put an effectual stop to these outrages, and, by letters under his royal signet, ordered all the gentry of Essex to join him, on an appointed day: but whether the duke was afraid of losing his popularity, or was swayed by any other motive, he very impolitically declined going on the service, and suffered the command of six thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse to be given to his enemy the earl of Warwick; who marched with great expedition against the rebels, came up with them at Dussingdale, and, after a bloody engagement, put them to flight, killing upwards of two thousand: their chieftains being taken, Ket was hanged on the walls of Norwich castle, his brother William on the top of Windham steeple, and nine of his principal followers on as many branches of the oak where Ket had exercised his arbitrary judicature.

At the same time that the malecontents of Norfolk began to rise, those of Yorkshire also took arms, but their numbers never exceeded three thousand. They assembled at Semor in the North Riding, and committed several outrages at first; but the victorious Warwick, after suppressing the Norfolk rebellion, marched against, and quickly defeated them. Their ringleaders, Dare and Ambler, being taken, were hanged at York, on the twenty-first of September.

But whatever accession of strength accrued to the royal authority within the realm by the crushing of these rebellions, the raising of them was a great disadvantage to the king's affairs in other countries. It had diverted the forces designed for Scotland; and Mr. de Thermes landing there, with fresh succours from France, endeavoured to starve the gallant garrison of Haddington into a surrender. The place, however, was supplied, from time to time, during the summer, with provisions, though with great hazard and difficulty; but it being thought impracticable to supply it in the winter, the earl of Rutland, lately made warden of the East Marches, in the room of lord Grey, marched thither with a strong body of forces; and having demolished the fortifications, on the first of October brought off the garrison. De Thermes soon after took Broughty castle by storm, putting all the defendants to the sword, except the governor: so that nothing was left to the English of their conquests in that country, besides the castles of Lauder, Douglas, Eymouth, and Roxburgh.

Nor were these all the ill consequences of the late commotions. Henry II. of France, encouraged by the intestine troubles in England, made an effort to execute his favourite scheme of recovering Boulogne to his crown. The court had been for some time apprehensive that he had such a design, and had employed sir William Paget, ambassador at the Imperial court, to renew the alliance between the late king and Charles V. and to engage that prince to join in the defence of Boulogne; but Charles being now at peace with France, and not thinking it convenient for his affairs to be involved in a new war with that crown, rejected the proposal. In the mean time Henry, like a good French politician, entered the territory of Boulogne at the head of an army, took several castles, equipped a powerful fleet, and attempted a descent on the isles of Guernsey and Jersey; but a stout fleet of English men of war being sent to sea, attacked the French near Jersey, and obliged Leo Strozzi, the French admiral (though an Italian by birth), to retire, with the loss of a thousand men slain in the action; and Boulogne was defended against the whole power of France for a considerable time.

But now Somerset finding himself disappointed in the wished-for alliance with the emperor, began seriously to think of concluding a peace with France and Scotland: he not only found himself unable to support such ruinous and expensive wars, but he also knew that he could not cope with the enemies of the state without money, and had experienced the difficulties and dangers that attend ministers in demanding and raising new subsidies; again, he was fully bent to fulfil the great work of reformation, which had been carrying on from the beginning; and in fine, a war gave the enemies of a prime minister too great an advantage over him, on account of the ill accidents it may produce; whereas a peace enables him to guard against their attacks; and he had received certain information, that the earls of Warwick and Southampton, his mortal enemies, were forming schemes destructive of his authority. In this situation then he resolved to sacrifice Boulogne, and to gain Henry to his assistance; but when he came to propose the restitution of that place in the council, though he backed his proposal with the best arguments he could, it was rejected by the board with indignation; and seeing him unable to continue the war, they resolved for that very reason to thwart his measures for an accommodation, and to embrace the first favourable opportunity that should offer for depriving him of his dignity.

The present disposition of the nation seemed to promise them great success in the execution of their designs. The nobility and gentry were highly chagrined at the preference the protector seemed to have given the people in the affair of the inclosures, and the commotions consequent thereupon; and as they imputed all the insults they had lately received from the multitude, to his dilatory measures, and the countenance he had shewn the populace, so they dreaded a renewal of the same disorders from his present affectation of popularity. He had erected a court of requests in his own house, for the the benefit of the poorer people; and he readily embraced every other measure, by which he could promote their safety and welfare. But though Somerset courted, and thought he had acquired (as he most certainly deserved), the affections of the people, the interest which he had amongst them was far from being considerable; the popish party, which still made a great part of the vulgar illiterate commonalty, were his inveterate enemies, and greedily laid hold of every opportunity to condemn his conduct: the prosecution of his own brother, and the signing the warrant for his execution, appeared in the eye of the world so unnatural, that they exceedingly hurt his character; and the parade he shewed of his wealth in erecting that magnificent palace in the Strand, which still bears his name, and the havock he made of sacred edifices on that occasion, gave great offence to all degrees of men. These imprudent and impolitic actions had given Somerset's enemies but too great advantages, and they were resolved to make use of them as a plausible pretext for effecting his ruin.

After several complaints, disputes, and fruitless treaties for an accommodation, the lord St. John, president of the council, the earls of Warwick, Southampton, and Arundel, with five other counsellors, met on Sunday, the sixth of October, at Ely-house, in Holborn, where the earl of Warwick then resided; and, assuming to themselves the whole power of the council, sent for the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, and, after arraigning the protector's conduct in every point for which they had the least pretence, required them to obey no orders but such as should be issued by themselves. The king being informed of this separate meeting of his counsellors, sent secretary Petre to demand the reason thereof; but the junto forced him to stay with them till they deliberated on the state of the nation; when, after having laid all the troubles and miscarriages in the affairs of the state to the charge of the protector, they sent orders to the lieutenant of the Tower and the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, expressly forbidding them any longer to acknowledge Edward, duke of Somerset, for protector*.

The protector, upon the news of this proceeding, removed the king to Windsor, and armed such as he could assemble at that place and Hampton-court. This step, by giving the discontented party an additional and plausible pretext for complaint, added strength to the council; for the lord-chancellor Rich, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Shrewsbury, sir Thomas Cheney, sir John Gage, sir Ralph Sadler, and the lord chief-justice Montagu, pretending to dread the fatal consequences of such a violence on the person of their sovereign, joined the other counsellors the very next day after their meeting; and they then wrote a most dutiful letter to the king, setting forth, that they meant not in any wise to behave as undutiful or contumacious subjects, but that they were disgusted with the conduct of the duke of Somerset and his malversation, particularly for his having gathered an armed force about the royal person of their sovereign, and requested that the duke might be ordered to appear and give the council satisfaction.

Somerset, having the person of the king in his power, was inclined to set all the attempts of the council at defiance, and it was even reported that he should say, "the king should die first, if they proceeded to extremities against him." This spirit, however, was but of short duration; for, upon finding that the city and Tower had declared for his enemies, and that even his best friends and confederates had abandoned him, he laid aside all thoughts of resistance, and offered to submit himself to the council, on condition they would promise to treat him gently; with the hopes of which he was for the present indulged: nevertheless, on the twelfth of October, he was committed to the Tower, with some of his friends and adherents, among whom was Cecil, who afterwards made such a considerable figure at the court of Elizabeth. On the fourteenth, the duke was brought before the council, when they read to him his impeachment, which consisted of the following articles.

"I. That he had not observed the conditions on which he had been made protector.

"II. That he had treated with ambassadors, without notifying it to the council; and by his own authority had disposed of governments and bishoprics.

"III. That he had held a court of requests in his own house." The intent of this court was to hear poor men's petitions and suits; and upon hearing them he either decided their business, or sent his letters to the Chancery in their favour; which was reckoned stopping the proceedings of the court, or influencing the judges.

"IV. That he had embased the coin.

"V. That he had issued out proclamations in the affair of inclosures, against the mind of the whole council.

"VI. That he had not taken care to suppress the late insurrections, but had even supported and encouraged them.

"VII. That he had occasioned the loss of the forts in the territory of Boulogne, by neglecting to furnish them with provision and ammunition.

"VIII. That he had endeavoured to instil into the king a bad opinion of his counsellors, by persuading him they intended to destroy him; and had even ordered some persons to put the king continually in mind of it, lest he should forget it.

"IX. That he had caused the lords of the council to be proclaimed traitors.

"X. That he had maliciously not only put the king in great fear, by carrying him so suddenly to Windsor, but cast him into a dangerous disease.

"XI. That he had armed himself and servants, and left the king's servants unarmed; and that he intended to fly to Jersey or Guernsey."

The duke not being prepared with an answer, was remanded back to the Tower, and the king was the same day carried back to Hampton-court; the marquis of Northampton, the earls of Warwick and Southampton, with the lords St. John, Russel, and Wentworth, being appointed governors of his person, while the principal administration of the government was tacitly deposited in the hands of the earl of Warwick, without any title that might give him a particular authority. In the mean time a revocation was published, by letters patent, of the authority of the governor of the king's person and protector of the realm, granted to the duke of Somerset: the cause of this revocation was expressed to be, "because of the ill government, rule, and direction of the king's person, whereby it was brought into great danger; the subjects, by civil dissention, much annoyed; the laws subverted, and the king's realms brought into peril of utter ruin." But all the arts of the earl of Warwick, and his other enemies, could not bring the wiser and the well-meaning part of the council to believe the duke guilty of any thing that was intentionally bad against the king or the constitution: they indeed thought him too obnoxious to the landed interest of England, to continue longer at the head of affairs, and therefore willingly engaged in measures that were taken for removing him, as well as for excluding him from ever returning to the same.

The disgrace of the protector-duke, and the change in the administration filled the papists with the most pleasing hopes, on the presumption that the earl of Warwick, whose religious principles were those of the popish communion, would restore the ancient faith and mode of worship; but herein they were miserably mistaken, for Warwick had no religion but ambition, and, finding the king had imbibed a strong attachment to the protestant doctrines, he was resolved to humour his inclinations, and not to run the risque of losing his point (which was to succeed Somerset in his title and power) by any violent measures. With this view he publicly declared his intention to promote the reformation; and he threw such discouragements on Southampton (who thought, by his interest, to have recovered the great seal, and) who was the chief support of the Romanists, and regarded by Warwick as a dangerous rival, that he withdrew from court, and soon after died of chagrin. Several other changes were also made, all tending to shew the popish party that they were to expect no merit from their being instrumental in the downfall of the duke of Somerset. The earl of Warwick was made lord high-admiral of England, which office had been vacant ever since the execution of Seymour, the protector's brother; the lord St. John was created earl of Wiltshire, and made treasurer in the room of the duke of Somerset; Wootton was made secretary of state in the room of secretary Smith; and Bonner, bishop of London, was committed to the Marshalsea, for refusing to comply with the late alterations and amendments made in the rites of the English church: and an attempt was made to oblige the princess Mary to dismiss certain priests she kept to celebrate mass in her house, and to conform herself to the new-established liturgy; but the princess having gotten the emperor to intercede powerfully, that she might be indulged in these respects, the court who did not chuse to offend him at this juncture, winked at her conduct, and a stop was put to some proceedings that had been actually begun against her upon this head.

On the fourteenth of November the parliament sat, agreeable to its prorogation in the beginning of the year. It was the same parliament that had been called together by the duke of Somerset, and which had been so pliable to his will. We meet with but few acts of civil import passed in this session: among the private acts, there was one for restoring Mary, daughter of the late lord-admiral Seymour, to her blood; and another for pardoning Sharrington, who had been concerned with that nobleman in several dangerous and infamous practices.

On the twenty-third of December, the late protector-duke of Somerset was brought to subscribe the articles against himself, and to petition the lords for their intercession for the king's pardon to himself and family: this being read in the house of lords, it was looked upon as so abject a step, that they could not help suspecting it had been extorted from him, and therefore four temporal lords and as many bishops were deputed to know the truth from the duke's own mouth, who reported from him, that he had voluntarily signed the confession. Upon this a bill was brought into parliament against him, upon the articles above-recited, and his signed confession was urged as a proof of the charge: the bill went through the house; the duke was turned out of all his places, he was stripped of all his goods, and fined in two thousand pounds a year in lands. That we may finish the period of this great man's fall, we shall observe, that, on the sixth of February following, he was set at liberty from the Tower, but confined to live within four miles of his own house at Sion; nor was he to come to court or council, without being summoned: and for the performance of all this, he was obliged to give bond for ten thousand pounds; after which he received the king's full pardon for all treasons, offences, misdemeanors, &c.

After this the parliament, which was truly protestant, to stem the current that was likely to run through the nation in favour of popery, upon the disgrace of the duke of Somerset, thought proper to take such measures as might guard the infant church from any attacks: thus we find they confirmed the new Liturgy; ordered all the prayers to saints to be struck out of the primers published by the late king, and all missals, breviaries, &c. to be delivered up to such persons as should be appointed for that purpose; and commanded that they who had preserved any images taken out of churches, should burn or deface them by a day fixed: they then granted the king a subsidy, after which they were prorogued, on the first of February. It was during this session that the eldest sons of peers were first permitted to sit in the house of commons, in the person of sir Francis Russell, who, by the death of his brother, becoming heir-apparent to the lord Russell, it was carried, after a debate, that he should abide in the house as he was before: so it is entered in the original journal of the house of commons, which is the first journal that was ever taken in that house*.

On the second of February, 1550, the day after the rising of the parliament, William Parr, marquis of Northampton, was made lord high-chamberlain of England; the lord Wentworth, lord chamberlain of the household; sir Thomas Dacre, vice-chamberlain and captain of the king's guard; and sir Anthony Wingfield, comptroller†.

The beginning of the year 1550 was taken up in negotiations for a peace between France and England; for, notwithstanding the violent clamours which Warwick and his party had raised against the administration of Somerset, they found themselves obliged, now that they were invested with the supreme authority, to pursue the same, or rather worse measures than that nobleman had adopted; but as Warwick had particularly signalled himself against the proposal for giving up Boulogne, he was forced to contrive to have it delivered up in such a manner, that it might appear to be the act of the council, without himself being liable to the imputations he had so lavishly cast upon another on the same occasion. For this end he employed one Guidotti, an Italian merchant of Southampton, to engage the French ministry to propose a treaty, upon assurances that they might obtain Boulogne, upon which their king had so much set his heart.

The artful Italian performed his commission so well, that he prevailed on the French court to offer to make peace upon equitable terms, and to give a sum of money in consideration of the redelivery of Boulogne; which proposal being laid before the English council, then entirely under the influence of Warwick, it was resolved to send plenipotentiaries to treat with those of France, at a certain place in Picardy. Monsieur de la Rochepot, of the house of Montmorency, Gaspar de Coligny, afterwards the famous admiral de Coligny, and two more, were appointed by France; and the court of England made choice of Paget, lately created baron of Beaufort, the lord Russell, secretary Petre, and sir John Mason: and in such a hurry were the new ministry to have a peace at any rate, that by the end of February the treaty was concluded, the English being obliged to give up many of their strongest demands. The terms of the treaty were as follow.

“ I. All claims of either party to stand as they were. That the acts of private persons, if not unpunished by the masters, should not affect the peace: that there should be on both sides a general release of prisoners, and commerce between the two crowns restored, and all ships of war to be recalled on either side.

“ II. Boulogne, with the new conquests, to be restored to the French, with all the ordnance in it, which had belonged to the French, and that within six months.

“ III. The French to pay four hundred thousand crowns, each crown six shillings and eight pence (or one hundred and thirty-three thousand three hundred and thirty three pounds six shillings and eight pence sterling), for the charges and expence the English had been at upon the place; one half upon the delivery, the other six months after; and either side to give six hostages for due performance.

“ IV. That the forts of Douglas and Lauder, built by the English, with all the cannon, &c. be delivered to the Scots, except the cannon that was brought from Haddington: but if these two forts be not in the hands of the English in the event, the king of England shall be obliged to demolish the towns and castle of Roxburgh and Eymouth; nor shall it be lawful for the English, French, or Scots to rebuild them.

“ V. Though the king of England shall restore Douglas and Lauder, yet he shall demolish Roxburgh and Eymouth, provided the queen of Scotland do the same with the castles of Douglas and Lauder; in which case it shall not be lawful for the sovereigns of France, Scotland, or England, nor their successors, ever to rebuild Roxburgh or Eymouth.

“ VI. The kingdom of Scotland shall be comprehended in this peace; and the English must not invade Scotland without a new and just offence given; and the queen of Scotland is obliged, within forty days after the date of this treaty, to certify to the king of England, under her great seal, that she accepts the said comprehension.”

Thus, says Mr. de Rapin, all the pains taken by Henry VIII. to secure a pension, or rather a tribute, in lieu of the title he pretended to have to the crown of France, were rendered fruitless by this treaty, which contained in favour of England only one indeterminate reservation of the claim, which had occasioned the effusion of much blood since the reign of Edward III. There remains to the kings of England only the empty title of king of France; none of Edward VI's successors having ever seriously thought of prosecuting their pretended right. This treaty, signed on the twenty-fourth of March, was duly executed by the contracting parties; and Boulogne being delivered on the twenty-fifth of April, lord Clinton, the governor, was made high-admiral, the arrears of the garrison were paid, the foreign soldiers dismissed, and the English well rewarded for their gallant defence: Guidotti had a present of a thousand crowns, with a pension of the same value for life to himself, and two hundred and fifty to his son, for the pains he had taken in accomplishing the treaty. It doth not appear whether mention was made therein of a match between Edward and the French king's eldest daughter Elizabeth, which Henry offered the English monarch as a sort of amends for disappointing him of the queen of Scotland; but it became next year a serious affair. It seems, that when the treaty was brought to London to be ratified, the earl of Warwick feigned sickness, not to be obliged to sign a peace he had so much exclaimed against; but this was only to impose on the public, since it is notorious that he signed all the orders and instructions, in virtue whereof the plenipotentiaries had concluded it.

Great were the rejoicings ordered by the government for the celebration of this peace, but the nation in general was far from being pleased with it; the restitution of Boulogne, the proposal of which had been made such a fault in the duke of Somerset, opened the eyes of the people, who began to be sensible that the king's glory and the good of the state are but too often made use of by those at the helm to cover their own private schemes, without any regard to the public welfare. The murmurs on this occasion soon reached the ears of the attentive and politic Warwick, who, to divert any bad consequences that the public resentment might bring against the administration, undertook the popular office of enquiring into certain misdemeanors of those who had been entrusted with the management of the public money, many of whom he brought to a severe account. He also thought it necessary to make all the friends and well-wishers of the duke of Somerset easy, rather than to provoke them; the lord Russell was made earl of Bedford; Cecil had a promise to be made secretary of state; the duke of Somerset had hopes given him of being restored to his seat in the council; and, as a mark of sincere reconciliation, Warwick's son, the the lord Lisle, was contracted to a daughter of the duke's, and several of that nobleman's friends, who had been imprisoned on his account, were discharged upon their own recognizances. All the church-preferments at this time went likewise in the channel of the reformation, as we shall have occasion to observe elsewhere.

This year the famous Polydore Virgil, an Italian, who had been now forty years in England, had leave to go and spend the residue of his days in his own country, the king at the same time permitting him to enjoy his preferments here (viz. the arch-deaconry of Wells and a prebend of Hereford), in consideration of his having employed the best part of his life in writing an history of England.

This year likewise the city of London purchased of the king all the liberties of the borough of Southwark, for the sum of one thousand marks.

Little more remains of a domestic nature, deserving the notice of this part of our history for the year 1550: however, before we proceed to the next, it will not be improper to mention what had passed in foreign countries, connected with this kingdom.

Paul III. dying on the thirteenth of November, 1549, the cardinals, who entered the conclave the twenty-ninth of the same month, agreed in a few days to raise cardinal Pole to the papal throne, and even came in the night to his chamber to adore him, according to custom; but he desired them to defer the ceremony till it was day, telling them it ought not to be a work of darkness. This scruple, unheard of till then, seemed to them so extraordinary, that some imputed it to stupidity; others were afraid, if Pole was pope, he would reform the court of Rome, and the college of cardinals in particular; however this might be, from that moment they thought of electing another pope. After which, being divided into three factions, they could not agree upon the person till the February following, when they chose the cardinal de Monte, who took the name of Julius III. He gave a strange omen of what advancements he intended to make, when he gave his own hat (according to the custom of the popes, who bestow their hats before they go out of the conclave) on a mean servant of his, who had the charge of his money; and being asked, what he saw in him to make him a cardinal? He answered, as much as the cardinals had seen in him, to make him pope. But it was commonly said, that the secret of this promotion was an unnatural affection to him*.

In Germany, the emperor, having opened the diet of the empire about the end of July, would have obliged all the protestants to submit to the determinations of the council, now removed back to Trent. Maurice, elector of Saxony, strongly opposed it, but with so much caution and regard to the emperor, that he did not lose his favour; on the contrary, the emperor agreed that the diet should declare him general of the army of the empire, to end the war by the siege of Magdeburg, the only protestant town which yet held out. Maurice had great designs which the emperor knew not, till it was too late to hinder the execution.

Scotland enjoyed great tranquility after the conclusion of the peace. James Hamilton, earl of Arran, in Scotland, and duke of Chatelereault, in France, still governed the kingdom as regent; but he was himself governed by the archbishop of St. Andrew's, his natural brother, a man of a very lewd and infamous life. Let us return now to England, and see what passed during the year 1551.

As soon as the king found himself disembarassed from the war in Scotland, by that kingdom being included in the late peace with France, and that all foreign alarms were at an end, he followed the dictates of archbishop Cranmer, to promote the great work of reformation; and as the earl of Warwick was determined to preserve the king's favour, he appeared very forward in assisting therein. On the twenty-eighth of January a commission passed, for certain bishops, laity, and clergy, to enquire after, repress, and extirpate the errors of the anabaptists, libertines, and heretics. On the thirteenth of February, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and Bonner, bishop of London, were deprived of their sees for attempting to obstruct the reformation; as were likewise Day, bishop of Chichester, Heath, bishop of Worcester, and Vessy, bishop of Exeter; who, though they had ever complied with the new doctrine in some particulars, were yet unwilling to embrace it in its full extent, and were known to have a strong attachment to the old superstition, and had even done their utmost to restore it. By these severe, but necessary, proceedings, the whole nation was soon brought to an uniformity of worship.

The princess Mary alone continued to adhere to the mass, and to reject the new liturgy: several attempts were made, both by the king and council, to persuade her to embrace the principles of the reformation, but to no purpose, she persisting in her declaration of abiding by the religion of her forefathers. This subjected her to several mortifications, and she was at length so apprehensive of the effects of her brother's displeasure, that she actually resolved to quit the kingdom, and had even concerted a scheme for that purpose with the governante of the Low Countries; but her design was discovered, and measures taken to prevent its execution. Her obstinacy greatly incensed the king, who had conceived an inveterate aversion to the errors of popery, and, in all probability, gave occasion to the earl of Warwick's scheme to exclude her from the succession, by setting up the lady Jane Grey upon the English throne at the demise of Edward, as will be more particularly related hereafter.

In April this year, the kingdom was visited with the sweating sickness. It first began at Shrewsbury, and spread towards the North, continuing till the month of October. Whoever was seized with it, died or recovered within ten hours; if the patient took cold, death ensued in less than three; if he slept, he expired raving mad within six: and this pestilence raged chiefly amongst young men of robust constitutions: and as it did not affect foreigners in England, so it spread amongst the English alone residing in foreign countries. This sickness carried off several of the nobility also, amongst whom was the duke of Suffolk, son of Charles Brandon by his second wife; as also, four days after him, his brother, who had succeeded him, by which means the title of Suffolk became extinct in the family of Brandon, which was next in succession to the crown, after the two daughters of Henry VIII. The earl of Warwick, who had already formed a design upon the crown in favour of his own family, caused Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset to be created duke of Suffolk, and himself duke of Northumberland, a title then also extinct by the death of Henry Piercy, the last earl of Northumberland: and he promoted his intimate friends, William Pawlet, lord St. John and earl of Wiltshire, lord high-treasurer, to the dignity of marquis of Winchester, and sir William Herbert was created earl of Pembroke: at the same time William Cecil was made secretary of state, and knighted; and sir Robert Dudley, one of the duke of Northumberland's sons (the same who was afterwards the great earl of Leicester), was sworn one of the six ordinary gentlemen of the king's chamber, which perhaps (says sir Richard Baker, in his Chronicle) had better never been, for after his coming into a place so near about him, the king enjoyed his health but a short time: and indeed, by Warwick's forming his projects for the advancement of his family so early, it looked as if he knew that the king had not long to live.

Soon after these promotions, the marquis of Northampton, the bishop of Ely, and some other persons of distinction, to the number of twenty-six, were sent in embassy to the court of France, to carry over to Henry the order of the Garter, and to desire, in Edward's name, that commissioners might be appointed, on the part of France, to treat of some matters of high importance which they had in charge: hereupon the cardinal of Lorraine, the duke of Guise, and admiral Chatillon, were appointed to confer with the English ambassadors, who opened the conference by demanding that the young queen of Scots might be sent over to England, in order to perfect the marriage between king Edward and her; but to this the French answered, that this could not be, it having been long since determined that the young queen should espouse the dauphin of France. Then the English proposed a marriage between Edward and the lady Elizabeth, the French king's eldest daughter, which proposal was very cordially received by the French commissioners; but when they came to treat of the portion to be given with the lady, the English demanded at first a million and half of crowns, then fell to fourteen, and at last to eight hundred thousand. The French, on their part offered at first one hundred thousand crowns, then rose to two hundred thousand, and higher they would not go, alleging it was more than had been given with a daughter of France. Upon this the conferences were broke up: however, Henry returned his brother of England's compliment, by sending the marshal de Montmorency, at the head of a splendid embassy, with the order of St. Michael to Edward. After this the affair of the marriage was again resumed, the two hundred thousand crowns were at last accepted, and the treaty of alliance and marriage actually signed at Angers; but the death of Edward happening before the princess Elizabeth was of age, prevented the consummation of their nuptials.

During these transactions, the queen dowager, who had been on a visit to her daughter and her own relations at the court of France, took England in her way back to Scotland, having obtained a safe-conduct from Edward, and landing at Port-mouth, was there met by several of the English nobility, who conducted her to London, where she took up her lodgings in the bishop's palace: after a stay of near a week, during which time she was magnificently entertained by Edward at Whitehall, she departed, being attended by the sheriffs of all the counties, till she arrived on the borders of Scotland. One Stuart, a Scotchman, being apprehended in England about the latter end of the summer, on a charge for intending to poison the young queen of Scots, was imprisoned, and afterwards sent over to France, to be there dealt with according to justice. This summer likewise a treaty was set on foot for the marriage of the princess Elizabeth, the king's youngest sister, with the king of Denmark's eldest son; but the negociation was rendered fruitless by the lady's positively declaring she would not entertain thoughts of marriage with any one.

Very many excellent regulations were, in the course of this summer, set on foot for the furtherance of commerce, the meliorating the coin, and other purposes of national import: but all these useful schemes were likely to be interrupted, if not entirely defeated, by the civil commotions arising from the unbounded ambition of the earl of Warwick, now duke of Northumberland, who considered all increase of titles or possessions, either to himself or his adherents, only as steps to farther acquisitions; and finding that the duke of Somerset, though deprived of his dignity, and even lessened in the public opinion by his late pusillanimous conduct, still possessed a considerable degree of popularity, he resolved to ruin a man whom he regarded as the chief obstacle to the accomplishment of his towering projects.

The alliance which had been so lately concluded between their families, had not been productive of any cordial union, and only afforded Northumberland the means of effecting with more ease the destruction of his rival. He began his infamous design by alienating the affections of the young king from his uncle, whom he represented as a most dangerous subject: he caused a report to be spread abroad, that the duke of Somerset had caused himself to be proclaimed king in several counties, and that he was endeavouring to raise an armed force in order to possess himself of the king's person. His doors were watched, and notice given of all that went in or out; new insults were every day offered him, in order to drive him into action. Thus beset, the unwary Somerset often let fall some menacing expressions against Northumberland; sometimes he formed the rash design of washing out the indignities offered him in the blood of his persecutor; and at others resolved to wait with patience till the king, being of age, should be able to do him justice.

In the mean time his treacherous confidants, who had been placed as spies about him by Northumberland, informed his enemy of every passionate word which he uttered; they discovered the projects which they themselves had suggested to him; and all this being made known to the king, who too readily believed the infamous tale, he abandoned his unfortunate uncle, and agreed to a motion which Northumberland made, to have him put under arrest.

Accordingly, on the seventeenth of October, at night, the duke of Somerset, the lord Grey, David and and John Seymour, Hammond and Newdigate, two of the duke's servants, sir Ralph Vane, and sir Thomas Palmer, were apprehended and committed to prison: next day the duchess of Somerset, with her favourites, Crane and his wife, sir Miles Partridge, sir Michael Stanhope, Bannister, and others, were taken into custody. Sir Thomas Palmer, who had all along acted the part of a spy upon the unfortunate duke, charged him, upon oath, with a design "to excite a rebellion in the North; to attack the horse-guards on a muster-day; to take possession of the Tower; and to raise an insurrection in London." But the accusation which seemed to be best founded was, that Somerset had formed a project to murder the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, at an entertainment which was to be made for them at lord Paget's. Crane and his wife corroborated Palmer's evidence with regard to this last design; and it appears that some rash scheme of that nature had been proposed, though no regular plot had been formed, nor any measures taken for its execution; and Hammond acknowledged that the duke had armed men to guard him one night in his house at Greenwich.

Upon these depositions, the duke was brought to his trial before his peers in Westminster-hall, on the first day of December. He pleaded, "Not guilty," and desired he might be confronted with his accusers: but the measure he had given to his own brother was now returned into his breast; he was denied this reasonable request, and the court proceeded to trial, when the duke was acquitted of treason, but condemned to death for felony, on a statute passed in the reign of Henry VII. declaring it felony for any person to harbour the thought of killing a privy-counsellor. And here we must observe, that among the peers who constituted his jury were Northumberland, Northampton, and Pembroke, whom decency as well as justice should have restrained from sitting as judges on the trial of a man, against whom they had declared an open enmity: add to this, that the marquis of Winchester, another of his severe enemies, was appointed high steward on the occasion.

After the court had passed sentence, the duke fell on his knees, thanked them for the fair and open trial they had given him, and asked pardon of the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, &c. for the enmity he bore them; but plainly declared that he never intended the least act of rebellion against the crown or person of the king his nephew. The people, who sincerely loved the duke of Somerset, hearing the first part of his sentence, by which he was declared "Not guilty of the treason," and seeing the axe thereupon turned from him, (because he was condemned to be hanged), imagined he had been entirely acquitted, and manifested their joy by repeated shouts and acclamations, which was soon converted into sorrow when they were fully informed of his doom.

We are now to attend the duke of Somerset from the prison to the block. From the time that he received sentence his behaviour was calm, resigned, and unaffected: he employed himself in reading and composing exercises of devotion. He made decent applications to the king for favour to his wife and family; and on the twenty-second of January, 1552, he was brought to the scaffold on Tower-hill, where he was to suffer. He was attended by Dr. Cox; and, after performing some devotions, he addressed himself in a speech to the people, in which he declared his innocence towards the king, and his fidelity towards his country, both in words and deeds: he submitted to his sentence because it was awarded by the law: he professed his zeal and affection for the protestant religion, and a great satisfaction in what he had done to promote it.

When he had proceeded thus far in his speech, a kind of panic all at once seized the people. Great precautions had been taken by the council for keeping the citizens of London within doors, until the execution should be over; and its hour, which was seven in the morning, was so carefully kept a secret, that some of the inhabitants of the Tower Hamlets were not sufficiently apprized of it, though it was their turn of duty to have assisted in guarding the scaffold at the time of execution: when they heard that the duke was brought out, they came in great confusion towards Tower-hill; and in pressing through a postern-gate, through which they were to pass, the confusion increased so much, that the spectators at the execution were seized with a sudden panic, as thinking some dreadful event to be at hand. Upon this every man began to shift for himself, and in the hurry several fell into Tower-ditch, and some were hurt otherwise. During the consternation, which was increased by still seeing the people running up to the scaffold, with arms in their hands, sir Anthony Brown came up on horseback, through curiosity probably; but the few who remained about the scaffold imagined he brought a pardon, and the air was filled with a general cry of "God save the king!" By this time the tumult somewhat abated, the guards took their posts, and the people recovered from their fright: Brown declared he brought no pardon, and a mournful silence ensued. The duke, who well knew that his fate was determined, remained all this time unmoved upon the scaffold; but by his actions endeavoured to appease the tumult, and then proceeded in his speech.

He professed all kind of regard for the person of the king; he exhorted the people to obedience, both to him and the council; he begged they would compose themselves until he had received the penalty of the law; he declared that he died in peace with all mankind; he asked pardon of all whom he had offended; and besought the prayers of all present.

Having finished his speech, he adjusted himself with the utmost calmness to the block, on which he received the blow which finished his life.

Sir Ralph Vane, a brave old soldier, and sir Miles Partridge, were hanged; and sir Michael Stanhope with sir Thomas Arundel beheaded, as the duke's confederates: they all died as Christians, but denying to the last the crimes for which they were suffered. Arundel, Stanhope, and Partridge, seem to have died protestants, for there is an order in the council-book, dated the eleventh of February, for allowing them three protestant divines to attend them in their last moments. The lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy of Somerset, and known to be in the interest of the duke, was, on some frivolous pretence, tried in the Star Chamber, and condemned in a fine of six thousand pounds, with the loss of his office: to render his punishment the more severe, he was degraded from the order of the Garter, being deemed unworthy to enjoy that honour, on account of the meanness of his birth. Lord Rich, chancellor of the kingdom, was also deprived of his office, for having sent a letter to Somerset, warning him of the designs of the council: and it is remarkable that this lord, though a peer, and one of the highest officers of the state, was not summoned to sit upon the trial. The seals were given to Goodrich, bishop of Ely, with the title of lord-keeper.

The day after the execution of Somerset (January 23), the king convoked a parliament, in which several laws were enacted, as well of a civil as of a religious nature. A bill was brought in and passed, for authorizing a new Common Prayer Book, according to the alterations which had been agreed upon last year. Another act was made for the people's more regularly frequenting divine service. Another bill passed, concerning treason; and to this bill the commons annexed a clause, which was of infinitely more consequence than the bill itself, viz. "That none should be attainted of treason on this act, unless two witnesses should come and to their face aver the fact for which they were to be tried, except such as should make a voluntary confession; and that none should be questioned (i. e. sued) for any thing said or written (against the king or government) but within three months after it was done*." This equitable and constitutional bill was strongly opposed by all Northumberland's faction, as it carried on the face of it a direct condemnation of their late proceedings in the case of the unhappy duke of Somerset: but, notwithstanding all their arts, the bill passed both houses, and has remained ever since one of the chief bulwarks of English liberty.

In this parliament the case of Tonsal, bishop of Durham, made a great noise: he was one of the most eminent prelates of the age, as well on account of his learning and abilities, as of the unblemished integrity of his life and manners. Though he had opposed, by his vote and influence, all the late innovations in religion, yet they were no sooner passed into laws than he had always submitted, and conformed himself to every system of doctrine which was established by authority: but not all his obedient and tractable conduct, or the unimpeached rectitude of his life and morals, could secure him against the rapacious Northumberland, who, having fixed his eyes on the rich revenues of the see of Durham, determined to get it into his hands, and to erect to himself a principality in the northern counties. To effect this scheme it was necessary to deprive Tonsal of his see.

With this view he caused a bill to be brought into the house of lords, charging that prelate with misprision of treason, in having neglected to give information of a design for raising a rebellion in the North, in the year 1548, which had been communicated to him. Northumberland had interest enough to carry the bill through two readings in the house of peers; but when it was sent down to the commons, they insisted that witnesses should be examined; that the bishop should be confronted with his accusers, and be permitted to speak in his own defence: and that not being complied with, the bill was dropped. Nor was this the only mortification Northumberland met with from this parliament; for a bill ratifying the attainder of the duke of Somerset and his confederates was likewise thrown out by the commons, though it had passed the upper house: the minister therefore determined to part with this parliament, and get one to his mind; accordingly it was dissolved on the fifteenth of April, after having sat near four years. Just before the breaking up of the session, Northumberland procured the vacant Garter, which had been Paget's, for his own son, the earl of Warwick.

The affairs of Scotland underwent some alterations this year: the queen-dowager, on her return home from France, persuaded Hamilton, earl of Arran, to resign the regency, agreeable to the desire of Henry II. and his ministers, who, to lure him into a compliance, granted him a patent, by which he was created duke of Chatelerault in France, with a pension to support that dignity: and the earl, sensible that he could not hold his office against their will, acquiesced in the proposal, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of his brother, the archbishop of St. Andrew's, against his resigning his dignity. The prelate then entered into a powerful league against the queen-regent; but she having had the address to promise the reformed a free exercise of their religion in their own houses, found herself so strengthened by their assistance, that she established herself in the government, in spite of the archbishop's attempts.

The revolution in the affairs of Germany, in the course of this year, was much more considerable. The emperor's detaining the landgrave of Hesse in prison, contrary to his word of honour given to Maurice, duke of Saxony, and the marquis John of Brandenburg, had extremely irritated those two princes; and neither they nor the other potentates and states of the empire could see with patience the liberties of Germany invaded, and the freedom of religion destroyed. There was no way of procuring redress of these grievances, but by force; and making a league with the king of France, they resolved to take this method, and made preparations for war with all possible secrecy. The emperor had entertained some suspicions of Maurice's designs, but was outdone by him in his own talent of dissimulation; this prince's apparent frankness, and the artful management of one of his chief counsellors, whom he knew to be in the emperor's pay, serving to dispel all his jealousy. Thus were matters carried on for some months, till Maurice and the marquis of Brandenburg, having on a sudden assembled their forces, came, on the first of April before Augsburg, and in two days time made themselves masters of that city. Then the confederates, seizing the passes of the Alps, to stop the march of foreign troops into Germany, forced the pass de l'Ecluse; and their way thus being opened into Tirol, they advanced with so much diligence thither, that the emperor, who, in order to be near the council, had resided there for some months past, had only a few hours time to fly thence with his court into the mountains of Trente, and, after wandering there all night, got to Vistach, a town of Carinthia, on the borders of the Venetian territories.

He was still averse to an accommodation, in which his brother Ferdinand acted as mediator; but the king of France having at the same time advanced into Lorraine, with a strong army, and declaring that his only design was to assert the liberties of Germany, which the emperor meant to enslave, found admittance into the cities of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and advanced as far as Strasburgh. Charles V. seeing no remedy, was obliged to enter into a treaty. The confederates hereupon put a stop to the king of France's farther advance into the empire: but this prince, though he complied with their request, yet, not caring to lose so fine an opportunity for conquest, fell with an army into the county of Luxemburg, took Damvillers and Stenay, and invested Ifoy. This progress of the French determined the emperor to submit to the necessity of his affairs, and consent to the famous pacification made at Passau, in the beginning of August. The chief conditions were, "That a diet should be assembled in six months, to consider the most easy and proper means for appeasing all disputes about religion, for which an equal number of pious, prudent, and pacific persons on both sides should be chosen: that, in the mean time the emperor, nor any other person, should force the conscience, or put a constraint upon the will, of any body, in point of religion; nor, by any act of violence, or under pretence of instruction, do any thing to the prejudice or slight of any person whatsoever on the subject; but suffer all the world to live in peace and tranquility: that the princes of the Augsburg Confession should not molest the Romish ecclesiastics or seculars, but let them enjoy their estates and revenues, and exercise their jurisdictions and ceremonies: that the Imperial chamber should do justice to all, without regarding their religion; and the protestants, having in it the number of seats belonging to them, should, as well as the parties who had suits in the court, be at liberty to swear by "God and the saints," or by "God and the gospels," at their option: and, in fine, that if they could come to no agreement in articles of religion, this agreement should still continue for ever in its full force and vigour." Thus was the Interim, which had been executed only in very few places, entirely annulled; the landgrave of Hesse was set at liberty, as John Frederick, the deprived elector of Saxony, had been a little before; and all differences with the emperor in Germany were terminated.

This prince had still a war on his hands with France, and applied to the court of England, pursuant to his treaty with Henry VIII. A. D. 1542, for a succour of five thousand foot, or seven hundred crowns a day for four months, and for a declaration of war against France, within a month after making the request, according to the articles of that treaty, in case the Low Countries, in which Luxemburg was deemed a province, was invaded. It was not proper for a king, during his minority, to be involved in an expensive war, or to break with the crown of France after an amity so lately contracted and sworn on both sides; and the Imperial minister was told, "That Edward was not bound by his father's treaty against the interest of the realm; that the emperor, being pressed to a new treaty, had declined the overture; that he had not performed the articles of that in question, stopping the horses, arms, and ammunition which the king had provided in the Low Countries for his late war with France; and not sending him succours against the French ravages about Calais, so that Edward was under no obligation to comply with his demands, though he was willing to assist him against the Turks, and ready to use his good offices for a peace with France, in quality of a mediator." Of all the powers in Europe, the king had certainly the most reason to be jealous of the emperor, whose projects for getting the princess Mary out of England were not calculated for his advantage, or for furthering his designs of a reformation in his dominions, for the better carrying on of which it was very convenient that he should have no disputes with any of his neighbours; and accordingly those debatable lands on the borders of Scotland, were settled on the twenty-fourth of September, by the lords Wharton and Conyers, sir Thomas Wharton, and sir Thomas Chaloner, in conjunction with the Scottish commissioners.

Thus, at peace with all the world, he was not diverted from attending to the work he had most at heart, and caused the Common Prayer to be translated into the French language, for the use of the inhabitants of the isles of Jersey and Guernsey. It was probably not so easy to find proper persons capable of translating it either into the Welsh or Irish languages, so that it did not appear in the former till the fifth of queen Elizabeth; and if it hath not been translated since into the latter language, it had been chiefly owing to the power which the Romish priests had over the ignorant, and consequently bigotted, people, for whose use it must have been intended, who would never suffer a book to remain in their hands, so useful for their instruction, and so proper to bring them to a conformity in religious worship.

The acts for abolishing the papal supremacy and asserting the regal, for suppressing monasteries, levying the twentieth of ecclesiastical preferments, and appointing the order of consecrating bishops, with some other of the late king's regulations, had passed in the parliament of Ireland; but the council of England did not think it prudent, during Edward's minority, to push matters farther among a people so tenaciously addicted to the superstitions of the church of Rome, and of a nature not so tractable as the English: their chief concern was to keep that realm quiet; with the additional force of four hundred men they attained their end to a surprising degree, there not being the least disturbance there during all this reign; a strong argument of the prudence, integrity, care, and vigilance of those entrusted with the government. Notwithstanding this extraordinary precaution, the English liturgy was carried over thither, and, without any law of their own parliament to impose it, was used in most churches of the English plantations. John Bale was made bishop of Offory; Goodacre, primate of Armagh; and other vacant sees filled with persons zealous for the reformation, which gained ground continually among the English, though, for want of instructors, the Irish septa remained in their wonted ignorance.

It was likewise about this time that Thomas Sternhold, a groom of the privy-chamber, translated some of the Psalms into a barbarous English metre, and the rest being soon after put into verse by John Hopkins and others, in imitation of what had been done abroad by Clement Marot and Theodore Beza, people, fond of foreign customs, especially of the Geneva fashion, began to sing them in their private houses: the practice spreading from thence thence to the churches, they sang them there, without any authority or licence, before and after the liturgy and sermon; so that not interfering with the established worship, it grew into a custom by connivance, and hath continued ever since, without any express allowance.

About this time the corporation of German merchants, who lived in the Steel-yard, was dissolved, because it was become detrimental to England, by engrossing the whole woollen trade. The regent of Flanders and the city of Hamburgh earnestly solicited to have the company restored, but it was to no purpose. The court also set on foot a project for the advancement of the trade of England, by opening the two ports of Hull and Southampton, as free ports: but the execution of this project was defeated by the king's death.

In the course of this year three great ships were fitted out, at the king's charge, for discovering a passage to the East Indies by the north seas: the chief pilot and director in this voyage was Sebastian Cabot. These ships sailed as far north as the confines of Russia; but they lost their commander, sir Hugh Willoughby, who, with all his ship's crew, were frozen to death.

On the twenty-fourth of April this year, sir Andrew Dudley and the earl of Westmoreland were elected knights companions of the order of St. George. Some time before this, Edward had felt some scruples in countenancing this order upon the legendary footing on which it then stood, and at last resolved entirely to alter it. A commission had been accordingly issued to the duke of Somerset, and some other noblemen, for that effect; and, after mature deliberation, the popish story of St. George was totally erased from the jewels and institution of the order; and it was appointed that, instead of a George, the jewel pendant to the collar should contain the figure of a knight, carrying a book upon the point of a sword; the book to be intitled "VERBUM DEI (the word of God)," the sword, "PROTECTIO (protection)." Some other stiff doctrinal alterations took place: and bishop Burnet has, amongst Edward's remains, published a paper, containing the whole. But those alterations were disused under queen Mary, and the old forms took place and still continue.

The king had been at no extraordinary expence since the treaty of Boulogne, and had received four hundred thousand crowns for the restoring of that place; and the companies of London had paid him twenty thousand pounds by way of composition for the annuities charged upon their lands by donors thereof, to defray the charges of their obits, and the chantries they had endowed: immense treasure had been brought into his Exchequer, by the spoil of images and shrines, and the sale of lands belonging to chantries, colleges, and free chapels; yet he was plunged in a debt of two hundred and fifty-one thousand pounds; which he was the less able to discharge, because the old revenue arising from the crown-lands had been much impaired since his accession. In this situation it was thought proper to reduce the expences of his household, by suppressing the tables that used to be kept for young noblemen, the masters of requests, the serjeants at arms, and others; and to call such officers to account as had either fraudulently gotten any of his lands, or diverted any of his money to their private uses. John Beaumont, master of the Rolls, was convicted of having defrauded the king to the amount of twenty thousand pounds, besides other crimes; and, confessing his guilt, forfeited all his offices, goods, and estate; but very little to the king's benefit, all his lands being immediately granted to the earl of Huntingdon, whose eldest son Henry, lord Hastings, was on the point of being married to Catherine, the duke of Northumberland's daughter. Whatley, one of the receivers for Yorkshire, was fined two thousand pounds, and deprived of his office; he fared the worse probably because he had been a zealous partizan of the late duke of Somerset, the prosecutions chiefly falling upon such as lay under that imputation. It was not, perhaps, mere resentment that put Northumberland upon exercising these severities; his business was to force them by terror to be subservient to his purposes, and particularly in the choice of a new parliament, that would be more compliant than the last was with his measures; a point in which he got the king to interpose by letters to the sheriffs, recommending particular persons by name, all courtiers, to be chosen for certain counties.

The new parliament, thus modelled, met on the first of March, 1553, and, by their proceedings, gave evident proofs of their attachment to Northumberland. They gave the king a very considerable subsidy, with two tenths and two fifteenths, to be paid in two years. This act of benevolence was introduced by a long preamble, inveighing against the late duke of Somerset's administration and oppressions, &c. this was inserted by Northumberland, to let the king see how acceptable he and his party were, and how hateful the duke of Somerset had been. The house next proceeded to gratify Northumberland with an act for suppressing the bishopric of Durham, Tostal having been previously deprived, on the fourteenth of August the preceding year. The king immediately disposed of the said bishopric in this manner; he founded a bishopric at Durham, with a revenue of two thousand marks per annum; and another at Newcastle, with one thousand; and its temporalities, being erected into a county-palatine, were bestowed upon Northumberland; who, having got all that he wanted of the parliament, and having some designs that were not so proper for their notice, caused the two houses to be prorogued on the thirty-first of March, after sitting only one month.

Edward had, in the spring of the foregoing year, been seized with the measles, and then the small-pox, and had got very well over both these distempers; but in the beginning of this year he had been attacked by a very bad cough, which ended at last in a consumption. The original of this illness was imputed to his having over-heated himself in sports and exercises, during a progress that he had made in the preceding summer: but some, who pretended to have looked more narrowly into the matter, would have it, that they had observed a visible decay in his health from the time that sir Robert Dudley (one of Northumberland's sons) had been made one of the grooms of his chamber, and who was afterwards appointed his carver. It was hoped, however, that the king's youth, the approach of spring, and the medicines administered by his physicians, might by degrees get the better of his disorder; but it proved of too malignant a nature, and increased so fast, that when the parliament met in the beginning of March, the lords and commons commons were obliged to attend him at Whitehall, to hear the reasons of their being convened.

Every degree of decay in the king's health was a spur to Northumberland, who had for some time formed a design for raising his family to the throne upon Edward's decease. He suffered none but his own confidants to approach the royal person; he affected the most anxious concern for the young king's health and recovery; and by these hypocritical expressions of duty, he quickly got the first place in his affections as well as confidence.

The reader may remember, that Henry VII. had two daughters; the eldest married the king of Scotland; the younger, who was queen-dowager of France, married Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk; and both left issue: but Henry VIII. who was by act of parliament enabled to settle the succession to the crown, had entirely omitted all mention of the descendants from his sister the queen of Scotland, and, failing heirs of his own body, and their descendants, had limited the succession to the heirs of the lady Frances Brandon, daughter to his sister the queen-dowager of France, by her second husband, the duke of Suffolk, and wife to Grey, marquis of Dorset. The duke of Suffolk, by another wife, left two sons, who were youths of great expectation; but both of them dying of the sweating sickness, the marquis of Dorset, as we have already seen*, was created duke of Suffolk in right of his wife (Frances Brandon), who had borne him three daughters, the ladies Jane, Catherine, and Mary: thus the lady Jane Grey, the eldest of those daughters, stood next in the parliamentary right of succession by Henry VIII's will, to the crown, failing the issue of Henry, who were king Edward and the princesses Mary and Elizabeth: and Northumberland seeing that the king was fast approaching to his grave, resolved to put the project he had formed for the aggrandizement of his family into immediate execution.

With this view he prevailed on the new duke of Suffolk, who was a good-natured easy man, and owed his advancement (of which he was not a little fond) wholly to his interest, to consent to marry his daughter, the lady Jane Grey, to his (Northumberland's) fourth son, the lord Guildford Dudley; at the same time he so worked on the maternal tenderness of the duchess of Suffolk, the young lady's mother, that, though she stood in the order of succession before her daughter, she not only consented to give her the preference to herself, but also to give the same preference to any heirs male that might afterwards come of the said lady Jane's body. But Northumberland thought it proper to strengthen himself by other alliances, and therefore effected a match between the lady Catherine Grey, second daughter to Suffolk, and lord Herbert, eldest son to the earl of Pembroke; at the same time he bestowed his own daughter Catherine upon lord Hastings, eldest son to the earl of Huntingdon. These marriages were celebrated about the middle of May, this year, and with so great pomp and magnificence that the people, who hated the person and suspected the designs of Northumberland, could not forbear expressing in the warmest terms their indignation at seeing such public demonstrations of joy, while the health of their beloved sovereign was in such a languishing condition.

These previous steps taken, the crafty Northumberland prepared to put the finishing hand to the completion of his ambitious project, by persuading the dying king to alter the succession. For this purpose he took occasion to represent to Edward, whose youth and bodily infirmities made him easily susceptible of any impression, and whose zealous attachment to the protestant religion made him dread and express the most fatal consequences to its professors, should so bigotted a papist as his sister Mary ascend the throne, that the only way of preventing the misfortunes which threatened his people and the new religion, was by excluding the princess Mary from the succession, and transferring the crown to lady Jane Grey, a power with which he was invested equally with his father; he represented that the princess Elizabeth could not help sharing her sister's fate, because the only pretence they could use against Mary was her illegitimacy, and that equally affected Elizabeth, as the marriages of both their mothers had been declared unlawful by act of parliament.

This expedient was well relished by Edward; the interest of his religion was his prevailing care, which on this occasion surmounted every other consideration: he knew the lady Jane Grey to be a lady not more distinguished by the accomplishments of her person, than by the endowments of her mind, and that, moreover, she was strongly attached to the protestant religion, and every way worthy of a throne, and he therefore determined to leave her the crown; but it was necessary for his chief officers of state and his judges to sign his will.

On the eleventh of June, therefore, Montagu, the chief-justice of the Common Pleas, Baker and Bromley, two of the judges, the king's attorney and solicitor-general, attended the king and council, by order, when Edward gave them a scheme of what he designed concerning the succession, which he ordered them to extend and engross in a proper form. After some debate, they refused to comply with this order, alleging, that in framing such an act they should render themselves liable to the pains and penalties of high-treason, according to act of parliament. The duke of Northumberland was so incensed at their refusal, that he behaved in the most indecent manner, insomuch that the lawyers were afraid of his proceeding to some personal violence against them. Edward himself severely reprimanded them for their refractoriness: in a word, partly by threats, and partly by letters of pardon granted in their favour by anticipation, they were prevailed upon to draw up the act of conveyance, which was signed by all the other judges, except sir James Hales, who, though a friend to the Reformation even to a degree of enthusiasm, continued obstinately to refuse setting his hand thereto. Of the officers of state Cranmer alone opposed this scheme, and endeavoured to dissuade Edward from altering the succession: he alleged that his hand could not without perjury go to Edward's destination of the crown, because he had sworn to the observation of Henry's will: nevertheless this great man suffered his hand to belie his conscience; for, at Edward's earnest intreaty, and Northumberland's authoritative instances, he signed this unjust will.

It was remarked, that after this settlement was made, Edward's disease grew daily worse, and all hopes of his recovery vanished: to render the matter still worse, the physicians were discharged by Northumberland's advice, and he was committed to the care of an ignorant old woman, who engaged by her nostrums to restore the king in a short time to his former health and vigour. The consequence of which was what may easily be supposed; every bad symptom was inflamed; his cough increased, and the putrefaction of his lungs daily got ground, till at length he resigned his breath at Greenwich, on the sixth day of July, 1553, in the sixteenth year of his age, and after he had reigned six years, five months, and nine days. He died in the arms of sir Henry Sidney, son-in-law to the duke of Northumberland. It has been already observed, that Edward, before his death, acquired a character, which the most accurate and faithful historians have thus handed down to us.

King Edward was in his person beautiful, of a sweet aspect, and especially in his eyes, which seemed to have a starry liveliness and lustre in them. He kept a book, in which he wrote the characters of all the chief men of the nation, all the judges, lord lieutenants, and justices of the peace throughout England, marking down their way of living and their zeal for religion. He had studied the business of the mint, with the exchange and value of money: he also understood fortification, and designed well: he knew all the harbours and ports in his own dominions, as also in Scotland and France, with the depth of water, and way of coming into them. He had acquired so great knowledge in foreign affairs, that the ambassadors who were sent into England, published very extraordinary things of him in all the courts of Europe. He took notes of almost every thing he heard, which he first wrote in Greek characters, that those about him might not understand them; and afterwards copied out in the journal, or diary, that he kept: this journal, written with his own hand, is still preserved in sir John Cotton's famous library, from whence the learned bishop Burnet transcribed and published it, in his second volume of his History of the Reformation. In it the most considerable transactions in this reign are, perhaps, as well registered (says bishop Nicolson) by the young king himself, as by any other historian.

Hieronimus Cardanus, the famous Italian philosopher, as he passed through England, waited on young Edward, and was so charmed with him, that he every where spoke of him with the highest encomiums; and even after the king's death, when nothing was to be got by flattering, he wrote the following character of him.

"All the graces were in him: he had many tongues; when he was yet but a child, together with the English, his natural tongue, he had both Latin and French; nor was he ignorant of the Greek, Italian, and Spanish, and perhaps some more; but for the English, French, and Latin, he was perfect in them, and was apt to learn every thing: nor was he ignorant of logic, of the principles of natural philosophy, nor of music. The sweetness of his temper was such as became a mortal; his gravity becoming the majesty of a king; and his disposition was suitable to his high degree. In short, that child was so bred, had such parts, and was of such expectation, that he looked like a miracle of a man." Afterwards he adds, "He was a marvellous boy: when I was with him, he was in his fifteenth year of his age, in which he spoke Latin as politely and readily as I did. He began to love the liberal arts before he knew them, and to know them before he could use them; and in him there was such an attempt of nature, that not only England, but the world, had reason to lament his being so early snatched away. When the gravity of a king was needful, he carried himself like an old man; and yet he was always affable and gentle, as became his age. He played on the lute; he meddled in state-affairs; and in bounty, he did in that imitate his father; though his father, even when he endeavoured to be good, might have appeared to have been bad; but there was no ground of suspecting any such thing in the son, whose mind was cultivated by the study of philosophy*."

But notwithstanding these encomiums, we cannot help confessing, with a modern historian, that it is difficult to reconcile either to his boasted humanity or penetration, his consenting to the death of his uncle Somerset, who had served him faithfully, unless we suppose that he wanted resolution to withstand the importunities of his ministers, and was deficient in that vigour of mind, which often exists independent of learning and culture.

Edward, before he died, had the satisfaction of seeing his pious design of bestowing a magnificent charity upon the city of London fully executed. There were vast swarms of beggars and poor people strolling about the city of London; and bishop Ridley, in a sermon, the last year, before the king, had earnestly recommended the settling some constant method for their relief: Edward, much affected with what he had heard, sent for the bishop; gave him great thanks for his good exhortation; and, discoursing with him about the proper means of bringing about so good a work, it was thought adviseable to consult the lord-mayor and aldermen on the subject. In consequence hereof, a general contribution was made in the city, towards preparing and furnishing the hospitals of Christ-church, and of St. Thomas, in Southwark; the scites whereof, with the lands and revenues of the dissolved priories of Little St. Bartholomew and St. Thomas, had been given by Henry VIII. about a fortnight before his death to the city, but nothing had been done to fit them up for the purpose designed: a subscription was likewise set on foot for a weekly contribution towards the maintenance of those hospitals, till they should be better endowed; and the citizens contributed very generously to both these charitable undertakings. The decayed buildings in both places were thereupon repaired, and the work carried on with so much diligence, that on the twenty-third of November, a great number of sick and maimed people were taken into the hospital of St. Thomas, and no less than four hundred children put into Christ's hospital, all of them to be cloathed, lodged, and subsisted at the charge of the city, till other means could be provided for their future maintenance. The king, delighted with the forwardness and liberality of the citizens, sent for the lord-mayor and aldermen on the tenth of April, and gave for ever his palace of Bridewell to the city, to be employed for the relief of such vagabonds and thriftless poor, as should be sent thither to receive chastisement and be kept to labour. The hospital founded in the Savoy, by Henry VII. for the relief of pilgrims and travellers, had of late been made an harbour of idle fellows, vagabonds, and strumpets; and the master and brethren being sent for to the king, were persuaded to resign it into his hands, with all its goods, lands, and revenues. His majesty, immediately upon this surrender, assigned a yearly rent of seven hundred marks, with all the beds, bedding, and other furniture, towards the maintenance of the work-house of Bridewell, and the hospital of St. Thomas. The letters patent confirming this grant, with a licence of mortmain for enabling the city to purchase lands to the value of four thousand marks a year, for the better supporting those other hospitals, were passed on the twenty-sixth of June, about ten days before he died.

The remains of this young monarch were deposited in the chapel of St. Peter's church Westminster, near the body of king Henry VII. his grandfather, with great funeral pomp, and the unfeigned mournings of an affectionate people.

The I N T E R R E G N U M between the Death of King EDWARD VI. and the Proclaiming the Lady MARY Queen.

THERE hath hardly ever been a breach in the order of succession to the crown of any country, but it hath proved the source of a civil war; and England would at this time have been involved in that calamity, had not the general bent of the nation discovered itself so fully in favour of the true lineal heir.

Northumberland, by whose interest with the deceased king the settlement on lady Jane had been made, resolved at all events to support her right; but, conscious of his own unpopularity, and abundantly sensible of the opposition he had reason to expect, he thought it necessary to proceed with the utmost caution. And first he concealed the king's death as well as he could for some days; and, in order to get the two disinherited princesses into his power, persuaded the council to write to them in their brother's name, desiring their attendance, under pretext that his bad state of health required the assistance of their counsel, and the consolation of their company.

Mary readily accepted the invitation, and was actually come as far as Hunsdon, in Hertfordshire, before she discovered the snare laid for her. At this place she received a letter from the earl of Arundel, acquainting her of the death of the king, of the settlement of the crown on the lady Jane Grey, and of the design to seize on her person. These tidings convinced her of the necessity of immediately providing for her own safety; the sudden death of a servant furnishing her with a pretence that he died of the plague, she returned back with so much haste that she travelled near fourscore miles without stopping, and retired to Kenninghall, in Norfolk, from whence she wrote, on the eighth of July, to sir George Somers, sir William Drury, sir William Waldegrave, Clement Higham, and other gentlemen of that neighbourhood in her interest, signifying to them the king's death, and her right to the crown, and requiring them to attend her there without a moment's delay, and with all the power they could get in readiness. Circular letters were sent the next day to the principal nobility and gentry in every county of England, requiring them to assist her in the defence of her crown and person.

The same day (the ninth of July) she likewise wrote to the council, upbraiding them with keeping her brother's death so long a secret from her, whom they knew to be the next heir to the crown; "and although (she said) such a proceeding plainly indicated their having formed some undutiful design against her; yet she promised to receive them into her favour, and to pardon what had been done amiss, provided they would forthwith proclaim her queen." To which letter the council returned the following answer, signed by twenty-one of its members: "That she could not pretend to the crown, since she was born of an unlawful marriage, dissolved by a legal sentence, confirmed by more than one parliament: that she ought to give over her pretensions, and acknowledge queen Jane for her sovereign, who was now in possession of the throne, by virtue of the late king's letters patent, under the great-seal of England: they therefore strictly charged her not to disturb the peace of the nation, assuring her that, in case she shewed herself obedient, they were ready to do her all the service they could in duty; and at the same time threatening her with the evil consequences of her non-acquiescence*."

Mary, on receiving this letter, not thinking her person sufficiently secure where she then was, withdrew to Framlingham castle, on the coast of Suffolk, that she might, if the situation of her affairs obliged her to it, have an opportunity to escape with more ease into Flanders. And here she not only assumed the title of queen, but found many friends hearty enough to proclaim her title in the city of Norwich; and she was daily joined by others, with all their followers.

And now Northumberland, finding that he could no longer dissemble, resolved to throw off the mask, and act in a more open and undisguised manner; he therefore engaged the council to depute him and the duke of Suffolk to Sion-house, a pleasant seat on the banks of the Thames, where the lady Jane then was, to give her notice of being appointed by the deceased king to ascend the throne. The young lady, though only sixteen years of age, had a most accomplished person, the most amiable disposition, and the most distinguished parts: beside the knowledge of the modern tongues, she was thoroughly versed in the Greek and Roman languages; wholly taken up in literary researches, her heart was a stranger to the calls of ambition: she had been educated with the late king, for whom she had a most sincere affection, so that she received the news of his death with tokens of unfeigned concern: and as she had never been consulted about the settlement, or informed that his death was to set the crown upon her head, the notice now given her, that she was called to the throne filled her with the utmost surprize. She was so far from receiving these tidings with joy, that she even told the two dukes that she would not accept of the crown, alleging the preferable rights of the princesses Mary and Elizabeth, and warning them of the fatal consequences that must necessarily attend such a hazardous, and, in her opinion, criminal enterprize, earnestly beseeching them to let her continue in the private station in which she was born.

Overcome at last by the importunities, rather than reasons, of her father and father-in-law, and, what had still more weight with her, those of the lord Guildford Dudley, her husband, whom she passionately loved, and who was indeed worthy of her affection, she was persuaded to give up her own sentiments, and to regulate herself by their advice and direction: but this she did with so much reluctance, that it might truly be said her consent was rather extorted than given. The kings of England were, at that time, wont to pass the first days after their accession in the Tower of London, and thither Northumberland immediately conducted the new sovereign, the lovely victim of her family's ambition.

The next day, being the tenth of July, lady Jane Grey was proclaimed queen of England, with the usual formalities, in the city of London; which being so contrary to the expectation of the people, who had not the least notion of this lady's immediate accession to the throne, they received the news with silent surprize, nor were any of those acclamations heard, which are usual on such occasions; even the heralds seemed to do their office unwillingly; and though orders were sent for her being proclaimed throughout the realm, they were not observed farther than ten miles from London. The discontent of the people, which arose from their hatred to the duke of Northumberland, and his arbitrary measures, was not a little increased by an ill-timed act of severity in the government, who ordered one Gilbert Pot, a vintner's servant, to be set on the pillory, with his ears cut off and nailed to it, on the very day the lady Jane was proclaimed, only for expressing himself in a slighting manner of the new queen.

As the council expected that Mary would exert all her interest to oppose their proceedings, it was thought necessary to notify queen Jane's accession to the crown by proper ambassadors to foreign courts, and to the emperor in particular, to whom Richard Shelley, esq. was immediately dispatched, with instructions to omit nothing to secure the friendship of Charles, which would necessarily influence other courts in favour of the new settlement, and discourage the party of the princess Mary, which must chiefly rely on the emperor's assistance. Shelley left London indeed, but judging that the present state of affairs must soon undergo an alteration, he waited in England to see what the alteration might be.

In the mean time Mary neglected nothing on her part to assert her title to the crown; and she so managed, by positively promising to leave religion in the same state she found it, reserving to herself no more than a liberty to profess her own faith, that she engaged the people of Suffolk and Norfolk, though strongly attached to the Reformation, to hazard their lives and estates in her quarrel. These her promises being spread abroad, she was joined by numbers of the nobility and gentry; in particular Bouchier, earl of Bath, and Ratcliffe, earl of Suffex, sir Thomas Mordaunt, sir John Wharton, sir William Drury, sir Henry Bedingfield, and sir Henry Jernegan, persons whose interests lay in the adjacent counties, repaired to her standard, and brought her a strong reinforcement. Sir Edward Hastings, brother to the earl of Huntingdon, having been ordered by the council to levy troops for the service of lady Jane, carried over to Mary all the forces he had assembled, amounting to no less than four thousand men; even a fleet which had been sent by Northumberland to cruize on the coast of Suffolk, and prevent the escape of Mary, or the landing of foreign forces to her assistance, being driven by a storm into Yarmouth, put themselves and their crews under her command.

Northumberland receiving advice of this unexpected event, ordered an army which was in readiness in the neighbourhood of London, to march immediately towards Newmarket, appointing the duke of Suffolk for their general, being determined to remain himself with the lady Jane; but the counsellors, who wanted to remove him out of the way, represented to Jane the imminent danger to which her father would be exposed, and at the same time persuaded Northumberland to take upon him the command, extolling his known valour, his superior military skill, and the dread which his name, already terrible in Norfolk, by his victory in the late reign, would strike into the insurgents.

The duke could have wished to have been excused this service, well knowing the necessity of his presence in the council, of whose steadiness he was not well assured; but as it was not entirely in his choice to accept or refuse the command, he yielded to the entreaties of his daughter and the remonstrances of the council, and made preparations for his departure the next day, sending his son, the earl of Warwick, before him, with five hundred horse, to Bury; and, having taken a solemn leave of the lords, none of whom embraced him with greater marks of affection, or more cordial wishes for his success, than the earl of Arundel, he set out on Friday the fourteenth of July, towards Cambridge, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Huntingdon, the lord Grey of Wilton, with other noblemen, and a gallant troop of six hundred horse, attending him thither; and having passed the Sunday in that place, he put himself the next morning, July 17, at the head of the army, which had rendezvoused at Newmarket, and amounted to six thousand foot and two thousand horse, with which he advanced the next day to Bury.

Upon the news of his march, some of Mary's friends advised her to retire abroad; and had the duke advanced with an expedition proper to express the resolution of an intrepid and enterprising general, she might have perhaps taken that step; but, instead of acting with the vigour the exigence of the case required, he made but very slow marches, and so gave Mary's friends an opportunity of coming and swelling the number of those who had embarked in her interest. QUEEN MARY.

rived at Bury, he found that great numbers of his men had deserted, so that he was under a necessity of sending to London for farther succours; and he wrote in sharp terms to the council upon the subject: but he soon found that persons who govern by terror, are always hated; and whatever obsequiousness is paid them, during their prosperity, they are sure to be deserted in their greatest need, when that terror is removed by the disturbed state of their circumstances.

The council consisted of the following persons, viz. the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, the dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, the marquisses of Winchester and Northampton, the earls of Arundel, Shrewsbury, Huntingdon, Bedford, and Pembroke, the lords Cobham and Darcy, sir Thomas Cheney, sir Robert Cotton, sir William Petre, sir William Cecil, sir John Cheeke, sir John Mason, sir Edward North, and sir Robert Bowes: these were divided into three parties; the one secret papists, headed by the earl of Arundel; another, true protestants, headed by archbishop Cranmer; the third, and indeed the greatest part, were of no religion, but blindly followed that which was uppermost, who, after having embraced the establishment of Henry VIII. with the same ease had followed that of Edward VI. and were ready to resume the Romish religion, whenever it should suit best with their temporal interest. This may probably be said to be the character of Northumberland himself, for though he professed the reformed religion, the protestants had a very bad opinion of his integrity; so that, notwithstanding Jane was a true protestant, it plainly appears that religious zeal alone was not sufficient to keep the counsellors in her interest; on the contrary, they were disposed to forsake her rather than remain under the slavish subjection of that duke, whose pride could bear no contradiction, and whose tyranny had brought upon him their almost unanimous hatred.

Pleased therefore with this opportunity, which Northumberland's letter gave them, to get out of the Tower, in which place they had all been as it were confined by the crafty minister, on the pretence of attending upon the person of Jane till her coronation, they left the place as if they intended to set about making levies to reinforce the duke; but, having assembled in Baynard's castle, a house belonging to the earl of Pembroke, they invited thither all the noblemen in town whom they conceived to be well affected to queen Mary; and when they were met, the earl of Arundel opened the conference by a speech, in which he inveighed in the strongest terms against "the cruelty and injustice of Northumberland, his insatiable avarice and unbounded ambition, the criminal project which he was engaged in for altering the succession, and the great wickedness in which he had involved the whole council; and concluded with moving, that they might return immediately to their duty and allegiance which they owed to their lawful sovereign, by proclaiming Mary queen, as the only way left them to preserve the state, and recover their own lost honours."

This proposal was seconded by the earl of Pembroke, who, laying his hand on his sword, swore he was ready to fight with any man who should presume to oppose so salutary a measure: but indeed, there appears to have been little occasion for this bravado of his lordship; for, after a very short debate, the majority expressed their approbation of the proposal, and the lord-mayor and aldermen were ordered to attend immediately; when the council declaring their resolution to have the princess Mary proclaimed, these venal magistrates discovered the greatest alacrity and cheerfulness in executing their orders for that purpose; so, mounting their horses, they rode in a body to the Cross in Cheapside, where Mary was proclaimed queen of England by sir Christopher Barker, principal king of arms, on the nineteenth of July, about four o'clock in the afternoon: Te Deum was sung in the cathedral of St. Paul's, and the event was celebrated with great rejoicings on the part of the populace: even the duke of Suffolk, who commanded in the Tower, finding that all resistance would be in vain, ordered the gates to be thrown open, and immediately declared for queen Mary. Then repairing to his daughter's chamber, he told her that she must now put off her royal robes, and be contented with a private life; to which she replied, as with great truth she might, that she would put them off with infinitely more pleasure than she had put them on; which she would never have done but in obedience to him and the rest of her relations. And thus the lady Jane, after she had enjoyed, or rather suffered, the vain pageantry of royalty for the space of ten days, resigned it into the hands of those who had loaded her with it.

M A R Y. The fourth Sovereign of ENGLAND of the House of TUDOR.

A. D. 1553.

THE first step taken by the council, after proclaiming the lady Mary queen, was to dispatch the earl of Arundel and lord Paget to Framlingham castle, to give that princess an account of what had been transacted in her favour; and the next day they signed an order to the duke of Northumberland to disband his forces, and behave himself as became a dutiful subject.

The proceedings of the council not only influenced the city of London, but strengthened the interest of Mary throughout the nation; and so terrified Northumberland, that, before the orders for disbanding the army could reach him, being pre-informed of the revolution at court, and plainly perceiving that he could not keep a sufficient force together, he obeyed before-hand, and, it is said, meditated his own safety by flying out of the kingdom; but being prevented in this scheme by his own guards, he endeavoured to gain Mary's favour by an early submission and testimonies of zeal for her service: he not only disbanded his army, with a profession of his own voluntary regard for the public lic good and peace of the nation, and the most sincere affection for the queen, but assembled as many as would attend him on the occasion, and proclaimed his new sovereign, flinging up his hat in a transport of joy, and crying, "God save queen Mary!"

Mary, however, was not to be deceived by this hypocritical behaviour in one whom she knew to be a most inveterate enemy to herself and family, and acted as he did only because it was not longer in his power to play any other part; and therefore she committed to the earl of Arundel the agreeable charge of departing immediately and arresting the duke of Northumberland, with his sons and chief accomplices. When that proud and haughty man learned from Arundel the purport of his visit, he, who in his prosperity had tyrannized over this very earl and the rest of the council, fell at his feet in the most submissive manner, and implored his favour. Arundel, enjoying that abject behaviour which is so peculiar to fallen insolence, told the duke he must obey the queen's orders; and he took into custody at the same time the earl of Warwick and the lord Henry Dudley (Northumberland's sons), sir Andrew Dudley, his brother, the earl of Huntingdon, the lord Hastings, sir John Gates, sir Henry Gates, sir Thomas Palmer, and Dr. Sandys, who, by Northumberland's order, had preached up lady Jane's title at Cambridge. All these were sent up to London, and committed to the Tower, on the twenty-fifth of July. Soon after, the duke of Suffolk, lady Jane Grey, and lord Guildford Dudley, her husband, were, by Mary's orders, taken into custody: but Mary being desirous, in the beginning of her reign, to render herself popular by the appearance of clemency, and as the counsellors alleged, in excuse of their conduct, that they had acted from fear and compulsion, she indulged most of them with a pardon. Much about the same time Ridley, bishop of London, and the marquis of Northampton, were arrested and sent to the Tower.

On the thirtieth of July, Mary set out, with a large train, from the castle of Framlingham for London, where she was met by the princess Elizabeth, with a body of two thousand men. That lady, though she was far from aspiring to the throne by force of arms and the effusion of her country's blood, thought it not prudent to remain an idle spectator of the transactions consequent upon the death of Edward, and, to defend her own person, had raised the above body of men from the neighbouring country, who readily came in to protect her, and to obey her orders during the troubles that seemed to threaten the kingdom; but her highness being informed of her sister's success, and the entire submission of lady Jane's party, marched with her little army to join Mary, and had the address to gain her confidence for the present, pretending that those men had been raised for her service.

On the third of August Mary made a very pompous entry into London, and riding through the city to the Tower, she, at her entrance, called for and had presented to her the old duke of Norfolk, who had been under sentence of death there, ever since the last year of her father's reign, the lord Courtney, son to the marquis of Exeter, and a prisoner likewise ever since his father's attainder, the duchess of Somerset, and Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, who all kneeling down, she embraced them in the most affectionate manner, saying, "These are my prisoners," and ordered them instantly to be set at liberty. The next day, the lord Courtney was created earl of Devonshire; she restored Stephen Gardiner to his bishopric of Winchester, and a few days after made him high-chancellor of England; yet this was the very man who had subscribed to her mother's divorce, and even written publicly against the lawfulness of her marriage with Henry VIII.

On the fifth of August, Edmund Bonner, late bishop of London, prisoner in the Marshalsea, and Cuthbert Tonstal, the old bishop of Durham, a prisoner in the King's Bench, had their pardons, and were reinstated in their sees. Shortly after, all the bishops who had been deprived during the reign of Edward VI. were restored to their bishoprics, and the new ones removed; as Ridley from London, and Bonner replaced in his room; Story from Chichester, and Day reinstated; Miles Coverdale, of Exeter, went out to make room for West; and John Hooper was ousted from Worcester, which was filled by Heath. Likewise all beneficed clergymen that were married, or would not renounce the reformed religion, were put out of their livings, and others of the popish communion put in their rooms.

On the tenth of August, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Shrewsbury, and Stephen Gardiner, were sworn of the privy-council; and that same day the earl of Arundel, for his good offices, received the order of the Garter: and the late king's obsequies were performed, with this remarkable circumstance, that though Day preached the funeral sermon, Cranmer administered the sacraments, and performed the service of the dead, according to the rites of the reformed church of England: but a mass of Requiem, at which the queen assisted, with all the ceremonies of the popish church, was that same day publicly said for him in the Tower.

The success which Mary had met with in asserting her right to the crown, had been chiefly owing to the resolution of the Suffolk men, who, upon Mary's promise to continue the laws and the religion established by king Edward in the manner she found it, had risked their lives and fortunes in her cause, and enabled her to surmount the greatest difficulties that obstructed her advancement to the throne, without bloodshed: but it is very certain that Mary was determined to make promises, oaths, justice, and even interest itself give way to her favourite project of restoring the religion of the church of Rome.

Her first care, after securing the persons of those from whom she expected the greatest opposition, was to consult her trusty friends how best to effect the intended overthrow of the reformed religion; and she was disposed to keep no measures, but to force the kingdom to turn immediately to what she called the union of the catholic church; and had it not been for the more artful counsels of the emperor and bishop Gardiner, she had sent directly for cardinal Pole, as legate, to reconcile England to the pope: but they disapproving so hazardous a step, it was deferred by Mary for the present, who contented herself with publishing a liberty of conscience in affairs of religion.

This declaration was made by the queen in council, on the twelfth of August, and great care was taken to render it as public as possible, and to magnify it as a great instance of the queen's generosity.

rosity. But this was very far wide from the promises she had made in her distress to her faithful Suffolk men, whom she had assured that religion should be left in the same state as it was in at Edward's death: the declaration now issued, which, in fact, was no more than a general assurance that protestants should not be forced to embrace the Romish religion, greatly alarmed all her subjects of the reformed church, and gave the popish party such spirits, that, in defiance of the laws in favour of the Reformation, then established, they made no difficulty of openly celebrating divine service in the manner of the Romish church; and inveighed as openly against the protestant faith: nay, the very day after the first declaration was made in council, bishop Bonner went to St. Paul's church to hear a sermon preached by his chaplain, Bourne, who, relying on the intention of the court, and the authority of the bishop, then present, launched forth into the most indecent invectives against Edward's administration, particularly in what related to the Reformation, and magnifying Bonner for the sufferings he had undergone for the sake of popery.

The memory of Edward was still dear to the people, and they could not easily bear the thoughts of seeing all that he had done on the point of being in a moment revoked; wherefore, on Bourne's insolent declaration, a furious tumult arose: some of his audience reproached him in the harshest terms for his impudence, others flung stones, and one of them threw his dagger with that dexterity at the preacher, that it stuck in the wood of the pulpit; and at last the people grew so furious, that Bourne would probably have been torn in pieces, had not Bradford and Rogers, two eminent protestant ministers, interposed, and conveyed him by a back way out of the church into a neighbouring house.

Such an open proof of the people's dislike to popery as this, might have been thought a caution to the administration how they proceeded too zealously in favour of superstition; but it rather drove them into more violent attempts. However, the queen and government thought proper for the present to do something to pacify the people, and an hypocritical declaration concerning religion was made to the citizens and common-council of London, an extract of which we shall give, as it stands upon the journal of the council, a witness of the perfidy of that reign. Therein the queen declares, "that albeit her grace's conscience is stayed in matters of religion, yet she meaneth graciously not to compel and restrain other men's consciences otherwise than God shall (as she trusteth) put in their hearts a persuasion of the truth that she is in, through the opening of his word unto them by godly, virtuous, and learned preachers."

But whatever effect this declaration had upon the city of London, it is certain that the queen and her ministry soon began to act another part; for, on the eighteenth of this same month (August) another declaration was published, which very fairly owned the queen's religion to be popish, of religion all over the kingdom: but she said, "That, of her gracious disposition and clemency, she minded not to compel any of her subjects thereunto, until such time as farther order, by common consent, might be taken therein. She forbid all her subjects, at their peril, to move seditions, or to stir unquietness, by interpreting the laws of the land, according to their brains and fancies. She wished them to live together in quiet fort, and Christian charity, and forbear these new-found devilish terms of Papist or Heretic, and such like, and apply themselves to live in the fear of God, and so express their hunger and thirst of God's glory and holy word; which many had pretended rashly, by their words. That if any made assemblies of people, or at any public assemblies, should go about to stir people to disorders, she would see the same severely reformed and punished: and she forbade henceforth all preaching and reading in churches, or other public or private places, to interpret, after their own brains, any scriptures, or points of doctrine; all printing of books, ballads, rhimes, or interludes; nor to play those interludes without special licence. Likewise that none should presume, of their own private authority, to punish any offender in the late rebellion under the duke of Northumberland, or his accomplices, or to seize any of their goods; but to refer all unto her majesty, and to public authority: yet not hereby to restrain or discourage any from informing against such offenders unto her grace, or council; resolving to punish with severity and rigour all unlawful or rebellious doings. She charged all mayors, sheriffs, and all other officers, to see the observing her commandments, and to apprehend all such as should willingly offend, committing them to jail without bail or mainprize; and certificates of their names and doings to be sent to her or her council." The plain language of all this proclamation was, that the present state of affairs rendered it imprudent for her majesty to take any violent steps with regard to religion; but that she was determined to force all her subjects to embrace her worship as soon as she could get an act of parliament on her side. All this naturally filled the protestants with terror; for it was easy to perceive that religion and the laws would soon suffer a change, and that those who did not blindly submit to the new statutes would be considered as rebels. On this occasion the city of London shewed some dawn of spirit; and the government, suspecting the magistracy was not assiduous enough in the cause of superstition, ordered them to declare whether they were able, of their own authority, to prevent all public tumults; and if they did not find themselves able, the lord-mayor was to surrender his sword into the hands of the queen.

Hitherto Mary's reign had not been stained with blood; but now the cataracts of severity were opened that deluged the land with floods of it. On the eighteenth of August the duke of Northumberland was brought to his trial at Westminster-hall: Thomas, duke of Norfolk sitting as high-steward, the arraigned duke, after hearing his indictment read, desired the opinion of the duke on two points. "First, whether a man, acting under the authority of the prince's council, and by warrant of the great-seal of England, could be justly charged with treason for those actions? Secondly, whether persons who were at least equally culpable with himself, could sit as judges?" These objections would doubtless have weighed in his favour in any other court than that which had orders to cut him off, as the person most to be feared in the execution of the designs of the queen and her ministry, upon the laws and religion of the nation; but he was answered by the high-steward, "that the great-seal, which he alleged for his warrant, was not the seal of the lawful queen of the realm, but of an usurper, and therefore could be no warrant for him: and that any persons against whom there was nothing upon record were deemed innocent in the eye of the law, and might be admitted on any jury." From this last answer the duke foresaw that any objection he could make would be over-ruled; he therefore confessed the indictment, and referred himself to the queen's mercy. His example in this particular was followed by the earl of Warwick and the marquis of Northampton, who were tried at the same tribunal, and all three condemned to death as traitors. Sir John and sir Henry Gates, sir Andrew Dudley, and sir Thomas Palmer pleaded guilty, and underwent the same sentence.

The duke of Northumberland, with his two confederates, sir John Gates and sir Thomas Palmer, who had assisted him with their evidence to take away the life of the duke of Somerset in the late reign, were particularly marked out as persons against whom the people were most clamorous, and had but two days allowed them to prepare for execution on Tower-hill. Bishop Gardiner, indeed, who was, the day after his condemnation, made lord high-chancellor, is said to have interceded for him; but Northumberland was found to be a man so utterly void of principles, and at that time so obnoxious to all parties, that his life might be of disservice, and therefore it was resolved to shew him no mercy. Accordingly, on the twenty-second of August, he was conducted to the scaffold, where he confessed that he had always been a Roman catholic in his heart, and expressed great sorrow for having plundered the effects of the church, especially as he could not now make restitution; but whether these were his real sentiments, which he formerly concealed from interest or ambition, or whether he hoped by this declaration to render the queen more favourable to his family, no one can pretend to determine. His head being struck off, it was with his body interred in the same vault where Henry VIII's two beheaded queens and the late duke of Somerset lay. Sir John Gates and sir Thomas Palmer suffered the same day: the rest of the condemned prisoners were first reprieved, and afterwards pardoned.

The queen having, by her last proclamation, and her other acts, evinced her affection to popery, now added a stronger proof of her resolution to extirpate the Reformation; for being informed that the people of Norfolk and Suffolk (who had proved such faithful friends to her and her cause) relying upon the virtue of her promise to protect them in the exercise of the reformed religion, had transgressed the prohibitions contained in her proclamation, she ordered the magistrates of the county to punish severely the delinquents; and Mr. Dobbs, one of the members for those parts, presuming to put the queen in mind of the services those counties had rendered her, and the promises she had made to them, was set in the pillory for three days.

And now the ministry being resolved to execute the queen's plan for restoring the old religion, began with the removing those who seemed to have the most credit with the people: they therefore ordered Mr. Bradford, one of the two protestant ministers who had rescued Bourne in the late tumult at St. Paul's, to be sent to prison; and confined his companion Rogers to his own house, from whence he was afterwards removed to gaol. Judge Hales, who alone of all his brethren had refused to sign the instrument which had transferred the crown to lady Jane Gray, was imprisoned in the Marshalsea, for charging the justices of Kent to conform to the laws of Edward VI. not yet repealed: but the truth seems to have been, that he was obnoxious as being a protestant. He was removed to the Compter, and afterwards to the Fleet, where he was so affected at the report of the calamities that the warden told him were contriving against those who would not change their religion, that it turned his brain; and he several times attempted, and at last perpetrated, his own death.

Judge Montagu, who was also a protestant, was turned out of his place, and fined a thousand pounds for only having assisted in drawing up the settlement of the crown in favour of lady Jane; and Bromley, a bigotted papist, was put in his room, though this latter had not only assisted in drawing up the same deed, but had likewise readily agreed to sign it. Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, and Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, were imprisoned for not submitting to the queen's order, by which she had empowered the chancellor, bishop Gardiner, singly to grant licences to preachers; and Coverdale, bishop of Exeter, was confined to his own house on the same account. Peter Martyr, professor of divinity at Oxford, suffered so many insults and indignities from the enemies of the Reformation, that he was obliged to take refuge in Cranmer's house at Lambeth, though that prelate was in no condition to protect himself, for the court had already devoted him to destruction.

Bonner, who was his sworn foe, had some time before industriously given out, that Cranmer had engaged to the queen to make a public recantation of his errors, and to return into the bosom of the Romish church. This report so exasperated the good old prelate, who saw that Bonner's scheme was to delude the people into a compliance with popery under the sanction of his name, that he thought it incumbent on him to draw up some public testimony against this aspersions; and he drew up a declaration, in which he called the queen herself to witness, that he never made her any such promise, as his enemies had alleged; and offered, with Peter Martyr and four or five others whom he would chuse, to defend, in a public disputation, the liturgy, doctrines, and every part of the Reformation and the late king, as agreeable to those of the primitive church, and warranted by the holy Scriptures. This declaration he proposed to revise, enlarge, and put his own seal to it, and then have it affixed to the doors of St. Paul's and other churches in London; but a rough draught thereof getting abroad, so many copies were taken, that some of them were brought to the council, who construed the paper into a libel, upon Cranmer's owning it, and made this an aggravation of his former offence of signing Edward's will, and thereupon committed him, on the fourteenth of September, to the Tower.

Bishop Latimer was committed at the same time; and scarcely any bishop or preacher who had signalized himself for the Reformation, and did not either recant or fly beyond sea, escaped either deprivation, imprisonment, or both. Peter Martyr, and John a Lasco, a Prussian nobleman, and minister of the German protestant church in Austinfriars, with all the other reformed preachers who were foreigners, were banished out of the kingdom; and a great number of English, who had embraced the reformed religion, foreseeing a persecution, retired into foreign parts, on pretence of being natives of France, until orders were dispatched to all the sea-ports, that no person should be allowed to quit the kingdom on that pretence, without being furnished with a warrant signed by the French ambassador.

The queen, having now secured the chief persons from whom she and her council might expect any opposition in their grand scheme to revive the pope's authority and religion in England and its dependencies, now resolved to recompense those noblemen who had exerted themselves vigorously in her favour. The earl of Arundel was appointed lord-steward of the household; sir Edward Hastings was made master of the horse, and afterwards created a baron; the earl of Suffex was created a knight of the Garter, with the particular privilege of appearing covered in the queen's presence. But the best placed piece of gratitude the queen shewed on this occasion, was with regard to the lord Paget, whom she restored to the honour of the Garter, which was buckled on his leg, and the collar again put round his neck, by two knights companions; at the same time Garter king at arms was ordered to set up his achievement anew in Windsor; and the sovereign, who was in the chapter when his act of restitution was passed, ordered it to be inserted therein, "that he had highly deserved of the nation by his prudence and council." At the same time sir John Williams was made a peer, and afterwards chamberlain of the household; sir Henry Jernegan was constituted captain of the queen's guard, which was encreased with the number of four hundred men; and sir Thomas Tresham was created lord-prior of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, which was revived, consequently he took rank as the first baron of England: Thomas lord Delawar, sir William Drury, and sir Richard Southwell were gratified with pensions. The queen promoted her chaplain, Hopton, to the see of Norwich; appointed Englefield master of the wards; Rochester, comptroller of the household; and Waldgrave, master of the wardrobe: and the council having received some hints of intended commotions in the north, and that the Scots seemed ready to assist the disaffected, the earl of Shrewsbury, who had great interest in those parts, was made lord-warden of the Marches, and sent down in great haste to his post: but the disturbances were soon quelled.

Every thing was now ready for the queen's coronation; but the Exchequer being very bare of money, she borrowed twenty thousand pounds of the city of London, which enabled her to go through all the splendor of her coronation, on the first of October. Gardiner had the honour to perform the ceremony, assisted by Bonner, bishop of London, Tonstal, bishop of Durham, and eight other prelates: the young earl of Surry, son to him who was beheaded, had been sent for by the queen's order, and he acted as deputy-marshal under his grand-father, the duke of Norfolk: Courtney, the new earl of Devonshire, had the honour to bear the sword; the earl of Westmoreland, the cap of maintenance; and the earl of Shrewsbury, the crown: the earl of Worcester served as carver, sir John Gage assisted the old duchess of Norfolk in bearing the queen's train; the lady Elizabeth and the lady Anne of Cleves graced the ceremony; and the whole was conducted with the utmost magnificence. Nor were there wanting numerous creations of knights of all denominations, that of the Garter excepted; and, that her reign might begin at least with the appearance of lenity and mercy, the same day was published what, in its title, was called a general pardon; which, as it could not efface the terror the dreadful examples of her cruelty had already spread over the nation, so it came out loaded with such a number of exceptions, that few persons could receive any benefit from it, for all those who had been arrested before September were excepted by name.

However, in order to gain the good will of the people, a proclamation was issued on the fourth of October, which remitted to the subject the subsidy of four shillings on lands, and two shillings and eight pence on goods and chattels, granted by the last parliament to Edward VI. to enable him to pay his debts: but in a very little time after we find several severe commissions issued. Holgate archbishop of York, not shewing himself satisfied with the court-politics, was sent prisoner to the Tower on a general accusation of several capital crimes; the lords Clinton and Cobham, sir John York, sir Richard Cotton, and the bishop of Ely, were added to the number of state prisoners. Cecil seems not to have come near the court, nor to have taken any concern in public affairs; as Petre was the elder secretary, and remarkably active in the atrocious transaction of Edward's will, it was, perhaps, thought imprudent to attack Cecil while Petre escaped; and he took cause to give them no other handle: however, it appears by the minutes in the council-book, that he was ordered to surrender the seal of chancellor of the order of the Garter, though Edward, just before his death, had conferred that office on Cecil for life.

But the success of all the queen's measures depending upon the compliance of the approaching parliament, all manner of illegal and arbitrary practices had been made use of to influence elections, and obtain favourable returns. Arts, frauds, and even violence were made use of to gain this great point, as the government well knew that without the concurrence and sanction of a popish parliament, the people would never be awed into a compliance with those resolutions which had been taken to abrogate all the laws made in favour of the Reformation, and to restore the popish faith. Emissaries were dispatched to every borough, and such returning magistrates as were not papists, or did not promise to conform to the will and commands of the queen, were displaced, and their offices filled up by others more devoted to popery: and where a resolution appeared to oppose the court-schemes, and to chuse protestant representatives, the electors were threatened, and their bodies frequently imprisoned by false actions and other frivolous pretences. In some places, where the reformed had so great a superiority, that it made it too hazardous to use such direct means, the sheriffs, named by, and devoted to, the court, would return none but such as they were sure would comply with all the directions of the court. Thus did Mary secure a house of commons to her mind.

months before, in Edward's reign, appeared so strenuously to forward the Reformation, that there would have been great difficulty to model them according to the popish scheme; but, to the amazement of every thinking person, those men of honour were all converted to the queen's religion by the mere waving of her royal sceptre. It may not, perhaps, be very easy to determine in which reign the peers dissembled their sentiments; but it is evident that they, through fear, avarice, or ambition, were guilty of the most base and scandalous prevarications, as soon as the pope's alarm-bell was rung in St. Stephen's chapel. However, to make them more secure, we have seen that the court beforehand took care to remove such bishops as might have had courage enough to upbraid their insincerity; and to replace six of them with men who preferred their fees to their religion, which, we are sorry to say, appears to have been the foible of the whole bench, except Dr. Taylor, bishop of Lincoln, and Dr. Harley, bishop of Hereford, who therefore were excluded the house on the first day of the session, for refusing to kneel at the mass, which, in open defiance of the laws then existing, was celebrated before the two houses in the Latin tongue, accompanied with all the ancient rites and ceremonies of the popish church.

Both houses thus new-modelled by the ministerial arts, the parliament met on the fifth of October, 1553, and was opened with a speech by Gardiner; but sat only eight days, to pass an act declaring nothing to be judged treason but what was in the statute of Edward III. and, lest the persons then in prison should take the advantage thereof, all those were excepted who had been committed before the last day of the preceding September. Two private acts now passed: one for the restitution of Courtney, earl of Devonshire, to his blood; and the other for the restitution of his mother, Gertrude Courtney, widow to the marquis of Exeter, his father: after which the parliament, without touching the least on religion, was prorogued to the twenty-fourth of the month.

At the second meeting, after the usual formalities, they proceeded to business, and in three days time passed a bill that repealed the divorce of the queen's mother, for which they assigned the following reasons: "That no man ought to put asunder whom God hath joined together. That king Henry's scruples had been suggested by malicious persons, and supported by the decisions of some universities, the members of which had been previously secured by bribery and corruption. Lastly, That archbishop Cranmer, thinking himself more wise than all the other doctors, had rashly pronounced the said sentence of divorce." As this act was necessary to establish the queen's legitimacy, so it had another tendency of great service to Mary, as it at the same time declared the princess Elizabeth to be illegitimate, and consequently from this time we find Mary's behaviour towards that princess very much changed for the worse.

This point being settled, Gardiner, who had planned out the business to be done by this parliament, and was the chief manager therein, engaged the lords, on the thirty-first, to send a bill down to the commons, to restore the mass, or form of public worship used in the last year of Henry VIII. which was sent back by the commons, with their approbation, six days after. The parliament then proceeded to the repeal of nine laws made in the late reign, in favour of the reformation, and in contradiction to the authority and usages of the Romish church. Another act passed against insulting priests, and another against unlawful assemblies and riots. Then they reversed the attainder of the duke of Norfolk, and confirmed those of the duke of Northumberland, the archbishop of Canterbury, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Warwick, the lord Ambrose Dudley, sir Henry Dudley, sir John Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer. Besides the acts here mentioned, several others were passed, which would have done honour to better times and a more virtuous reign; but all were calculated as gildings to the pill of popery, which, by the statute already mentioned, was to be thrust down the throats of the people.

On the thirteenth of November, the parliament being still sitting, lady Jane Grey, lord Guildford Dudley, her husband, the two other sons of the duke of Northumberland, and Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, were brought to their trials; who all confessing their indictments, received sentence of death as traitors. When the prisoners were remanded back to the Tower, they met with such unusual indulgences, that they had reason to think the bitterness of death to be over-past; but, in my opinion, the event clearly shewed that the queen and her ministry had, from the very beginning, marked out Cranmer, together with the lady Jane Grey and her husband, for death.

However readily the parliament gratified the queen in some points she had set her heart upon, they were yet determined to follow their own judgments in other articles, and in particular that of the queen's marriage, which was now brought before them. Upon the death of Edward, cardinal Dandini, the pope's legate at Brussels, had sent over an agent, whose name was Commendani, to sound the inclinations of Mary, who told him that her intention was to re-establish the papal authority in England, and desired that his holiness would send over cardinal Pole as his legate; at the same time she exhorted Commendani to continue the disguise in which he had come to England, that her designs might not be too precipitately divulged. The pope being made acquainted with her desire, advised with his consistory, who declared it would not be for the honour of the holy see to send over a legate until one should be demanded in form; but the pope giving them to understand, that he knew more than he thought proper to disclose on that subject, they assented to the proposal.

The nomination of Pole to this office was equally disagreeable to the emperor and bishop Gardiner. Charles had projected a match between his son Philip and Mary, and was apprehensive of the scheme's miscarrying by the interposition of Pole, whom it was reported the queen intended to take for her husband; as was also said in relation to Courtney, earl of Devonshire: but neither of these reports seem to have had any foundation in truth. Gardiner, on the other hand, foresaw that the legate would slip between him and the archbishopric of Canterbury (which he hoped to obtain on the deprivation of Cranmer), and destroy all his influence at court.

Accordingly, as Pole was hastening for England through the emperor's dominions, that prince, as had been preconcerted between him and Gardiner, ordered ordered him to be detained at Dilling, a town of Germany, on the Danube, under pretexts that Pole did not see into: in the mean time Gardiner was incessantly representing to the queen, that Pole would ruin her intentions in favour of the Roman catholic religion, by his untimely and furious zeal; and the emperor wrote to her on the same subject, in the most earnest manner. D'Aumont, the emperor's resident at London, had orders to propose to the queen a match between her and Philip, prince of Spain, eldest son of Charles; and at the same time begged her to open to his ambassador her mind fully upon that head, and to enter with him (Charles) into an unreserved correspondence, without using any of those troublesome formalities so common amongst crowned heads.

Mary, who was highly pleased with the support of so powerful an alliance, and desirous of uniting herself more intimately with her mother's family, embraced the proposal with the utmost alacrity. This match was also strongly recommended by Norfolk, Arundel, and Paget; and Gardiner, who was now prime minister, closed in entirely with the emperor, whose confidence he had won, and whose friendship he thought more necessary, as he plainly saw he was not trusted by the court of Rome, who had never acquainted him with the private negotiation set on foot with Mary, through the means of Commendani. In a word, Mary was persuaded to write to cardinal Pole, that the interest of religion would not permit him to come over immediately to England, where the people were not yet properly disposed to acknowledge the pope's authority.

Mean while the negotiation for the marriage was conducted with equal diligence and success, and Mary's intentions in this parliament were soon known to the whole nation, who were greatly alarmed with the thoughts of such an alliance, and could not brook a Spanish king to rule over them, especially one who had already patronized the inquisition in his own dominions, and recorded his cruelty with the blood he had most tyrannically shed so lately in the Low Countries, Naples, Sicily, and Milan; but matters were so far advanced that the house of commons took it into consideration, being equally surprized and enraged to hear that the queen was determined to contract a foreign alliance; and, after some debate, in which the popish party in the house was entirely silenced, they sent their speaker, sir John Pollard, an eminent lawyer, with a deputation of twenty members with an address to the queen against the marriage; which she so ill received, that, notwithstanding their former obsequiousness, the parliament was dissolved the very next day, the sixth of December, in order to be rid of their importunities.

During this session, the convocation, sitting as usual, re-established the doctrine of transubstantiation, which was strenuously opposed by the reformers, of whom but few divines attended; the chief of those who did were Aylmer, Cheney (afterwards a bishop), Philpot (who, in this reign, was burned), Hatton, dean of Exeter, and Philips, dean of Rochester. These, notwithstanding the violence of the popish party, attempted to justify the Reformation; and Philpot in particular behaved with great dignity and spirit in the ridiculous debate which was held on the subject of transubstantiation, the particulars of which may be found in Fox, who published them while most of the members were alive, who would not have failed to have treated him severely, had his veracity been questionable. By his account, these champions for the true faith were reviled, threatened, insulted, and interrupted in all their arguments, and the victory was forcibly adjudged to their adversaries; for by this time no less than one hundred and sixty benefices had been bestowed on the creatures of the court, and of consequence there were very few protestants in the lower house of convocation. It is remarkable, that notwithstanding all that Mary was doing to introduce the papal authority into her dominions, she, in the writ of summons to this convocation, assumed the title of "Supreme Head of the Churches of England and Ireland."

By this time every thing was agreed upon between the English and Imperial courts, and, about the middle of December, the emperor sent over the (afterwards famous) count Egmont, at the head of a magnificent embassy, to regulate the conditions of the marriage; and the queen entrusted Gardiner with the care of the whole negotiation. This prelate had already received one million two hundred thousand crowns from the emperor, to render certain individuals of the council propitious to the match; and now he affected to insist upon conditions that should be very advantageous to England. The Imperial ambassadors arriving on the second of January, 1554*, were conducted to court, where their entertainment was extremely magnificent; and in a few days the articles of the marriage were signed at London, after all possible care being taken to sweeten them for the palate of the people: the substance of them was as follows.

"I. That Philip should enjoy the title of king of the realms and dominions belonging to his wife, and assist her in the government thereof, the queen alone having the free disposition of bishoprics, benefices, revenues, offices, and favours, to be given only to natives (who were also to have the sole management of affairs) and the laws, customs, and privileges of the nation being preserved inviolate.

"II. That the queen should likewise bear the titles of all her husband's realms, with which he was at present or should be afterwards invested.

"III. That a jointure of sixty thousand pounds a year should be settled on her; forty thousand pounds thereof in Spain, and the rest in the Low Countries.

"IV. That the queen's issue by this marriage should inherit her realms according to the English constitution.

"V. That if don Carlos, Philip's son by his first wife (all whose rights in Spain, the two Sicilies, and Lombardy, were reserved to him) should die without issue, or his line be extinct, the eldest son by this marriage should inherit those territories, as well as Burgundy and the Low Countries, to which last his succession was absolutely assured: the younger children to have portions assigned them here and in England.

* When the ambassadors landed in Kent, they were both surprized and terrified with the reception they met with from the people, who thought that the prince of Spain was in their company, and therefore attacked them so furiously, that (as count Egmont himself wrote over to his court) they were obliged to fly for their lives.

“ VI. That neither don Carlos nor any descendant of his should lay any claim to Burgundy and the Low Countries, if there was any male issue by this marriage, nor were these left to pretend any right to Spain, or that prince's other dominions, if he left any children.

“ VII. That if only females should be born by this matrimony, the eldest should succeed to the Low Countries, but not to marry a foreigner without don Carlos's consent: if she did, her right was forfeited and reverted to don Carlos and his heirs, till the extinction of his line; after which she and her sister (no males remaining) were again intitled to the succession.

“ VIII. That the line of don Carlos being extinct, and none left of this but women, the eldest daughter should succeed, not only in the Low Countries and Burgundy, but also in England and Spain, and the other dominions, according to the customs of those countries; all the rights, privileges, and usages whereof were to be maintained, and the administration kept in the hands of natives.

“ IX. That the treaty for mutual assistance made A. D. 1542, and declared at Utrecht, on the sixteenth of January, 1546, should be faithfully observed by the queen, the emperor, the prince, and his successors, and their respective realms and dominions*.”

These are some of the principal articles of this treaty of marriage, to which a clause was annexed, by which it was expressly covenanted, that, before the consummation of the marriage, Philip should solemnly swear to the observation of the following articles.

“ I. That he would not promote or admit any foreigners into any place of trust or office in England.

“ II. That he would take a convenient number of English into his household, and not suffer them to receive any displeasure from such as he brought with him in his retinue.

“ III. That he would make no innovation in the state, laws, and customs of England; but maintain all orders of men in their rights and privileges.

“ IV. That he should not carry the queen abroad, unless at her own request; nor send any of her children by him out of England (where they were to be educated) without the consent of the nobility; and that in case she died before him, without issue, he would not challenge any right at all in the kingdom, but permit the succession to descend to the right heir, according to the constitution.

“ V. That he would take care that all the forts and places of the realm should be kept by natives; that he would not alienate any of its appurtenances, nor suffer them to be usurped; and would not carry away any jewels, nor convey ships, guns, or ordnance for war or defence, out of the kingdom, but keep them in good repair.

“ And lastly, that he would do his utmost to maintain the peace between France and England; but without derogating from the treaty of 1542: and he was to be at liberty to assist his father in the defence of his realms and dominions, and in revenging the injuries he had received.”

These articles were well enough calculated for the advantage of England, had there been any security for their being observed, or any means of redress left the English in case of a violation, which they had much reason to expect from the ill faith and immeasurable ambition of the emperor. The whole was signed on Friday the twelfth of January, by the Imperial ambassadors, and by Gardiner, lord-chancellor, the earl of Arundel, the lord Paget, sir Robert Rochester, and sir William Petre, the queen's commissioners; and on the Sunday and Monday following, were communicated by Gardiner to the nobility at court, and to the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, with a pompous account of the advantages thereof to the realm, and an high encomium of Philip.

This declaration, however, did not cure the jealousies of the people, who feared that the Spaniards would now become absolute lords of the kingdom, and have the management of all affairs; and that, abolishing the ancient laws, they would establish an insupportable slavery in the land as a conquered country; and their discontents flamed out in such a manner, as threatened a sudden and fierce rebellion; and had the malecontents been supported by any foreign power, or headed by any great man of abilities of their own country, the authority of the queen would have been exposed to the most imminent danger; for scarcely were the marriage-articles signed, when news came to court that the people of several counties had taken up arms, resolving to oppose with all their might the queen's intended marriage with Philip.

It seems that sir Thomas Wyatt, a gentleman of Kent, very considerable on account of his great fortune, and still more so by the opinion the world had of his virtues and abilities, believing it would be much better to prevent than to remedy evils, had engaged to arm the men of Kent, as sir Peter Carew, a gentleman of great interest in the West of England, did to assemble the inhabitants of Devonshire; and these two had persuaded the duke of Suffolk to engage with them, by the hopes of restoring his daughter, the lady Jane Grey, to the throne, and he had promised to attempt to raise the Midland counties. Carew, however, prompted either by his impetuosity, or his apprehensions, took up arms before the day appointed; but his troops were soon dispersed by a body of the queen's forces, and he himself was forced to take refuge in France, but was soon after taken at Brussels, and brought over prisoner to England, where he made his peace with the government, and died quietly in 1577. The duke of Suffolk had a harder destiny: he left London on the twenty-fifth of January, and went to his own house at Sheen, from whence he fled with his two brothers towards Leicestershire, inviting the people by placards all the way to join him in his endeavours to rescue the nation from a foreign yoke; but he could only get fifty horse about his person, when he was informed that the earl of Huntingdon was advancing, at the head of some hundreds, to seize him. Upon this intelligence, which proved true, he dismissed his followers, and committed himself to the care of a servant, who betrayed him to that nobleman, by whom he was brought up to London, and his brothers were taken soon after.

Wyat's attempt was at first more successful, and seemed to threaten more fatal consequences; for, having got out of London, he summoned his friends into the field on the twenty-fifth of January, and was immediately joined by sir Henry Isley, sir George Harper, the two Knevers, sir Thomas Colepepper, the two sons of the lord Cobham, and many gentlemen of the first distinction in Kent. The first measure after this, was to dispatch through the county proper persons to raise the people, and he, with some of his most trusty followers, retired to Rochester, where he took possession of the bridge, and fortified the east part of the city, which he intended as the rendezvous for his party; at the same time he ordered a manifesto to be published at Maidstone, and other places of the county, against the queen's marriage, and invited all Englishmen to join him in his endeavours to defend England from the insolent and tyrannical rule of a foreigner. These proclamations were in some places opposed by the government; but the people in general inclined to flock to his standard.

Certain advice of this rebellion being brought to court, it threw the queen and her council into great consternation, as they were at present quite unprepared to stem any vigorous efforts from a discontented people, the forces that ushered Mary up to the throne having been disbanded: it was therefore resolved to send a herald to Wyatt with assurance of a full pardon, provided he would lay down his arms in twenty-four hours; but the herald not being suffered to deliver his commission, the duke of Norfolk was hurried away with no more than six hundred of the city trained-bands and the queen's guards, who soon came up with the rebels; but at the very instant that the duke of Norfolk ordered his batteries to play upon them, he saw the London forces wave their hats, and, calling out, "A Wyatt! a Wyatt! we are all Englishmen!" appeared advancing against himself, to attack him. This piece of treachery threw the duke into such a consternation, that he, with the earl of Arundel, and sir Henry Jernegan, captain of the queen's guard, sought for safety in a precipitate flight, nor was it without great difficulty that they escaped with their persons, leaving the rebels masters of the field, of the duke's baggage, and eight pieces of brass cannon. This disgrace is said to have broke the duke of Norfolk's heart. The desertion of the Londoners appears to have been owing to the persuasion of Brett, one of their captains, who was wrought upon by sir Thomas Harper, who had the night before, with that purpose, left Wyatt, and pretended to surrender himself to the duke of Norfolk.

Wyatt finding himself now reinforced to the number of four thousand men, and fully persuaded that the Londoners would open their gates to him, and declare in his favour, advanced, on the thirty-first of January, towards the metropolis, and was got as far as Dartford with his artillery, when he was again met by two messengers from the queen (the lord Hastings and sir Thomas Cornwallis) who offered to confer with him, and, in the queen's name, promised him every reasonable satisfaction he should demand. This concession seems to have turned the weak head of Wyatt; he already thought himself invincible, and had the insolence to demand possession of the Tower and of the queen's person, and that the council should be changed at his pleasure. Hastings, who was a passionate but honest man, could not bear this traiterous demand with any patience, and, bidding Wyatt defiance, he and Cornwallis returned to court.

The next day, being the second of February, the queen went to Guildhall, where, in a speech to the citizens, she acquainted them with Wyatt's treasonable demands, telling them she had done nothing in her marriage without the advice of her council, and declared her resolution to stay and throw herself upon the protection of her faithful city of London; though at the same time she had taken care to post five hundred foreign troops well armed in several parts thereof.

This speech at Guildhall, from a sovereign, so tickled the ears of the city council, that they ordered the bridge to be strongly barricadoed and guarded, so that, on the third of February, when Wyatt was advanced as far as Southwark, and thought to pass over the bridge into the city, he found himself shut out; and therefore, after a short consultation, he resolved to cross the Thames at Kingston; accordingly marching thither with all expedition, to his great disappointment found the bridge there broken down. This obliged him to halt for some time, in order to repair it, which being done, he passed it with his army, being now increased to six thousand men, with whom he arrived in Hyde Park about nine o'clock of the morning of the seventh of February; but here being detained some hours by the breaking down of one of the cannon, which he, contrary to the advice of all about him, would stay to repair, sir Thomas Harper, who had been so serviceable in bringing over the London troops, deserted him, and, posting to the court at Whitehall, discovered Wyatt's intention to march through Westminster, and enter the city at Ludgate.

However, this would not have frustrated his scheme, had he not been still possessed with a belief that the citizens would favour his undertaking: on which presumption, leaving his cannon, under a guard, on that spot now called Constitution Hill, he marched down directly towards Charing-cross; but on his way was attacked in flank by a party of light horse, under the earl of Pembroke, about the spot where St. James's street is now built, and a skirmish ensued, by which one part of Wyatt's men was cut off from the other. This attack ruined Wyatt, for in it he lost the best part of his followers: nevertheless, he still continued his march leisurely along the Strand, expecting to be rejoined by his dispersed followers.

In his way he was opposed by sir John Gage, the lord-chamberlain, at the head of a thousand men, but those he quickly put to flight: and, pursuing his march, came before Ludgate, where he demanded admission, but in vain, all the posts of importance at the gate and elsewhere being strongly guarded by lord William Howard, and other friends of government; Wyatt therefore, instead of admission at Ludgate, received nothing but reproaches, and finding himself in no condition to force the gate (so many of his followers having flunk away, that he had not above a thousand men about him), he was obliged to return; but being informed that his retreat was cut off by barricadoes, and the earl of Pembroke's troops at Temple-bar, he discovered his danger, and gave all over for lost. At that instant, Clarendieux, king of arms, was sent in the queen's name, to require quire him to surrender, with a promise of pardon for him and his men if they would lay down their arms: while Wyatt was pausing on this summons, sir Maurice Berkeley happening to pass on horseback, Wyatt called out to him, as knowing him to be a gentleman, and delivering up his sword, Berkeley carried him along with him, on the same horse, prisoner to Whitehall. Knevet, Cobham, and the rest of Wyatt's followers, likewise submitted; and the queen in a few minutes, from her own palace-windows, beheld those led captives from whom she had expected in a short time to receive laws; for so great had been the consternation at court, that Welton, who said mass the day of Wyatt's defeat, which was Ash Wednesday, wore armour under his clerical habit.

Such was the event of this conspiracy: and if it had only drawn vengeance on the heads of the principal actors, they might have been said to meet the just reward of their folly. But it produced two considerable effects; the one fatal to an illustrious innocent person, and the other to all protestants, though religion had no share in this insurrection: but, as the queen's darling point was to restore popery, and finding her power strengthened by the ill success of the conspirators, she made an handle of the affair to ruin the reformed and their religion.

As the duke of Suffolk was concerned in the conspiracy, the court easily conceived his design was to replace his daughter, the lady Jane, on the throne; and this determined the queen to sacrifice her to her own safety, whom she had before only hated on account of her religion. Accordingly Fakenham, abbot of Westminster, was sent, two days after the surrender of Wyatt, to announce the fatal message of death to the lady Jane and her husband, who were still prisoners in the Tower, under sentence of death. This message was received by Jane with great composure, it being what she had long expected, and which the innocence of her life, as well as the long train of calamities which she had suffered, made her consider as no unwelcome tidings. Dr. Fakenham, who brought them, informed her he had obtained a respite of three days for her, in which time he tried all his endeavours to make her change her religion: but Jane, even in these her mournful circumstances, had presence of mind sufficient not only to defend her faith with equal learning and eloquence, but also to write a letter in the Greek language to her sister Catherine, in which, besides sending her a copy of the New Testament, she exhorted her in the most pressing manner to maintain, in every condition of life, a like steady and unshaken perseverance with herself.

On the twelfth of February, the day appointed for her execution, her husband the lord Guilford, who was doomed to suffer at the same time, desired he might be allowed to see her, but she refused to comply with his request, and sent him word that the tenderness of a parting interview would, she feared, too much affect their spirits, and render them unable to meet their approaching fate with that magnanimity which befitted their condition; the wretched husband acquiesced, and from the window of her prison she beheld him carried to execution, and from the same window saw his body and head return in a cart. It had been proposed to execute them both together; but the council fearing that the compassion of the people for their youth, beauty, innocence, and noble birth, might excite some dangerous commotion, thought proper to alter their resolution, and gave orders that she should suffer on a scaffold within the Tower: accordingly she was led forth from her apartment to the block, where, to the last moment, she shewed great constancy and piety, and an immovable adherence to the protestant faith; yet acknowledged that she thought herself culpable in suffering herself to be persuaded to accept a crown that did not belong to her; and then submitting her neck to the stroke of the executioner, her head was severed from her body. Thus fell the lady Jane Grey, before she had attained the seventeenth year of her age.

On the fourteenth and fifteenth of February, Bret, the commander of the city trained-bands, who had deserted to Wyatt, and fifty-eight more, were hanged: Wyatt, indeed, was respited for two months, in hopes he would make some considerable discoveries, having already unjustly accused the earl of Devonshire and the princess Elizabeth, and promised to give information against other great personages, of being concerned with him in the late conspiracy. How improbable soever his accusations might seem to the unprejudiced, the queen, Gardiner, and Arundel were willing to believe any thing that might affect the princess, or any others that were suspected to be friends to the Reformation; therefore the earl of Devonshire was committed to the Tower, and Elizabeth, though at that time much indisposed, was brought to London, and closely confined at Whitehall for a fortnight, without liberty of speaking to any person; and after that committed to the Tower.

On the seventeenth, the duke of Suffolk was tried by his peers, the earl of Arundel acting as high-steward, and found guilty, in consequence of which he suffered death on the twenty-third, on Tower-hill. In the course of the same month, sir James Crofts, sir Edward Warner, Thomas, late clerk of the council, and sir Nicholas Throgmorton, were committed to prison, upon some hints dropped by Wyatt. The lord Grey, the duke of Suffolk's brother, was executed, with about two-and-twenty of his followers and friends. But a little to qualify these severities the marquis of Northampton, the lord Cobham, sir William Cobham, Colepepper, Vane, and some other gentlemen, were, on the fourth of March, released out of the Tower of London; and about six hundred of the common men concerned in the late rebellion, being brought before the palace at Whitehall, with halters about their necks, upon making the proper submission, received their pardon from the queen in person. Of all who were tried, none appear to have escaped being condemned, except sir Nicholas Throgmorton; and his deliverance was owing to the amazing spirit and abilities he discovered upon his trial. He called upon the court to produce any one overt-act of the treason of which he had been indicted; and no solid proofs appearing against him, the jury, after a long trial, brought him in Not Guilty: for which, upon the attorney-general's motion, they were bound over, and afterwards committed, prosecuted, and severely fined. Thus did the iniquitous judges of these days endeavour to convince the juries, that they were no longer to have the liberty of judging according to their consciences; but that, instead of being governed by proofs, they were to examine how the queen and her council stood affected to the prisoner, and by that to determine their verdict.

The government had, for some time, delayed the execution of Wyatt, that they might make all the advantage they could of his discoveries. Ever since his confinement he had acted with a pusillanimity as unavailing to himself as dangerous to others; but having now no longer hopes of saving his own life by drawing the innocent into condemnation, he, upon his trial, fully cleared the princess Elizabeth, the earl of Devonshire, and others, by retracting all he had said to their prejudice; and, being brought to execution on the eleventh of April, acquitted them to the public, with his dying breath: yet Elizabeth was not only kept confined in the Tower, but, to deprive her even of that little comfort she received from the humanity and distinction with which the constable, the lord Chandois, treated her, she was, on the sixteenth of May, committed to the custody of lord Williams. But there being no longer any pretence to retain her or the earl of Devonshire prisoners in that place, she was removed to Woodstock, and he to Fotheringay castle, both of them still under a guard. In this condition the princess Elizabeth continued for near two years, when she was so far indulged to live at her own house; but even then she was beset by the queen's spies and guards.

The queen no sooner found herself delivered from the danger apprehended from Wyatt's conspiracy, than she, with redoubled vigour, resumed her design of an entire destruction of the Reformation in England, in which she was not a little assisted by Gardiner, who now bore all the sway. Sir John Williams, on the eighth of March, by order of the council, received from the Tower of London Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, and carried them down to Oxford, there to dispute concerning their faith. It is easy to conceive that those in power assumed the victory: on the third of May, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, were adjudged obstinate heretics. As for Cranmer, he being already attainted of treason, was pardoned of that, that he might die the more painful death of an heretic. The mass was every where restored; the marriage of priests was strictly forbidden; and all those who had already taken wives, amounting, as is supposed, to no less than three fourths of the English clergy, were instantly deprived of their livings. A visitation was appointed, to enforce a speedy and general compliance with these orders. Among other articles the commissioners were enjoined to forbid the clergy to take the oath of supremacy, on their receiving any benefice. It is remarkable that this oath had been established by the laws of king Henry VIII. which were still unrepealed. But the storm did not end here, it fell with greater force upon many of the superior clergy; for a special commission was given to Gardiner, Tonstal, Bonner, Parfen, bishop of St. Asaph; Day of Chichester, and Kitchin of Llandaff, to deprive Holgate, archbishop of York, Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, Bird of Chester, and Bush of Bristol, then under confinement as recusants. Two days after, Taylor, bishop of Lincoln, Hooper of Gloucester, and Harley of Hereford, underwent the like sentence of deprivation, on an accusation of having behaved themselves ill and preached erroneous doctrines. In the room of the deprived bishops were placed others, who were known to be staunch friends to the papistical doctrine and superstition.

These violent and arbitrary proceedings could not fail to inflame the resentment of the protestants, who inveighed with great acrimony against the present government: nevertheless, the ministry, knowing them to be necessary to secure an interest in the house of lords and in the convocation, supported them with an air of justice, founded upon a clause in the letters patent of Edward VI. in which it was provided that bishops should hold their bishoprics so long as they behaved themselves well ("quamdiu se bene gesserint,") and therefore it was alledged, the queen did them no injustice by depriving them, when their conduct was such as proved displeasing to her. Such was the constitution of the state and church when the new parliament met on the second of April, 1554.

Before this time Gardiner had received vast remittances from the emperor, which he had employed in corrupting the members to a degree till then unprecedented in England. Gardiner, as chancellor, opened the session by a speech; in which he maintained the queen's hereditary title to the crown; affirmed she had a right to chuse a husband for herself; observed the good use she had made of that right, by preferring an old ally, sprung from the house of Burgundy; and mentioned the failure of Henry VIII's posterity, of whom there were none surviving but the queen and the lady Elizabeth.

He subjoined, that, in order to prevent the calamities which might be occasioned by different pretenders, it was necessary to grant the queen a power of disposing of the crown, and of naming her successor: a power, he said, which ought not to be considered as a new thing in England, since it had been formerly bestowed upon Henry VIII.

The parliament were sufficiently inclined to gratify the queen in all her desires; but when the liberty, independency, and even the very being of the nation, were exposed to such imminent danger, they could not by any means be persuaded to comply.

They were acquainted with the inveterate hatred which she bore to the lady Elizabeth, and with her strong attachment to the house of Austria: they remembered her bigotry and superstition, which would prompt her to prefer the establishment of the catholic religion to all considerations of justice and national interest: they observed that Gardiner, in his speech, had carefully avoided the giving Elizabeth the title of the queen's sister; and they thence inferred, that a design was formed of declaring her illegitimate: they apprehended, that Mary, if invested with such a power as she demanded, would bequeath the crown to her husband, and, by that means, make England a province of the Spanish monarchy: and they were the more inclined to entertain these suspicions, when they heard, that Philip's descent from the house of Lancaster was carefully traced and explained, and that he was publicly represented as the true and only heir by right of inheritance.

The parliament, therefore, sensible of their danger, was resolved to keep at a distance from the precipice, on the brink of which they stood. They could not help confirming the articles of marriage, which were extremely advantageous to England; but they refused to agree to any such law as the chancellor recommended: they would not so much as declare it treason to imagine or attempt the death of the queen's husband, while she was alive; and a bill brought in for that purpose was rejected at its first reading.

In order to deprive Philip of all hopes of ever being able to exercise any authority in England, they enacted a law, importing, "that her majesty, as their only queen, should solely, and as sole queen, enjoy the crown and sovereignty of her realms, with all the pre-eminences, dignities, and rights thereto belonging, in as large and ample a manner after her marriage as before, without any title or claim accruing to the prince of Spain, either as tenant by courtesy of the realm, or by any other means."

This parliament passed a law for erecting anew the bishopric of Durham, which had been dissolved by the last parliament of Edward. The queen had already, by virtue of her prerogative, restored Tonstal to the possession of that see; but, though the crown was, at that time, accustomed to exercise authority which might seem entirely legislative, it was always deemed more safe and satisfactory to obtain the consent of parliament.

Bills were brought in for suppressing the many erroneous opinions contained in books, as well as for reviving the law of the Six Articles, together with those against the Lollards, against heresy and erroneous preaching; but all these bills were rejected by the two houses: a proof, that however inclinable the parliament might be to gratify the court in some points, they were yet determined to follow their own judgment in other particulars. The queen, therefore, finding that they would not pay an implicit obedience to her will, thought proper to put an end to the session by dissolving them on the fifth of May.

The parliament having confirmed the articles of marriage between the queen and the prince of Spain, and Mary being impatient to be more nearly connected with her young consort, the earl of Suffex was sent over, immediately after the breaking up of the parliament, with a strong squadron under admiral Winter, to bring the prince of Spain to England, where he actually arrived, at Southampton, on the nineteenth of July. On his first setting foot on shore, Philip drew his sword, and carried it naked for some time; and when the magistrates of that port presented him with the keys of that town, he returned them without vouchsafing to speak a single word; both which circumstances caused various reflections in the minds of the spectators, not greatly to the advantage of his Spanish highness. The queen had set out on a progress to the West, that she might meet her bridegroom at Winchester, where she intended to be married, and where the ceremony was accordingly performed by Gardiner, with great magnificence, on Wednesday the twenty-fifth of July, being the feast of St. James, the tutelar saint of Spain, Mary being in her thirty-ninth year, and older than Philip by eleven years and three months; the marquis of Winchester, with the earls of Arundel, Derby, Bedford, and Pembroke, performing the ceremony of giving her away in the name of the kingdom. The Imperial ambassador had, before the solemnity, presented Philip with an instrument, containing the emperor's resignation and cession to him of the two Sicilies; and, as soon as it was over, Garter king at arms, attended by the heralds, published the styles of the royal pair, in Latin, French, and English, proclaiming "Philip and Mary, king and queen of England, Ireland, and France, Naples and Jerusalem, defenders of the faith, princes of Spain and Sicily, archdukes of Austria, dukes of Milan, Burgundy, and Brabant, counts of Hapsburg, Flanders, and Tyrol."

The marriage being consummated, Philip ordered his treasure to be landed, consisting of twenty-seven chests, each a yard and four inches long, filled with bullion, with ninety-nine horse-loads and two cart-loads of gold and silver coin; which infused fresh zeal for the queen's interest into those who had been before retained by Gardiner. In the beginning of August, the court removed for London; stopping at Windsor, Philip was there installed a knight of the Garter: at length, on the eighteenth of the same month, they made a pompous entry into London, where pageants and triumphal arches had been erected, and other marks of rejoicing were exhibited, at a vast expence, the obsequious city-council having taxed the citizens at the rate of a fifteenth and a half to provide for the magnificent reception of the queen and her new consort. After a short stay at Whitehall, they dismissed their train of nobility, and then returning to Hampton-court, made that palace their ordinary residence. But Philip's grave manner and reserved air gave great disgust to the English: none were suffered to come into either his or the queen's presence without a formal demand of an audience, as is practised by ambassadors. This rendered the court entirely unfrequented, the English nobility not enduring to conform to a custom so opposite to their own.

The rest of this summer was spent in the election of proper members to constitute the next parliament, under the influence of the prime minister, Gardiner, and his emissaries, in which no endeavours, by bribery, corruption, soothing, or menacing, were omitted to gain their ends. About the latter end of September died, full of years, the old duke of Norfolk, about twelve months after he had received his liberty; and was succeeded in his titles and honours by his grand-son, Thomas Howard, son to the earl of Surry, beheaded in the last year of the reign of Henry VIII.

The parliament, which met on the eleventh of November, was so well secured to the court principles and interest by Philip's money, that they wanted only an opportunity to signalize their zeal. At its first meeting, the king and queen rode together on horseback, in their robes, to the parliament-house, with two swords and two caps of maintenance borne before them. And now the court was so well assured of the parliament's concurrence with, and confirmation of, all their actions, that they dispatched the lords Paget and Hastings, with Cecil, the late secretary, in their train, to bring over cardinal Pole, in the character of the pope's legate, before any law was passed to restore the papal authority: indeed the parliament made it one of their first acts, on sitting down, to take off the cardinal's attainder, which had passed upon him in the reign of Henry VIII. and by which he remained liable to a sentence of death. The ambassadors arrived at Brussels on the eleventh of November; and having, to the no small satisfaction of the cardinal, delivered their commission, they landed with his eminence on the twenty-fourth at the Tower.

A guar-

A guardian-angel could not have been received with more pomp and greater respect than he was by the king and queen. Mary, in particular; was so over-joyed at seeing him enter the presence-chamber to pay his respects to her, that she declared aloud she felt the child leap in her womb on the occasion: some of the servile herd of flatterers who were about her caught the hint, and scrupled not to declare that as John the Baptist leaped in his mother's womb at the salutation of the Virgin, so here the queen's child leaped at the salutation of Christ's vicar, speaking by the mouth of his legate: Mary herself carried on this farce so far, that she declared her pregnancy to all the foreign ambassadors; and we find an order in council, dated the twenty-seventh of this month, for Te Deum to be sung at St. Paul's and a form of prayer was ordered to be composed and used by all the priests, &c. in which was this remarkable petition, that God would please "to give the queen a male infant, in fashion and body comely and beautiful, and in pregnant wit notable and excellent*." But, after all, this proved to be no other than a political trick; for the queen's boasted pregnancy turned to a dropsy. But to return.

Pole arriving on the twenty-fourth of November, as we have already observed, the queen laid the mask quite aside, and no longer paying any regard to her oath and promises not to alter the national religion, she determined to precipitate matters as much as possible; and two days after the legate's arrival, the two houses were summoned to Whitehall, and the cardinal having returned his thanks for their late favour to him in reversing his attainder, exhorted them to be reconciled to the church of Rome, into whose bosom he was ready to receive them, and grant them absolution from all spiritual censures. This produced a conference the next day between the lords and commons; and an address being drawn up in the name of both houses, expressing a desire of their reunion, and presented to the king and queen, the legate, at their majesties intercession, on the thirtieth of November, proceeded to restore the nation to an union with the church of Rome, and absolved it with all the spells of priestly jargon. The ceremony was followed by ringing of bells and bonfires, by the king and queen's express orders.

The legate having enjoined the parliament, by way of penance, to repeal all the laws made against papal authority, both houses set about the said repeal with an unprecedented degree of infamous and servile compliance, but the Christmas holidays interposing, the bill could not be got ready before the beginning of January. By this act (the title of which was "An act for repealing all the statutes against the pope, and for establishing ecclesiastical possessions granted to the laity,") the papal supremacy, the jurisdiction of bishops and ecclesiastical courts, and the prerogative of the crown, were put on the same footing as they stood in the twentieth year of Henry VIII. All fees, colleges, hospitals, schools, and other foundations, erected; all legal marriages, though within the degrees prohibited by the canon law, contracted; all institutions to benefices granted; and all processes carried on, and all church-lands conveyed to laymen, according to the late laws in being, since the separation from Rome, were not confirmed.

The very title of this act is sufficient to inform the reader of its tendency. It was the indispensable preliminary which the great men of England required for resettling the power of the pope: "Secure but to us (said they) the possession of the church-lands, and we are willing to embrace all your doctrines, or otherwise to reject them: let us enjoy our revenues, we will readily accept your religion; confirm but our possessions, and we will not hesitate to make a sacrifice of revelation, liberty, conscience and the exercise of our reason." The conduct of this parliament will secure us from the charge of too much severity in what we have here said; for having thus secured their possessions, they shewed the utmost indifference to the religion, or even the lives of their fellow-subjects; and they renewed the old sanguinary laws against heretics, which had been abolished in the reign of Edward VI. and the revival of which had been rejected in the former parliament. They likewise passed several new laws against seditious words and rumours; and they declared it treason to imagine or attempt the death of Philip, during his marriage with the queen.

Each parliament had hitherto been more complaisant to the court than their predecessors, but none of them had laid aside their long-conceived hatred and aversion to the Spaniards; and now, though the queen endeavoured to get her husband appointed presumptive heir to the crown, and invested with the administration of public affairs, she failed in both these attempts, and could not so much as persuade the parliament to agree to his coronation, a thing which he had greatly at heart: nor was she more successful in her endeavours to obtain a subsidy from the commons, in order to assist the emperor in a war he was anew engaged in with France. In short, the English at this period seem to have conceived the same jealousy against the house of Austria, which they had formerly entertained against France.

Philip, conscious of the general odium under which he laboured, endeavoured to recommend himself to the favour of the public by procuring the enlargement of several persons of distinction who had been confined from the jealousy or resentment of the court; but nothing was more acceptable to the nation than his protecting the lady Elizabeth from the malice and cruelty of her sister and that fell demon Gardiner, and obtaining for her the enjoyment of her liberty. Though it is unfair to put unfavourable constructions upon virtuous actions, yet the whole tenor of Philip's conduct and character leaves no room to doubt, that all his clemency on this occasion had very selfish and interested motives, particularly with regard to the lady Elizabeth; for he very justly concluded, that if she was put to death, the next lawful heir was the queen of Scots, and wife to the dauphin of France, whose succession would for ever unite England to the crown of France. The earl of Devonshire likewise derived some advantage from the affected popularity of Philip, and received his liberty; but finding that the court looked upon him with an evil eye, he begged permission to travel, and soon after died at Padua, from poison, as is supposed, given him by the Imperialists. He was the eleventh earl of Devonshire of the name of Courtney, one of the most distinguished families in history, and nearly allied to the royal family of France.

Notwithstanding that the nation in general was little disposed to credit the report of the queen's pregnancy, and that it was thought, by persons the most knowing in those matters, that she laboured under infirmities that rendered her incapable of bearing children, the belief of her pregnancy was still propagated with all possible care, and was one artifice by which Philip endeavoured to maintain his authority in the kingdom; and this pretext was so effectually handled, that the parliament were brought to enact a law, declaring, "that if the queen died before her issue came of age, the government of the kingdom should be in the king's hands during the minority, which was fixed till eighteen for a son and fifteen for a daughter." And now Philip and Mary, finding they could extort no farther concessions, came unexpectedly to Westminster, and dissolved the parliament on the twelfth of January, 1555.

Soon after the rising of the parliament, Thirlby, who was now bishop of Ely, and sir Anthony Brown, lately created viscount Montacute, were sent ambassadors, with a splendid retinue to Rome, to notify to his holiness all that had been done in parliament, and to make tenders of submission to the holy see in the name of the king, queen, and three estates of England. But before they could arrive, pope Julius III. died; and his successor, Marcus II. who reigned but twenty-two days, was dead also; and cardinal Caraffa, an haughty proud man, was elected, and assumed the name of Paul IV. When the English ambassadors arrived, this haughty pontiff refused them audience, because their powers ran from Mary as queen of Ireland as well as England, a title which had not been given her or her predecessors by the holy see: they were therefore tame enough to wait till a bull was made out, investing Mary with that title, and then they had their audience.

The usual formalities being passed, they laid before his holiness all that had been done in the late parliament, hoping that he would confirm to the laity the possession of church-lands; but the pope flatly refused to do that: he seemed to blame Pole for exceeding his commission, and to wonder how any one could presume to harbour a thought, that he would grant any confirmation to acts that were in themselves iniquitous and sacrilegious. To explain himself more fully on this head, a bull was issued, denouncing the most severe anathemas upon all who should keep from the church or religious orders any part of their property. Upon this the queen was weak enough to send for the marquis of Winchester, lord treasurer, sir Robert Rochester, comptroller of the household, secretary Petre, and sir Francis Inglesfield, master of the wards, acquainting them that her conscience did not suffer her any longer to keep in her hands any part of the church's property, desiring them immediately to repair to Gardiner, to consult in what manner they should be restored; and this declaration was attended by such expressions as sufficiently proved the deluded queen to speak from the deepest conviction of conscience.

But the attention of the ministry was chiefly engaged about the conduct proper to be observed with regard to matters of a religious nature; and a very important question was frequently debated, before the queen and council, by cardinal Pole and bishop Gardiner, namely, whether the laws lately revived against heretics should be executed in their full extent and rigour, or should only be employed to prevent the reformers from making any farther innovations?

Pole was very sincere in his religious principles; and though while at Rome he had incurred, by his lenity, the suspicion of a strong tendency towards Lutheranism, he was fully convinced of the truth of the catholic doctrines, and believed that those great and important interests ought never to be sacrificed to any consideration of human policy.

Gardiner, on the other hand, had always made his religion subservient to his temporal concerns, and, by his unlimited complaisance to Henry, he had shewn, that, had he not been driven to extremities during the late minority, he was sufficiently inclined to alter his opinion, and embrace the established theology.

This is generally allowed to have been the real character of those two counsellors; yet, such is the prevalence of temper above principle, that the humane disposition of Pole led him to recommend a toleration of those heretical tenets which he highly condemned; while the cruel heart of Gardiner prompted him to support by persecution that religion, which, at the bottom, he regarded with the utmost indifference.

Unhappily for the nation, the queen, who was a flaming bigot, relished the counsels of Gardiner best; but, willing at the same time to pay some regard to the character of Pole, she ordered him to take upon himself the reformation of the clergy, and charged Gardiner with the work of extirpating heresy.

Gardiner, thus empowered, and flushed with his success in bringing about the queen's marriage, in disposing the parliament to favour their sovereign's religious principles, and in restoring the Roman catholic religion and the pope's authority, was determined to crown his zeal, and complete his glory, by forcing the protestants into the pale of the church, or at least to an outward conformity to the new laws. And here a regard to truth, which ought ever to guide the historian's pen, and animate his reflections on the incidents he relates, obliges me to confess, that the imprudence of some weak persons among the reformed, contributed not a little to fix the diabolical resolutions now taken against them. It had been industriously given out by their party, that the queen was with child by Gardiner; and the court and the nation were filled with libels against her and the Spaniards. One Bradford, a virulent writer (not the same who suffered for religion), had published in print the most scurrilous abuses of the king's person; and the manners and religion of the court had been every where very indecently, however justly, lashed: Bonner and Gardiner had many private piques to revenge, while the treatment which some of the popish preachers had met with from several hot-headed protestants was made use of as a handle, that the whole party was made up of traitors as well as heretics.

But

But all these provocations and allegations fall infinitely short of an excuse for the infernal proceedings of the government and clergy against the protestants. England was now filled with scenes of horror and barbarity, which have justly rendered the catholic religion the object of universal hatred and abhorrence, and which prove that no human depravity can equal revenge and cruelty, concealed under the specious guise of religion.

The two first victims of this persecuting spirit were Dr. Hooper, late bishop of Gloucester, and Rogers, a prebendary of St. Paul's, who had both eminently distinguished themselves, the one by his loyalty in supporting the queen's title against Northumberland, and the other by his pacific temper, in saving, at the hazard of his own life, Bourne the papist-preacher at St. Paul's: but, as if the government had intended to give the nation a specimen of their impartial cruelty, Rogers, after repeated attempts to bring him to recant, was condemned to the stake; and so ingenious were his butchers in their barbarity, that, perceiving they could not shake his manly resolution to suffer, they attacked him where virtue is most tender, by denying him the sight of his wife or children, and hurrying him into the flames in Smithfield, on the fourth of February.

The two bloody bishops had a personal hatred against Hooper, who behaved with all the constancy of a primitive martyr. He had kept up a correspondence with Bulenger, and others of the reformed abroad, to whom he sent his wife, who was herself a foreigner; and he was at very little pains to conceal his sentiments, none having been more active or more successful than he was in the cause of reformation. He shewed a noble contempt for all the insults he received; and, being given over to the secular arm by the bishops of Winchester, London, Durham, Salisbury, Norwich, and Carlisle, who sat in judgment at St. Mary Overy's, Southwark, was impolitically sent by the government to die at Gloucester, that the hearers of his doctrine might be the witnesses of his sufferings.

This circumstance was intended to strike terror into his flock; but it was a source of joy and satisfaction to Hooper, who gladly embraced the opportunity of confirming by his death that doctrine which he had formerly taught them. When he was fixed to the stake, a stool was set before him, and the queen's pardon laid upon it, by accepting of which he might still have saved his life; but he ordered it to be taken away, and cheerfully prepared himself for that dreadful punishment to which he was doomed.

His death was attended by every circumstance that could heighten its severity; the wind, which was vehement, blew the flames of the reeds from his body; the faggots were green, and did not take fire; all his lower parts were consumed before his vitals were affected; one hand dropped off, with the other he continued to beat his breast: he was heard to pray, and exhort the people to adhere to their religion, until his tongue, swollen with the violence of his agony, was rendered incapable of motion. He was no less than three quarters of an hour in torture, which he bore with the most surprising and inflexible constancy.

About the same time Laurence Saunders, minister of Allhallows, Bread-street, and Mr. Rowland Taylor, rector of Hadley, in Suffolk, were delivered over to the secular power, and sealed their doctrine by their death.

Saunders suffered at Coventry: he was also indulged with the offer of pardon; but he rejected it with disdain, and embraced the stake, saying, "Welcome the cross of Christ, welcome everlasting life."

Taylor, parson of Hadley, was on the nineteenth of February, burned in that place, amidst his ancient friends and parishoners. When he was brought to the stake, and began to harangue the by-standers, one of the guards struck him on the head: then he was placed in a barrel of pitch; and one of the spectators throwing a faggot at the good old man, which wounded him so severely, that his visage was besmeared with blood, he replied, "Oh friend! I have harm enough, what need of that?"

When he repeated a Psalm in English one of the guards struck him on the mouth, and bid him speak Latin: and while he was employed in pious ejaculations, another cleft his head with an halbert, in such a manner that his brains came out, and he expired immediately.

So many inhuman executions, merely for the sake of principle, threw the nation into an universal consternation, insomuch that the subtle Gardiner, who had vainly imagined that a few examples would affrighten the reformers into a compliance, finding the work now grow daily upon him, thought proper to devolve his odious commission on others, but chiefly on Bonner, bishop of London, a man of the most profligate and abandoned manners, and of such a savage and cruel disposition, that he seemed to delight in the torments of the unhappy wretches his iniquitous sentence committed to the flames.

And now, not only Gardiner, but all the bishops, in a solemn assembly, endeavoured to clear themselves of being in any wise concerned in these barbarities, and sought by artful insinuations to cast the whole blame upon the king and the Spaniards: but Philip being informed of the infamous policy of the clergy, and being well apprized, that, should such an opinion of his cruelty be suffered to prevail, he must entirely lose all interest with the English, ordered friar Alphonso, his confessor, to disclaim those sanguinary proceedings from the pulpit, and very roundly to charge them upon the bishops: an unusual spectacle! a priest of the Inquisition blaming Englishmen for religious cruelties! The bishops, amazed at this, began to check their hands, and there were no more executions till the middle of March.

But the fires which had been thus damped, were in a short time rekindled by the breath of the gloomy queen, while Bonner's furious zeal spread the flames. He, in conjunction with some other bishops, and assisted by the earl of Oxford and lord Rich, condemned without mercy all that came before them, amongst whom was Dr. Robert Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, who was burned at Caermarthen, on the thirtieth of March. To recount all the particulars of the other executions, which now became so numerous, that the whole kingdom seemed to be in a blaze from persecution, would only shock the humanity of the reader, and they may all be found faithfully recorded in other historians. Three martyrdoms, however, deserve peculiar mention, those of Latimer, Ridley, and Cranmer.

They were still in prison at Oxford, and commissions for trying them were directed to Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, White, bishop of Lincoln, Holman, bishop of Bristol, and several others. The three prelates, at their different appearances, refused to acknowledge the pope's authority. Latimer and Ridley, after refusing to recant their doctrine, or to acknowledge the real presence in the eucharist, which was now become the watch-word for murders, were delivered over to the secular arm, and carried to be burned on the north side of the city of Oxford, in the ditch over-against Baliol college, on the sixteenth of October; and both, in their last moments, gave testimony of the faith with their blood, and a behaviour nothing inferior to what we read of the primitive martyrs. But those two great men deserve some farther mention.

Ridley was born of a good family in Northumberland. He went to school at Newcastle, and was sent to Pembroke hall in Cambridge, of which he became master. King Henry VIII. made him first his chaplain, and promoted him to the see of Rochester, from whence king Edward VI. translated him to London. He was certainly one of the ablest champions of the Reformation; pious, learned, solid in judgment, constant, admired by his friends, and dreaded of his enemies; which were sufficient reasons for the popish counsellors to put him to death. The night immediately before his execution, bishop Ridley invited the mayor of Oxford and his wife to see him die; and the good woman melting into tears, he spoke to her with an assurance which banished her sorrow, and convinced her that so much firmness on so melancholy an occasion could only be the gift from Heaven, inspiring and animating him against his approaching agony. He also comforted Latimer at the stake, who was ready to return him the kind office. He was so little shocked with the terrors before him, that he not only gave a serious attention to the furious bigot that preached at his execution, but calmly proposed to answer the exceptionable parts of his sermon, which was not permitted, lest his eloquence and reason should bias his hearers and spectators too much in his favour; and he left the world with an act of justice, for he sent a petition to the queen, praying that either the tenants of the bishopric of London might be confirmed in their leases, or that their fines might be restored out of his goods, seized when he was imprisoned. But he paid dearly for his courage; the faggots were ordered to be placed in such a manner as to torment him as much as possible; he was rather roasted than burned, for his legs were almost consumed before the fire was permitted to reach his vitals.

Bishop Latimer was born at Thurcaston, in Leicestershire, and brought up also at Cambridge. Henry VIII. promoted him to the see of Worcester, which he resigned because he would not subscribe to what were called king Henry's Six bloody Articles. He was remarkable for his simplicity, freedom, and plainness, with which he arraigned great sinners, and which, without the ornament of human eloquence, found a way to their hearts, and made them humble, though ever so exalted. One of his converts, a notorious robber, who had been persuaded by him to restore his ill-gotten money, gave testimony of it at his execution, and comforted him at the stake; and desiring to accompany so righteous a man in so good a cause, prophesied with unshaken zeal, in the midst of reigning popery, "that those two bishops and martyrs should light up such a candle in England, as, by God's grace, should never be extinguished." Latimer's age, who was upwards of eighty, made him soon yield up his soul in the flames, without undergoing much pain, and he died with the character of having preserved the piety, simplicity, and integrity of the first, in the corruptions of the last, ages.

We wish we could throw a veil over the next martyr who suffered at the same place; we mean Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury. He had been long confined in prison, but the queen was now resolved to bring him to punishment; and the more fully to glut her revenge, she determined to punish him for heresy rather than for treason, and in September, 1555, he was tried by Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, a commissioner from the pope, and by Dr. Martin and Dr. Godwin, commissioners from the queen, who accused him of having been twice married, of keeping a wife secretly in king Henry VIII's time, and openly in the reign of king Edward VI. of publishing books against, and forsaking, the Romish church; and of denying the real presence of Christ in the sacrament. He owned all these facts, upon which the commissioners cited him to appear before the pope in eight days, which they knew was impossible, since he was their prisoner. Bonner and Thirlby were ordered to degrade him at Oxford, on the fourteenth of February, which Bonner performed with his usual insolence, and with bitter raileries and invectives against the prisoner during the ceremony, while Thirlby melted into tears. They, on this occasion, put him on pontifical robes made of canvas, to make him more ridiculous, and then stripped him of that ludicrous attire, piece by piece, according to the bull and ceremonies of degradation sent from Rome: during which ceremony the good archbishop's behaviour was uniform and becoming. He was not sorry, he said, to be thus cut off with all his pageantry from any relation to the church of Rome; but declared it to be great injustice to condemn him for not going to Rome, when they kept him close confined in prison; and, denying the pope's authority over him, appealed from his sentence to a free general council.

The revenge of the queen, not content with the eternal damnation of Cranmer, which she believed to be certain, and the execution of that dreadful sentence to which he was doomed, incited her also to seek the ruin of his honour and infamy of his name: persons were employed to attack him, not in the way of argumentation and reasoning, against which they knew he was sufficiently prepared, but by policy, insinuation, and address, by representing the dignities and honours to which his character gave him a claim, if he would deserve them by a recantation; and by flattering him with the hopes of long enjoying those powerful friends whom his humanity and beneficence had procured him during the course of his prosperity.

Influenced by that love of life which is inseparable from the human heart, and terrified at the prospect of those dreadful torments to which he was condemned, he suffered, in an unguarded hour, the feelings of nature to over-power his resolution; and he agreed to sign a paper, acknowledging the doctrine of the papal supremacy and of the real presence.

The queen, whose perfidy was only exceeded by her cruelty, resolved that this recantation should not save his life; and she sent orders that he should be commanded to own his errors in church, before the whole people; and that he should from thence be immediately conducted to execution.

Cranmer, whether it was that he had received some notice of their intention, or that he had repented of his weakness and apostacy, surprized the audience by a contrary declaration: he said, that he was sufficiently acquainted with the obedience which he owed to his sovereign, and the laws of the land; but this duty extended no farther than to submit patiently to their commands, and to bear, without resistance, whatever punishments they should inflict upon him; that a superior duty, the duty which he owed his Maker, obliged him to remain in the truth on all occasions, and not to abandon, by a base denial, the holy doctrine which the Supreme Being had imparted to mankind: that there was one error of his life, which, above all others, filled him with the most unfeigned sorrow and repentance, the insincere declaration of faith to which he had unhappily been induced to agree, and which nothing but the fear of death could have extorted from him; that he cheerfully embraced the present opportunity of atoning for his crime, by a sincere and open recantation, and was willing to seal with his blood that doctrine which he firmly believed to be revealed from Heaven; and that as his hand had erred by betraying his heart, it should first be punished, and, by a severe but just doom, first expiate the guilt of that crime which it had been the instrument of committing.

He was thence conducted to the stake amidst the shouts and insults of the catholics: and having now collected all the force and vigour of his mind, he bore their scorn, as well as the torture of his punishment, with surprizing courage: he stretched out his hand, and without discovering the least sign of weakness, or even of feeling, held it in the flames until it dropped off. His mind seemed to be wholly possessed with reflections of his former fault, and he was heard to exclaim several times "This unworthy hand has offended!"

Satisfied with that atonement, he re-assumed a wonderful composure and serenity of countenance: and when the fire surrounded his body, he seemed to be entirely insensible of all his outward sufferings, and, by the force of hope and Christian fortitude, to have raised himself above all bodily sensations, and to triumph over the fury of the flames.

It is pretended, that after his body was consumed, his heart was found entire among the ashes, a circumstance which however improbable, yet, being considered as an emblem of his constancy, was fondly believed by the zealous protestants.

He was certainly a man of the most amiable character; alike distinguished by his piety and learning, and possessed of candour, sincerity, benevolence, and indeed of almost every virtue that could render him the object of public esteem and veneration.

Though Cranmer's death happened in the year 1556, yet I have kept his story entire, that I may the better attend the affairs of state.

The Spaniards, by affecting to throw upon the English bishops all the blame of the bloody severities practised at this time, thought to conciliate the affections of that part of the nation who were most disgusted with those proceedings; but finding that the people of England were not so easily to be imposed upon, and that Bonner, though lost to all sense of shame and humanity, could not be brought to brave the whole load of public hatred, the court soon pulled off the mask; the bloody bigotry of the Spanish character now stood confessed in every action, and it was now apparent that a scheme was fixed for introducing into England the Spanish Inquisition.

As it appeared the bishops courts, though extremely arbitrary, and not confined to the ordinary forms of law, were not possessed with sufficient authority, a commission was appointed, by virtue of the queen's prerogative, more effectually to exterminate heresy: Bonner, and twenty unmerciful fiends like himself, were nominated; but any three of them were invested with the powers of the whole.

This commission, which speaks the very soul of the Inquisition, was conceived in these terms: "That, since many false reports were published among the subjects, and many heretical opinions were propagated among them; therefore they were to enquire into those, either by presentments, by witnesses, or any other political way they should think proper; and to search after all heresies; the importers, the sellers, and the readers of all heretical books: they were to punish all misbehaviours and all negligences in any church or chapel, and to try all priests that did not preach the sacrament of the altar; all persons that did not hear mass, or go to their parish-church to service; that refused to go in processions, or did not take holy bread and holy water; and if they found any that did obstinately persevere in such heresies, they were to deliver them into the hands of their ordinaries, to be punished according to the spiritual laws: giving the commissioners full power to proceed as their discretion and consciences should direct them; and to employ all such means as they should judge necessary for the searching of the premisses; empowering them also to summon before them such witnesses as they please, and to compel them to make oath of such things as might discover the matter which they wanted to find out."

To reduce the methods of proceeding in England to a greater similarity with those of the Inquisition, letters were sent to the lord North, and others, commanding them "to put to the torture such obstinate persons as would not confess, and there to order them at their discretion." Secret spies likewise and informers were scattered over the whole kingdom, in imitation of the practice of that infernal tribunal.

Orders were given to the justices of the peace, "that they should call before them one or two honest persons, within their limits, or more, at their discretion, and command them, by oath or otherwise, that they shall secretly learn or search out such persons as shall ill-behave themselves in church, or idly, or shall despise openly by words the king's or queen's proceedings; or endeavour to excite any commotion, or tell any seditious tales or news. And also, that the same person, so to be appointed, shall declare to the same justices of peace, the ill behaviour of lewd disorderly persons, whether it shall shall be for using unlawful games, and such other light behaviour of such suspected persons: and that the same information should be given secretly to the same justices; and the same justices shall summon such accused persons before them, and examine them, without declaring by whom they were accused: and that the justices shall, upon their examination, punish the offenders according as their offences shall appear upon the accusation and examination, by their discretion, either by open punishment or by good abearings."

This tyrannical edict was in some respects even more oppressive than the Inquisition, as it introduced into every part of government the same iniquitous proceedings which that tribunal employs only for the extirpation of heresy. But the court had invented a more expeditious method of suppressing heresy than even the Inquisition itself: they published a proclamation against books of heresy, treason, and sedition, importing, "that whosoever had any of these books, and did not immediately burn them without reading them, or shewing them to any other person, should be deemed rebels, and, without any farther process, be executed by martial law." To such an intolerable and disgraceful slavery were the free born natives of England at that time reduced, by the tyranny of Mary and her Spanish consort!

We have thrown in one groupe almost all the transactions against the reformers, though carried on during the space of three years; not so much as the reader may be affected with the horrors of the scene, as that we may be obliged as little as possible to return to the mention of such shocking and inhuman barbarities.

It is computed, that in that time two hundred and seventy-seven persons were committed to the flames, besides those who were punished by imprisonment and confiscations. Among those who suffered by fire were five bishops, twenty-one clergymen, eight lay gentlemen, eighty-four husbandmen, servants, and labourers, forty-five women, and four children.

That Mary should be guilty of such shocking cruelties is not to be wondered at (for what is there so shocking and cruel, of which a weak, peevish, and bigotted woman may not be guilty?) but it is really surprizing, that, considering the state of the kingdom at that period, when the number of protestants greatly exceeded that of the papists, she was suffered to survive one moment the commission of such horrid barbarities.

The queen having thus, as she probably thought, recommended herself to the favour of Heaven, by the destruction of so many heretics, hoped that Bonner's prayers for the heavenly wit and vigour of her child would happily prove effectual. In these hopes she fondly imagined that she was seized with the pains of child-bed, and couriers were prepared to carry the joyful news of her delivery into foreign countries.

Bonner attributed this happy event, in a great measure, to the influence of his own prayers; caused Te Deum to be sung in his own cathedral; and the curate of St. Anne's, Aldersgate, went so far as to describe from the pulpit the features and lineaments of the young prince, whom he represented as the finest child that was ever born.

But unluckily, the bishop's prayers had not been heard; the queen's zeal for the advancement of popery had not been able to secure the blessings of Heaven; and the curate's description of the infant happened to be a little premature. The queen, after some violent throes, was delivered on the thirteenth of April, not of a child, but of a substance known by the name of a Mole, to her own unspeakable grief as well as to the astonishment of the whole court, and the confusion of Philip, who had flattered himself with the agreeable hopes of uniting England and Spain by the issue of this marriage. This disappointment so soured the minds of Philip and Mary, that they sought to vent their spleen by lighting up anew the flames of persecution, which continued to rage all this summer and autumn, while the king and queen remained at Hampton-court. But let us leave this barbarous scene for a while, to attend foreign affairs.

The emperor Charles V. now broken with infirmities and ill success, had for some time formed the resolution of resigning the cares of his mighty dominions to his son and his brother, but would not hear of any terms of giving peace to Europe at the expence of resigning any of them to the French. He was, however, very ready to hearken to all propositions for peace, and England, never having declared in form for either party, offered her mediation. The court of France did not at this time consider England as indifferent concerning the event of the quarrel, but Henry dreaded nothing so much as to afford any pretext to Mary for openly taking part with her husband in the dispute; he therefore, as the emperor did, accepted the offered mediation, and, though no formal cessation of arms was stipulated, the war this summer went on very languidly in the Low Countries.

Cardinal Pole was glad of this opportunity to exercise his powers in the double capacity of a plenipotentiary from England, and legate from the pope; and having entertained an high opinion of secretary Cecil, he prevailed on him to attend him at the conferences for a peace between the emperor and the French, which were opened on the twenty-third of May, this year, at Merc, a place lying between Ardres, Calais, and Guisnes. Pole was indefatigable in his endeavours to bring about the peace; but both parties insisting obstinately on their own preliminaries, the conferences broke up without any effect.

Philip, disappointed in his hopes of an heir, and conceiving a disgust to the person of his queen, which was by no means agreeable, being, moreover, sent for by his father, who declared his intention of resigning to him his dominions, laid hold of this event to quit the kingdom, and, on the twenty-ninth of August, set sail for Flanders, to the infinite dissatisfaction of the queen, who doated on him to a degree of ridiculous fondness. The emperor, on his son's arrival at Brussels, instructed him every day, for six or seven weeks successively, in the art of government, and advising him to a peace with France, recommended to him several maxims for his conduct, which he afterwards took no care to observe*; by which neglect he, in a few years, lost the best part of those provinces, the sovereignty of which the emperor, in a general assembly sembly of the states, surrendered to him on the twenty-fifth of October.

The unparalleled barbarities which had been exercised against the protestants, had rendered the ministry extremely unpopular, and the effects of the public discontent appeared in the new parliament, which was convoked at Westminster on the twenty-first of October, who, though they confirmed the queen's resignation of the first-fruits and tenths, yet were so much afraid of restoring to the clergy an authority so odious to the nation, so much out of humour at the queen's restitution of church-lands, that they were hardly persuaded to grant a moderate supply; and having, besides, in the course of their proceedings, given many strong tokens of their dislike to the court-measures, the queen thought proper to dissolve them on the ninth of December, but not till they had passed some memorable acts, which will be noticed in their proper place.

Those who seem to judge most rationally upon this sudden change of temper in the house of commons, who had so blindly run into all the schemes of the court, in their preceding sessions, in favour of popery, attribute it to the death of Gardiner, which happened during this session, and to the withdrawing of their pensions, which the queen was no longer in a capacity to advance for their votes, she having given up the church-lands, and king Philip's treasures being pretty well exhausted, or appropriated to his own use.

Gardiner, lord bishop of Winchester, and lord-chancellor of England, was the natural son of sir Richard Woodville, brother to Elizabeth, consort of king Edward IV. and it was on account of this consanguinity that Henry VIII. promoted him to the bishopric of Winchester. He is said to have felt some remorse in his last moments, and to have exclaimed, "I have sinned with Peter, but I have not wept with Peter!" He died at Whitehall, of a suppression of urine, on the twelfth of November, at midnight, to the no small grief of the queen, who lost in him her ablest counsellor, and one that had more influence than all the rest on the parliament: but his death was matter of great joy to the people, especially the protestants, of whose persecution he had been the adviser and promoter. He was certainly a priest of a selfish character; a profound dissembler, and of a proud, vindictive, cruel disposition. Burnet says he understood the canon and civil law as well as most of his time: he wrote Latin with ease and purity; and few of his contemporaries excelled him in the knowledge of the Greek language. As to his person, bishop Poiner, his successor, describes it thus: "He was of a swarthy colour, downcast look, overwhelming brows; his eyes were deep sunk in his head, his nose hooked, wide nostrils and mouth, large hands, and long talons rather than nails on his toes, which made his gait awkward and shuffling, from the uneasiness they gave him in walking. He was buried in the cathedral at Winchester, where his effigies upon his monument is yet to be seen, though somewhat defaced.

avoid the curiosity of searching into things done in private: to leave the secrets of men's hearts and thoughts to God, and the chastisement of interior offences to the divine vengeance; since, what the eyes of men could not see, it was not fit for their hands to punish; and particularly to keep a strict rein

Upon Gardiner's death, the great-seal was given to Nicholas Hall, master of the Rolls, who kept it however not quite two months; for on the first of January, 1556, Heath, archbishop of York, was made lord-chancellor of England, and Paget lord privy-seal: and as the king was now daily expected to return to England, the court, by way of preparation for his reception, resolved, if possible, to put a stop, by the most cruel punishments, to those expressions of pity which people of all ranks and denominations discovered towards the suffering heretics; even the magistrates, to whom the cruel orders were directed, were sometimes known to be less brutal than the queen and her government wished for. On January 14, therefore, a letter was written to the lord-mayor and sheriffs of London, "requiring them to give such substantial order therein, when any obstinate men, condemned by the order of the laws, should be delivered to be punished for heresy, that there be a great number of officers and other men appointed to be at the execution, who may be charged to see such as shall misuse themselves, either by comforting, aiding, or praising the offenders, or otherwise use themselves to the ill example of others, to be apprehended, and committed to ward; and besides, to give commandment, that no householder should suffer any of his apprentices, or other servants, to be abroad, other than such as their master will answer for: and that this order be always observed in like causes hereafter."

Upon Cranmer's execution, which happened on the twenty-first of March, cardinal Pole, who had now taken priest's orders, was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and by this office, as well as his legatine authority, he was naturally placed at the head of the English church; but, though he had always disapproved the sanguinary method of converting heretics, and considered the reformation of the clergy as the more commendable and even more effectual method for that purpose, he found his authority too weak to withstand the cruel and barbarous zeal of the queen and her counsellors: which has occasioned some writers to brand his memory with a cruelty which does not seem to have made any part of his character.

Philip was now become master of all the treasures of the Indies, and of the most fertile and extensive dominions in Europe, by the voluntary resignation of the emperor Charles V. That prince had, in the beginning of his reign, found it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to govern with proper care his very distant and extensive dominions; and, in order to ease himself of part of the burthen, he had procured his brother Ferdinand to be elected king of the Romans, with a prospect of his succeeding to the Imperial dignity as well as his other German dominions. But having afterwards extended his views, and formed designs of aggrandizing his family, he could not, without uneasiness, bear the thoughts of dismembering such considerable states, and endeavoured to persuade Ferdinand, by the most tempting offers and most pressing importunities, to give up his pretensions in favour of Philip. Finding his brother lent a deaf ear to all his remonstrances, he resigned the Imperial crown, with his other dignities, and Ferdinand, according to the usual custom, applied to the pope for his coronation; but the haughty pontiff refused to comply with his request, and alleged, that though on the death of an emperor he was bound in duty to crown the prince elected, yet in case of a resignation the right devolved to the holy see, and it belonged to the pope alone to name an emperor.

The truth is, pope Paul IV. had conceived the most implacable hatred to the house of Austria; and though a truce of five years had been concluded between France and Spain, on the fifth of February this year, he persuaded Henry to break it, and engaged to assist him in re-conquering the kingdom of Naples and the other territories to which the crown of France laid claim in Italy. With this view he himself had actually commenced hostilities against the duke of Alva, viceroy of Naples; and the duke of Guise being sent by the French king with forces to second his holiness's operations, the renewal of the war between the two crowns seemed unavoidable. Philip, though not so warlike, was full as ambitious, as his father, and he hoped that, by his artifice, policy, and address, he should get the better of all his enemies, and extend his authority and dominion: for this reason, as well as from a desire of settling his new domains, he was desirous of living on good terms with France; but when he found that Henry had attacked him in such an open and unprovoked manner, that he could not, consistent with his own honour, put up with the affront, he began to prepare for war with equal diligence and success.

In order to strengthen himself with a respectable aid, Philip tried to engage the queen and the English nation in his cause against the French king. Had the matter, indeed, solely depended upon Mary, she was incapable of refusing the demand of a husband she so tenderly loved; but she had little influence in the council, and still less among her people; and her government, which was daily growing more unpopular, seemed unable to support itself even during a profound peace, much less if a war was kindled against France, and (which appeared to be a necessary consequence) with Scotland also, assisted by that powerful kingdom.

The king had shewn so apparent a contempt for the queen, that her government became not only detestable, but disagreeable: but, however, the neglect of her husband tended only to inflame the love of the doating Mary, and she spent the greatest part of her time in solitude, where she gave vent to her passion, either in tears, or in writing fond epistles to Philip, who seldom obliged her with any answer, and scarce condescended to assume the appearance of love, or gratitude, towards her. The chief part of the government which employed her attention, was to squeeze money from her subjects, in order to supply his wants; and as she had received but a small subsidy from the parliament, she had now recourse to methods the most arbitrary and illegal. She demanded a loan of sixty thousand pounds from one thousand persons, whom she thought, from their attachment to her, would readily comply; she exacted a general loan of one hundred pounds from every person possessed of twenty pounds per annum; she extorted sixty thousand marks from seven thousand yeomen, who had not contributed to the former loans; and she exacted thirty-six thousand pounds more from the cloth-merchants of London trading to Antwerp, which they refused, having advanced her great sums already. Upon this refusal, and having received advice that they had shipped great quantities of cloth for Antwerp fair, she seized upon the ships and cargoes, laying upon them a new subsidy of twenty shillings a-piece, by an arbitrary stretch of royal authority: to get this imposition abolished, the merchants were forced to advance forty thousand pounds, and to engage for two thousand more, payable the next month at farthest.

All these violent and oppressive measures were pursued at a time when England enjoyed a profound tranquility, and when Mary herself had no other occasion for money but to satisfy the exorbitant demands of a husband, who was equally regardless of her love and her generosity, and attended to nothing but his own interest.

While these things were transacting a plot was discovered for robbing the Exchequer, and raising a rebellion against the queen. It was said to have been discovered by one White, an accomplice. On the eighteenth of March, the queen's guards conducted to the Tower John Throgmorton, Henry Peckham, Woodhouse Bethel, and about twelve or thirteen persons more, of inferior note, whose imprisonment occasioned several others to fly. A warrant was likewise issued out for apprehending sir Anthony Kingston, but he died as the guards were bringing him up to London. The April following, Throgmorton and Woodhouse, who been governor of the Isle of Wight, were tried, condemned, and executed. Henry Peckham, son of sir Edward Peckham, and John Daniel, were tried and condemned on the seventh of May, but not executed till the seventh of July following. One Stanton, who was called a captain, was arraigned and executed for the same plot, on the twelfth of May. It seems the design was deeper laid, than the government at first apprehended; for, on the fourth of April, a proclamation was issued against the lord Henry Dudley, two gentlemen of the name of Ashton, two of the name of Horsey, two of the name of Tremain, and seven other gentlemen of fortune, for having fled beyond sea on account of the said plot. On the twenty-ninth of April, sir William Courtney, sir John Perrot, sir John Pollard, sir Nicholas Arnold (the same who had given evidence against sir Nicholas Throgmorton), and sir John Chichester, were brought prisoners from the western counties, and sent to the Tower. It afterwards appeared that the French agents had been tampering with the gentlemen who had been executed, and that some moved by avarice, others by detestation of the government's cruelty, and some from an opinion of its weakness, had entered into dangerous measures.

The news of the death of Courtney, earl of Devonshire, which arrived about this time, filled the queen with so much pleasure, that she could not refrain from expressing her joy in public: and being now grown less jealous of the princess Elizabeth, she began to treat her with less severity; the guard was taken off her, and the princess, being invited to court, came to Somerset-house in November.

ember. The particular reason of this invitation was to propose a match to her with the duke of Savoy, which the princess declined with the better grace, as she had, a little before, absolutely refused Eric, king of Sweden, whose ambassador had made the overture in his master's behalf. As this was done without the queen's knowledge, Elizabeth very prudently gave a flat denial; and Mary, being acquainted with it, approved her sister's conduct: however, sir Thomas Pope, one of her keepers, was ordered to feel her pulse how she stood affected to the duke of Savoy; and upon his intimating that it could not be thought her highness would be averse to marrying, if an honourable match was offered by the queen, or such an one could be brought about with her majesty's consent, she told him very seriously, and with a solemn profession of speaking truth from her heart, that she would not change her condition though she were offered the greatest prince in Europe. This refusal, and the great court that was paid to Elizabeth during her stay in London, so nettled the queen, that, though the princess had been invited to pass the whole winter about court, she was sent away in a great hurry, a little before Christmas, under a guard to her house at Hatfield, and Mary not only renewed her ill treatment, but even resumed her design of getting her declared a bastard, and excluded from the succession; but happily this diabolical scheme was defeated.

The queen in the mean time was much puzzled to find a pretext for a quarrel with France. She had tried her council on this head, but they were plainly against it; they strenuously insisted on the marriage-articles between her and Philip; they represented the unsettled state of the English government, the domestic factions which divided the kingdom, and the low condition of the public revenues, and they signified their apprehensions, that the natural tendency of all these measures was to bring the nation into a total dependence on Spanish councils: they said they were willing to give their consent for assisting Philip with six thousand foot and six hundred horse, for the defence of the Low Countries, according to the treaty with the late emperor, but were absolutely against a war.

Mary, restrained by no faith of treaties nor scruple of conscience, and burning with a desire to satisfy her husband, used all her endeavours to conquer the obstinacy of her council: after employing other menaces of a more violent nature, she threatened to discard them all from the board, and to chuse counsellors who would be more obedient to her will; but all to no purpose, for she could not procure a single vote for declaring war against France. To add to her vexation, she received a letter from Philip, in which he told her plainly, that he would not set foot in England till she had declared war against France, and brought about the marriage between the duke of Savoy and her sister Elizabeth, as his honour and interest were concerned in carrying these two points. This was a terrible declaration to a woman of Mary's disposition; she renewed her instances for his coming over, assuring him that his presence would procure him whatever he pleased. Thus stood matters at the close of this year.

Towards the beginning of the succeeding one, 1557, the queen, to divert her impatience for her husband's absence, had retired to Greenwich; in the mean time Philip did all he could to entrap her into a declaration of war against France; but neither he nor his emissaries could carry their point without some difficulty and a pretty deal of art. A person was employed to make a private overture to the French ministry on the part of the protestant inhabitants of Calais, to betray the town into the hands of their king, if he would receive and protect them; Henry seemed to lend a favourable ear to the proposal, and actually entered into a negotiation upon the subject. Wootton, Philip's agent, sent his nephew over to England with an account of the whole to the queen, who took fire at it, and became, or pretended to become, entirely satisfied of the ill designs of the French against her dominions. Accordingly, on the nineteenth of February, she ordered forces to be levied, as if open war had been proclaimed against that crown, and nominated the earl of Pembroke to command the English troops abroad, and he actually went over to Calais with a vast attendance of noblemen and gentlemen. From that time the court of France entertained no doubt of the queen's intending to take part with her husband in the war, and from thence omitted no opportunity, even before the same was declared, to distress her.

It was the twentieth of March before the long-expected Philip came to Greenwich, from whence he and the queen proceeded with great pomp to Westminster, where they were soon alarmed by dreadful apprehensions from the North, which, however, turned out to be the means of procuring them their ardent desire of coming to an open rupture with France. Thomas Stafford, who was the lineal descendant of the late duke of Buckingham, and consequently bore no remote relation to the crown, had been for some time a refugee at the court of France, being joined by several other disaffected persons there, and, unhappily for themselves, mistaking the discontent of the people for a general disaffection to the government, they attempted to stir up an insurrection; and, landing, in Scotland towards the end of April, marched directly to Scarborough, and seized the castle, when Stafford assumed the title of Protector of the kingdom, and published a manifesto, pretending that the queen had forfeited her right to the crown by introducing Spaniards into England: but the enterprize, which seems to have been too romantic for any to embark in but men of the most desperate fortunes, proved fatal to Stafford and his followers, for he was soon defeated and taken prisoner by the earl of Westmoreland, and sent up to London, where he was executed, on the twenty-eighth of May. This affair, with the repeated instances of Mary, and the personal application of Philip, or, what is still more probable, the sums of money they lavished on this occasion, got the better of the council's resistance, and they resolved to declare war against France, which was accordingly done in the month of June; and the late invasion, which Stafford and his accomplices declared to have been promoted and assisted by king Henry, was urged as one of the reasons for breaking with that monarch; and eight thousand men were sent over to the earl of Pembroke, to be by him marched into the Low Countries, to join Philibert, duke of Savoy, Philip's general.

Philip, having gained his point, could not be retained an instant by all the tears and intreaties of his love-sick wife, but hastened over, in the following month, to Brussels; while the duke of Savoy, strengthened by the junction of the English troops with his army, entered Picardy, and invested St. Quintin† with all his forces; and as the place was poorly fortified, and defended only by a weak garrison, he hoped that in a few days he should compel it to surrender: but admiral Coligny, the governor, thinking it his duty to save so important a fortress, threw himself into St. Quintin with some battalions of French and Scots, and, by his exhortation and example, encouraged the soldiers to make a bold and vigorous defence. In the mean time he dispatched an express to his uncle, the constable de Montmorency, who headed the French army, desiring a supply of men; and that general advanced to the place with his whole army, in order to facilitate the entrance of those succours.

The duke of Savoy, who was one of the greatest generals of the age, being informed of the design of the French, fell upon the reinforcement with such irresistible fury, that not above five hundred men got into the place; then attacking the constable, he routed his army, took him prisoner, and killed two thousand five hundred of his men, amongst whom were many princes and noblemen, besides a much greater number made prisoners.

The event of this battle, which was fought on the tenth of August, St. Laurence's day, filled the whole kingdom of France with the utmost consternation: and the duke of Savoy, to improve it more to his advantage, detached the earl of Bedford, immediately after the battle, with two thousand English, and two thousand Spaniards under the count of Egmont, to make an inroad into France, which they now ravaged for two-and-twenty miles without meeting the least resistance. The Parisians, in their first fright, began to fortify their capital with the utmost hurry and expedition; and had the Spaniards immediately advanced thither, they would certainly have made themselves masters of the place; but they proceeded with the siege of St. Quintin, which held out by the bravery of the admiral for seventeen days, when it was taken by assault, and that brave officer, with his brother and all those that survived of the garrison, were made prisoners. In the mean time the French ministry dispatched courier after courier to recall the duke of Guise and his army from Italy. As for Philip, after reducing Ham and Chatillet, finding the season so far advanced that he could not think of prosecuting his conquests, he broke up his camp, and dispersed his troops in winter-quarters about the middle of October.

The victory of St. Quintin was celebrated in England with extravagant demonstrations of joy: but when pope Paul first understood that Mary had declared war against France, he was violently exasperated against cardinal Pole, as if he had adopted that measure, and would have recalled him immediately, had not sir Edward Carne, the English ambassador at his court, represented the injury he would do to religion by such a proceeding; but when the news of the battle arrived, he was seized with a transport of rage, and resolved to sacrifice Pole to his revenge. He sent for Peyton, the queen's confessor, to Rome, where he bestowed upon him a cardinal's hat, appointed him his legate in England, and charged him with a decree, by which Pole was recalled: but the queen, being informed of this mandate, gave notice to Peyton, that should he attempt to set foot in England, she would cause him to be punished with all the rigour of the Præmunire. This letter stopped the new cardinal in his journey; and the pope, finding himself unable to cope with the duke of Alva, concluded a peace with Spain, and, by an article of the treaty, Pole was re-established in his legatine functions.

While these things were transacting the flames of persecution still continued to blaze with unremitting fury, and numbers were almost daily burned at Smithfield, and at different places in the several counties. The queen, not contented with the endeavours of her ministry to extirpate the protestant religion, had resolved to strengthen the interest of the Roman catholics by restoring some old, and founding some new, monasteries: she certainly would have re-established all the religious houses which had been suppressed, if the fear of disobliging the nobility had not deterred her from the execution of her design. Several members of the house of commons, in the last session, hearing such a proposal mentioned, laid their hands upon their swords, saying, they knew how to defend their property. Mary, being informed of this opposition, postponed her scheme to a more favourable opportunity: in the mean time she commissioned Bonner, and others, to erase from the public records all the transactions against the pope and the monks, during the latter part of the reign of her father, Henry VIII. particularly an account of the visitations and renunciation of the papal authority made by the monks and abbots: and this year the abbey and sanctuary of Westminster were revived; and a felon having escaped out of jail and taken refuge there, the monks refused to deliver him up to the civil authority, and when the magistrates would have forcibly dragged him from thence, the queen interposed her authority, and obliged them to desist. The melancholy apprehensions rising from such proceedings were vastly increased by the formidable disposition which the Scots were now making for invading England: this naturally leads me to describe the situation of affairs in Scotland at this time*.

The reader may remember, that when the queen-dowager of Scotland returned to that kingdom from France, she had gotten herself declared regent during the minority of her daughter, in the room of Hamilton, earl of Arran, afterwards created duke of Chatelerault, in France, and thenceforth assumed the name and exercised the authority of regent.

Hostilities had no sooner commenced between France and England, than Henry applied to the regent of Scotland, requiring her to take part in the quarrel; and she, having convened the states

* In the year, 1557, there was so great a scarcity of corn, that wheat was sold for two pounds thirteen shillings and four pence per quarter, malt at two pounds four shillings, and pease at two pounds six shillings and eight pence. On the thirtieth of April, Thomas Piercy was created baron Piercy, and, on the first of May, earl of Northumberland; from whom were descended the late dukes of Somerset, as is Elizabeth, baroness Piercy, lady of the right honourable Hugh, earl of Northumberland. On the fifteenth of July died, at Chelsea, Anne of Cleves, the fourth wife of Henry VIII.

of the kingdom, at Newbottle, desired them to agree to a declaration of war against England. But the Scottish nobility, who were as jealous of the French, as the English were of Spanish influence, flatly refused to grant her request; and she was obliged to make use of a stratagem, in order to accomplish her aim.

She ordered one d'Oisel, a Frenchman, who had attended her in Scotland as ambassador from Henry, to begin some fortifications at Eyemouth, a place which had been demolished by the last treaty with Edward; and when the garrison of Berwick, as might naturally be supposed, made an inroad to defeat the undertaking, she artfully employed this pretence to inflame the resentment of the Scottish nation, and to make them embark in a war with England.

The animosity of the Scots, however, was carried no farther than by committing some depredations on the northern counties: and when d'Oisel, of his own accord, undertook the siege of Werk castle, he was instantly ordered to desist, and was severely reprimanded by the council.

In order to strengthen the alliance between France and Scotland, and to augment the influence of the former kingdom, Henry II. thought proper to finish the marriage between the young queen and the dauphin; and commissioners were appointed by the Scottish parliament to assist at this ceremony, and to regulate the terms of the contract.

These commissioners were the archbishop of Glasgow, the bishops of Ross and the Orkneys, the earls of Rothes and Cassils, the lords Fleming and Seton, James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, natural brother to the queen, and Erskine of Dun. The instructions given to these deputies imported, that they should obtain a solemn engagement from the queen and dauphin, obliging them to maintain the laws and privileges of Scotland; and they should procure a renewal of the French king's promise, to support, in case of the queen's death, the succession of the earl of Arran, now dignified with the title of duke of Chatelerault.

Both these conditions were readily granted; but the court of France employed a very base and perfidious artifice to defeat these stipulations: they secretly persuaded the young queen, whose tender age and inexperience may well free her from any share of the guilt, to subscribe three papers; by one of which she made over the kingdom of Scotland in gift to the king of France, in the event of her dying without children; by another she mortgaged it to him for a million of crowns of gold, or such greater sum as he should have expended in her maintenance and support; and by a third, she declared, that whatever will or deed she had been obliged, or should hereafter be obliged to sign, concerning the succession of the crown, it should be entirely void and of no effect, and that her real sense and intention was expressed in the first paper.

The marriage was celebrated at Paris, in the spring of the ensuing year; the deputies, in the name of the states of Scotland, swore allegiance to the queen, and (during the continuance of the marriage) to the king-dauphin, as he was now called; and every thing seemed to be conducted with the greatest harmony and concord. But when the commissioners were desired to deliver up the crown and other ensigns of royalty, they replied, that they had no power to take such a step; and they soon after set out on their return for Scotland. Before they embarked, however, no less than four of them died within a few days of each other; and as the queen's uncles were known to be highly incensed at them, on account of their late refusal, they were commonly supposed to have been poisoned by orders from these noblemen.

In the latter end of this year Philip sent intimation to Mary, that, by papers taken among the baggage of the admiral de Coligny, there was great reason to believe that the court of France had projected some scheme against Calais, and offered to supply her with troops for the guard of that fortress, which was in a defenceless condition. The council looked upon this intimation as a stratagem of Philip, to gain possession of Calais, and the queen not only declined accepting his offer, but also neglected to put the place in a posture of defence, notwithstanding the repeated solicitations of the lord Wentworth, the governor.

The French king had created the duke of Guise his lieutenant-general for the whole kingdom of France, on his return from Italy: but that general, not content with defending the frontiers, resolved, even in the depth of winter, to undertake an enterprize which France, during her greatest successes, had always considered as impossible, and had seldom presumed to attempt; this was no less than the reduction of Calais. In fine, all the necessary arrangements being taken for that purpose, he set down before the place on the first of January, 1558, to the amazement of all Europe, but of none more than the English nation, who were wrapped up in full security of the French being unable to attempt any enterprize of consequence so soon after the dreadful defeat at St. Quintin.

The place was commanded by the lord Wentworth, a brave and experienced officer, whose garrison consisted only of five hundred soldiers and about two hundred townsmen. It was surrounded by morasses on the land side, by which it could only be approached by a dyke, in the middle of a morass, at the head of which was a bridge, defended by a fort called Newenham, and being upwards of a quarter of a mile from the town: near this fort there was another, called St. Agatha, of less importance; and the entrance into the haven was defended, as it is now, by the castle of Rysbank.

At the time the duke of Guise began his march for Calais, a fleet of French ships were sent into the Channel, under colour of cruising upon the English trading vessels, but with orders to hold themselves in readiness upon the coast for an important service: and these were afterwards made use of in attacking the fortifications by sea. The first operation of the duke of Guise was against fort Agatha, which the English, after a gallant defence, were forced to abandon; and they then threw themselves into fort Newenham, which was immediately invested by the enemy; and at the same time the fleet cannonaded the Rysbank, which, as has been said, secured the entrance of the harbour; and both these castles seemed to be altogether untenable. Lord Wentworth finding that the greater part of his weak garrison was shut up in these two forts, sent them orders to capitulate, and join him in Calais, which, without their assistance, he was totally incapable of defending. The garrison of Newenham were so fortunate as to accomplish this junction; but that of Rysbank could not procure such honourable terms, and were compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war.

All the avenues to the palace being now secured, the duke of Guise, with inexpressible labour, by the help of hurdles, pitched over, formed a road through the morais, by which a large detachment of his army lodged themselves behind some heights, where they could not be annoyed from the town, and from whence they directed a battery of fifteen large cannon against the castle, in which he presently made a large breach, so as to render it practicable to be stormed. He then ordered d'Andelot, brother of the admiral de Coligny, to draw the waters off from the ditch. This was effected with surprizing dispatch in one night's time. The next day the duke ordered a general assault, which was made with such fury, that the breach was carried by storm, and the French effected a lodgment in the castle. On the ensuing night, Wentworth endeavoured to regain this post; but having lost two hundred men in the attempt, and the duke of Guise pouring such numbers into the castle, as made any further resistance a madness, the lord Wentworth, on the seventeenth, capitulated on the following terms, the best he could obtain in his distressed situation, namely, "That he himself was to remain prisoner, with fifty of the chief of the garrison: that the rest should have liberty to retire to England or Flanders: and that the place, with all its provisions, ammunition, furniture, and riches, should be immediately delivered up to the French."

Ham and Guisnes were both reduced by the twenty-second, and thus the duke of Guise, in less than a month, in the depth of winter, reconquered this important place, which had cost Edward III. a siege of eleven months, at the head of a numerous army, flushed with the glory they had lately gained in the plains of Cressy; and the English now saw themselves stripped of all they had held for two hundred and ten years in France. The people of England, instead of expressing rage, shewed despondency, under so many disgraces and calamities. As for Mary, she was so sensibly affected with the loss, that she abandoned herself to despair, and repeatedly declared to those about her, "that her end was near at hand, though they were strangers to the cause of her death; but if they would know it hereafter, they must dissect her, and should find Calais engraven on her heart."

The last parliament of this reign sat on the twentieth of January, 1558; but as the ministry were more intent upon persecution at home than how to recover their losses abroad, they rejected a proposal made by Philip of assisting them to the utmost of his power to recover Calais, before the season would permit the French to repair its works. In short, the parliament was prorogued, on the seventh of March to the seventh of November following. This quick dismissal seems to have been occasioned by the great complaints that were made all over the nation of the pernicious councils of the ministry, and of the queen's restitution of churchlands and foundation of monasteries: however, before its rising, The parliament voted a sufficient subsidy for the defence of the kingdom against all invasions. In this session Ambrose and Robert Dudley, sons of the late duke Northumberland, were restored in blood.

About the end of March, the persecution against the protestants was renewed with greater fury than ever; the queen, though sensibly drooping to her grave (so greatly was her dropsy increased), issued a proclamation, "That whoever were possessed of any heretical books, and did not presently burn them, without reading, should be esteemed rebels, and be executed without delay by the martial law:" and five persons were burned at Canterbury, part of thirty-nine that suffered for religion in several places during this year.

All the spring of this year was taken up in refitting the navy; and the money granted by the parliament enabled the government to equip one hundred and forty sail; which being reinforced by thirty Flemish ships, with a body of six thousand land forces, were sent to make a descent on the coast of France, near Brest: but the preparations for this surprize were conducted with so little secrecy and dispatch, that the French got intelligence of the design, and put all their sea-ports in a posture of defence, so that the English were obliged to reembark with considerable loss, after they had burnt the small town of Conquet, where they landed.

But a small squadron of ten English ships had soon after an opportunity of retorting upon the French this damage and disgrace. The marshal de Thermes, the new governor of Calais, had invaded Flanders with an army of fourteen thousand men; and having crossed the Aa (a river of France, in the province of Picardy), had reduced Dunkirk and Berg St. Winoc, and proceeded so far as Nieuport; but being overtaken by the Spaniards, under count Egmont, Philip's general, near Gravelines, the French marshal was defeated, with great slaughter, and himself, with his principal officers, taken prisoner. This victory was entirely owing to the English men of war, who, chancing to come up the harbour while the battle was maintained with equal fury on both sides, charged the French in flank with their great guns, insomuch that the rout began from that quarter.

As the French army, thus ruined, had been drawn out of Calais and other neighbouring garrisons, a fair opportunity was now offered for the recovery of that place, in which the fleet and forces that plundered Conquet might have proved very useful, and were ready for the service; the queen had likewise another army on foot, for her husband's service; but her council had no vigour, and Philip was too indifferent about everything that regarded the interest of England; and, notwithstanding the two signal victories he had so lately obtained, he was disposed to conclude the war by a treaty, which was accordingly set on foot at the abbey of Cercamp, being managed by the constable de Montmorency, the marshal de St. André, the cardinal of Lorraine (brother to the duke of Guise), Morvilliers, bishop of Orleans, and l'Aubespine, secretary of state, on the part of France; and on that of Spain, by the duke of Alva, the prince of Orange, and Granville, bishop of Arras. These plenipotentiaries agreed readily to a suspension of arms on the frontiers till the twenty-eighth of October, which was afterwards prolonged, and both armies were put into winter-quarters.

In the mean while Mary received overtures for a peace between England, France, and Spain; and being broken both in health and spirit, she readily readily listened to the advice of her counsellors, who were for having peace at any rate; she therefore named the earl of Arundel, the bishop of Ely, and Dr. Wootton, for her plenipotentiaries to assist at the future conferences, which were to be renewed in October, and Cambray was the place appointed for the congress.

The English parliament meeting on the fifth of November, the queen demanded assistance to continue the war, in case the negotiation should miscarry. The house of commons, however, were so little inclined to grant her request, that she was obliged, on the fourteenth, to send the chancellor and ten other lords to lay the ill state of her affairs before them, and pray them to hasten the necessary supplies. This solicitation producing some effect, the commons took the matter into consideration, and debated, that and the two following days, upon a subsidy: but the queen's death put an end to the consultation. She had been some time afflicted with a dropsy, the consequence of her false conception, and having pursued an improper regimen, her distemper became every day more inveterate; her malady was still farther inflamed by the anxiety of her mind, which was now tormented with the most painful reflections: the consciousness of being detested by her subjects; the prospect of Elizabeth's succession to the throne; the overthrow of the catholic religion; grief for the loss of Calais; and, above all, the distracting thought of soon seeing herself bereft for ever of the company of her husband Philip, who, on the death of his father, the late emperor, Charles V. (which happened in September this year) had determined to settle in Spain, during the remainder of his life: all these disagreeable reflections preyed upon her mind, and threw her into a lingering fever, of which she died, on the seventeenth of November, a little before day-break, in the forty-third year of her age, after a reign of five years, four months and eleven days. Cardinal Pole, who was ill at the same time, did not survive her sixteen hours.

No nation had ever a more signal deliverance than the divine Providence now wrought for England, by taking off Mary in so critical a juncture, on the eve of a peace, which would have enabled her and Philip to pursue their detestable scheme for subverting the constitution of the kingdom and enslaving a disunited people, hopeless of any foreign succour, and which had been long fixed for the time of its execution. Her funeral was solemnized on the fourteenth of December, at Westminster, with a mass of Requiem, in the usual form of the Romish church, and her body was interred in the chapel of Henry VII. her grand-father.

Mary's character is so strongly marked in every action of her bloody and inglorious reign, that we may well spare ourselves the disagreeable task of a recapitulation; we shall therefore only observe, with one of our old historians, that of all the sovereigns of England since the conquest, her reign was the shortest, excepting only that of the tyrant Richard III. but much more bloody than his was; a greater number of persons having been put to death for religion's sake, during the short time of her reign, than in any king's time since Lucius, the first establisher of the Gospel in this realm.

E L I Z A B E T H. The fifth Sovereign of ENGLAND of the House of TUDOR. A. D. 1558.

THE death of queen Mary at a time when the popish faction ran so high and tyrannized over the protestants, threw her arbitrary council into the utmost consternation; but as the parliament was then sitting, and in a very bad humour with the ministry, this latter, not daring to act of their own authority, after a few hours concealment of her death, informed the house of lords of this event, who, without much consultation concerning the rights of the other claimants of the crown, declared unanimously for the princess Elizabeth; and sending for the commons, acquainted them, by the mouth of Heath, lord high-chancellor, with their resolution. The commons concurred with the lords, and Elizabeth was the same day (November 17) proclaimed at the usual places, while the protestants and papists seemed to vie with each other in their demonstrations of joy.

The princess Elizabeth was not then in the Tower of London, as some historians have asserted, but at Bishop's Hatfield, in Hertfordshire, where she received information of the steps taken in her favour by the parliament, and was there also proclaimed; and the earls of Arundel and Pembroke, the lord Clinton, sir Ralph Sadler, sir Richard Sackville, sir Ambrose Cave, sir Edward Rogers, sir Thomas

Parry, and sir William Cecil repairing thither, she formed of them a small privy-council, for the ordering of such matters as required an immediate dispatch.

The first step of her government was to issue proclamations all over the kingdom, strictly enjoining "all her subjects to keep the peace, forbear all attempts, upon any pretence whatever, to break or alter any order or usage at that time established." This prudent charge was given to prevent such disorders as there was reason to apprehend from the intemperate zeal of some of the reformed, who, following the precedent set them by the popish party in the late reign, and presuming upon the queen's supposed affection to the protestant religion, might, without waiting for her royal warrant, proceed, in an illegal and riotous manner, to demolish images, and restore the service used in the days of Edward VI.

In the present situation of affairs a sudden transition would have been highly impolitic, and even indecent; and the happy effect of her prudent temporizing, was her undisputed accession to the throne. Her compliances during the late reign had given the papists hopes that she was not so much an enemy to their religion, as to the cruel and bloody methods made use of to enforce it; while the protestants, on surer foundations, knew her to be truly a friend to their more humane and enlightened doctrine: to keep fair with all parties therefore, she suffered men of both denominations to find alike seats in the council of state, which had in her sister's time been composed entirely of Roman catholics; and although the most obnoxious of them, on account of their bloody proceedings, were excluded, the queen still retained such of the old counsellors as were most eminent for their quality, talents, wisdom, reputation, and experience. These were,

Heath, archbishop of York and lord-chancellor.

William Pawlet, marquis of Winchester and lord high-treasurer.

Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel.

Francis Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury.

Edward Stanley, earl of Derby.

William Herbert, earl of Pembroke.

Edward Fiennes, lord Clinton and lord high-admiral.

William, lord Howard, afterward earl of Effingham, lord-chamberlain.

Sir Thomas Cheney.

Sir William Petre.

Sir John Mason.

Sir Richard Sackville. And

Dr. Wootton, dean of Canterbury.

But it is to be observed, that in admitting these reputed zealous Roman catholics, Elizabeth thought herself pretty sure of their compliance with her intentions in favouring the reformation in the church, who had complied with all the changes of religion, backward and forward, ever since latter end of the reign of Henry VIII. and done it so artfully in all those revolutions as to be constantly employed. However, she thought proper to join with them a certain number of protestants, on whom she was certain she could rely: these were,

William Parr, marquis of Northampton, whom she restored to all his honours.

Francis Russell, earl of Bedford.

Sir Thomas Parry, made comptroller of the household.

Sir Edward Rogers, made vice-chamberlain and captain of the body-guards.

Sir William Cecil, principal secretary of state.

Sir Robert Dudley, made master of the horse.

Sir Ambrose Cave. And

Sir Nicholas Bacon: which last had, some little time afterwards, the custody of the great-seal given him, with the title of lord-keeper.

The like judicious blending was made among the subordinate ministers, particularly the justices of the peace: a new set of gentlemen, known to be of the reformed religion, or well affected to it, being added to the former commission for each county, who were all papists. She also joined lord Howard of Effingham to Mary's plenipotentiaries for negotiating a peace with France.

We shall omit all the particulars of Elizabeth's progress from Hatfield to the Tower, which she entered on the twenty-eighth of November; but are to observe, that no day passed without a council, in which every thing was conducted with that order and œconomy which so eminently distinguished her person and government.

The usual compliments on her accession to the throne being over, the queen gave orders for securing all the sea-ports of the kingdom. She sent a new commission to sir Thomas Radcliffe (brother to the earl of Sussex), lord-lieutenant of Ireland; renewed the judges patents; sent an agent to assure the German protestants of her affections, and ministers to notify her accession to all the principal courts in Europe; and she wrote to sir Edward Carne, her ambassador at Rome, to notify the death of her sister, and her own accession, to the pope; a message which Paul IV. received in the most haughty manner, and answered in terms less agreeable to the politics of his court than to the arrogance of his nature: he told the English minister, "that the kingdom of England was held as a fief of the see of Rome; that Elizabeth could not succeed to it, being illegitimate; that he could not annul the declarations of his predecessors, Clement VII. and Paul III. that it was a great presumption in Elizabeth to assume the style of Queen, and the government of the realm, without his consent; yet, being desirous to shew a fatherly affection towards her, he would do whatever was consistent with the honour of his see in her favour, provided she would renounce her pretensions, and refer herself entirely to his disposition*." Elizabeth was neither surprized nor affected with this answer of his holiness; it only afforded a good reason for recalling Carne: but he, being a rigid papist, did not care to return, especially as he had been offered by Paul the mastership of an hospital at Rome, which had fallen vacant by the death of cardinal Pole.

King Philip received the news of Elizabeth's accession to the throne of England with great surprize; but, in order to secure his interest in that crown, he ordered his minister to pay his compliments to her on that occasion, to propose a marriage between him and her, and, in case of any scruple in regard to their affinity, to tell her that Philip would procure the pope's dispensation. Elizabeth received the proposal with great tokens of esteem for king Philip, but had the address to postpone her final answer, with great civility, in order to preserve a good understanding between England and Spain till she could conclude an advantageous peace with France: but the Spanish minister's importunities increased so much upon this head, that she, unwilling to give a flat denial, resolved to make him desist from his solicitations about marriage, by hastening the execution of her design to make a change in religion, in which she was not a little seconded by the ready compliance of the succeeding parliament.

But though the queen was induced by interest, by education, and her own principles, to favour the Reformation, yet she determined to introduce it gradually, thinking by that means to establish it more securely, and to avoid the inconveniencies to which her sister had been exposed by an instantaneous alteration of worship and a violent invasion of the established religion. With this view, finding that the protestant teachers broke out into a furious attack on the ancient superstition, and that the Romanists retorted upon them with equal acrimony, she published, on the twenty-seventh of December, a proclamation, by which she prohibited all preaching without special licence; and ordered the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Gospel, to be read in English. She at the same time employed Dr. Matthew Parker, in conjunction with six other divines, to review the Liturgy of Edward VI. and to prepare the nation for its introduction into public worship. She published injunctions, that all churches should conform themselves to the practice of her own chapel, and forbade the host to be elevated in her presence.

These steps towards a reformation gave such an alarm to the popish bishops, that, apprehending a total abolition of the papal power and usages of the church of Rome would soon follow, or perhaps fearing to offend the pope, who had scrupled to acknowledge the queen's title, and denied her legitimacy, they generally resolved not to officiate at her coronation; and none but Oglethorp, bishop of Carlisle, could be persuaded to do the office.

He agreeing to crown the queen, she removed from the Tower on the fourteenth of January, 1559, in grand procession through the streets of London to Westminster, amidst the acclamations of an infinite number of persons assembled on the occasion, which she returned with such a modest affability and so winning a grace, as charmed the hearts of all beholders. But nothing shewed more the sentiments of the citizens in point of religion, or endeared their new sovereign more to them than the accepting of an English Bible, richly gilt, which was let down from a pageant, in Cheapside, by a child representing Truth, who made her a speech on the occasion. The queen received the book with both her hands, and, having kissed it, held it up, then laid it to her breast, promising to be diligent in reading it, and assuring the city that she esteemed that gift more than all the sumptuous presents they had made her. The next day, being Sunday, January 15, the queen was crowned in Westminster abbey, and the two days following were distinguished by jousts and tournaments, in honour of her coronation.

On this occasion a patent was granted to Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel, to perform the office of high-constable on the day before the coronation, and the office of high-steward on the coronation-day. Several knights of the Bath were likewise created; and the queen, willing to distinguish some of her most particular friends, restored the lord Edward Seymour, eldest son of the late duke of Somerset, by a second wife*, to the titles of viscount Beauchamp and earl of Hertford; created the lord Thomas Howard, second son of the duke of Norfolk, viscount Howard of Binden; and advanced sir Oliver St. John, and Henry Cary, son to sir William Cary, by her aunt Mary Boleyn, to the dignities of barons, by the titles of lord St. John of Bletsho, and lord Hunsdon.

* The lady Anne Stanhope; on whose issue he procured an act to settle the titles and estate; and not Edward Seymour, his surviving eldest son by his first wife, Catherine Fittol, who was disinherited to gratify the pride and ambition of his last wife, and never enjoyed any title. It is not unworthy notice, that upon the extinction of the youngest line of this family by the second marriage in 1750, the eldest branch, seated at Maiden Bradley, Wilts, descended from the last-mentioned Edward, so disinherited, succeeded to the dukedom of Somerset, after having been excluded full two hundred years.

† He was the first that was by patent created lord-keeper. Formerly, those that were keepers of the seal had no dignity or authority annexed to their office; they did not hear causes nor preside in the house of lords; but only to put the seals to

The parliament meeting on the twenty-fifth of January, sir Nicholas Bacon, who, on the twenty-second of December the last year, had been made keeper of the great-seal†, on the resignation of Heath, archbishop of York, the lord-chancellor, opened the session with a speech, in which he displayed the merits of the new queen, with severe reflections on the loss of Calais: he told them, that the queen desired an immediate application to the affairs of religion; that a disunion in that respect was one of the evils which called for the most speedy redress: he exhorted the parliament to proceed between the two extremes of superstition and religion, which might unite the adherents of both religions in one and the same mode of public worship.

Then, to try the disposition of the parliament, a motion was made in the house of commons for restoring to the crown the tenths, first fruits, and impropriations, which had been given up by queen Mary: this motion was immediately approved, and the bill for such restoration being passed notwithstanding the opposition of the bishops‡, on the fourth of February, the commons, in an humble address, advised the queen to marry, in order to perpetuate their felicity, by having some of her royal issue to reign over them. After a few days taken to consider of the matter, her majesty returned them for answer, that "as the address was expressed in general terms, without pretending to fix her choice, she could not be any ways offended; that, notwithstanding her youth might render her veracity suspected, she had always declined the marriage-state as an incumbrance; that as England was her husband, wedded to her by this pledge (and here shewed her finger with the gold ring upon it, with which she had solemnly betrothed herself to the kingdom at her inauguration), so all Englishmen were her children, and while she was employed in rearing and governing such a family, she could not esteem herself barren, or her life useless or unfruitful||; that she doubted not of her subjects finding a successor at her death; and that, as to her own part, her greatest pride would be to have her monument declare that she had reigned and died a virgin-queen."

The parliament now proceeding in business, their next act was to recognize Elizabeth by a bill, importing that she was, and might be as well by the word of God as the common and statute laws of the realm, the lawful, undoubted, and true heir of the crown, lawfully descended from the blood royal according to the order of succession settled in the thirty-fifth year of Henry VIII.

This was immediately followed by an act appointing the public worship to be performed in English.

such writs or patents as went in course: and so the seal was only put in the hands of the keeper but for some short interval. Another, Another reviving and confirming all the acts made in the reign of Edward VI. concerning religion: and in this many others were included.

Another restored to the queen the nomination of bishops; reconfirmed many of Henry VIII's statutes against the papal authority; empowered the queen to put the exercise of her supremacy into what hands she pleased; and obliged all persons in public employments to swear "that they acknowledged the queen to be supreme governess in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as temporal; that they renounced all foreign jurisdiction; and should bear to the queen true allegiance," under pain of being declared incapable of holding any public office. And lastly, divers other penalties were enacted against those who, by word or writing, should set forth or advance any foreign authority in the kingdom.

Another act was passed to establish uniformity in public worship, against which the archbishop of York, the bishops of London, Ely, Worcester, Llandaff, Coventry, Exeter, and Chester, the marquis of Winchester, the earl of Shrewsbury, the viscount Montagu, and the lords Morley, Stafford, Dudley, Wharton, Rich, and North, entered their protests as dissentients.

By a sixth act the parliament empowered the queen to resume herself to the lands belonging to the bishoprics, as they became vacant, giving in lieu of them their full value, and impropriated tythes.

By a seventh, all religious houses were annexed to the crown.

By an eighth, the deprivation of popish bishops, in king Edward's reign, was declared valid.

In a word this parliament restored religion to the same state as in the reign of Edward VI. and, after a grant of a subsidy, two tenths and two fifteenths, with tonnage and poundage for the queen's life, it was dissolved on the eighth of May.

The supremacy with which the queen was lately invested, with power to depute any person to exercise it in her name, gave rise to a new court, called the High Commission Court. It was composed of a certain number of commissioners, which exercised the same power that had been formerly lodged by Henry VIII. in the single person of his minister, Cromwell, under the title of Vicegerent.

The zeal of the parliament alarmed the zealots of the popish faction so much, that they attempted, even during the session, to oppose their proceedings, and to preach from the pulpit doctrines that tended to overthrow their grand intention of a reformation; wherefore Elizabeth, after the example of her predecessors, Edward and Mary, forbade all preaching without a special licence under the great seal, which so exasperated the lower house of convocation, that they boldly asserted the doctrines of the church of Rome in a petition to the queen; whereupon she ordered the divines on both sides to meet, and, in open dispute, to consider and determine upon those doctrines. Accordingly it was agreed that nine divines of each side should hold a conference, which began on the thirty-first of March, in Westminster abbey: but the bishops of Winchester and Lincoln, seeing the cause in great danger, said that the faith of the church ought not to be examined but by a synod of divines; that the queen and council ought to be excommunicated for suffering the catholic faith to be argued before an unlearned multitude; and so departed from the conference, leaving the protestants to enjoy their triumph. However it produced this good effect, that out of nine thousand four hundred beneficed clergymen then in the nation, only fourteen bishops, twelve archdeacons, fifteen heads of colleges, fifty canons, and about eighty parochial priests, chose to quit their preferments rather than take the oath of supremacy and change their religion: and the places of these being filled up with protestants, England became entirely reformed in a short space, after having seen the advocates for reformation mercilessly delivered up to the flames. But the severity shewn to the popish clergy, whether legal or illegal we shall not take upon us to determine, was far from partaking of the cruelty practised under the late reign: some of them had liberty to retire to their own houses; some were admitted to an easy and social restraint in the houses of their friends, or of protestant bishops; and some were suffered to go abroad. It was, however, thought proper to commit Bonner to the Marshalsea, where he died under confinement, which, with his deprivation, was the only evil he experienced of the many which his cruelty had inflicted upon others. As to the vacant sees, Parker, after great reluctance on his part, was made archbishop of Canterbury; Jewell was made bishop of Salisbury: Barlow, Scory, and Coverdale, bishops under Edward, had sees given them; and the other bishoprics were filled up with men of piety and learning for the times. Soon after, May, dean of St. Paul's was nominated to the archbishopric of York; but he dying before confirmation, Young was translated to that see from St. David's. It is now time to return to political affairs.

While the queen and the parliament were employed in settling the public religion, the negotiations for peace were still carried on on the continent, first at Cercamp, and afterwards at Chateau Cambresis. Philip employed his utmost efforts to procure the restitution of Calais; and so long as he entertained hopes of espousing Elizabeth, delayed concluding a peace with the French monarch: nay, even after he found all his expectations frustrated, by the alterations she had made in religion, he seemed willing to continue the war till she obtained satisfaction, on condition she would promise to adhere to the Spanish alliance, and continue hostilities against France for the space of six years: but when Elizabeth had consulted with her ministers, and had taken into consideration the low state of her finances, the great debts contracted by her father, brother, and sister; the disorders introduced into every part of the administration, and the divisions which agitated her subjects, she plainly saw that a state of public tranquility was the only means of putting her kingdom into a respectable condition, and prudently rejected the proposal, and quickened in her advances towards France, whose monarch, Henry II. was so apprehensive of Elizabeth having any connections with Spain, that he had sent Cavalcante, a Florentine, with a letter full of regard for the queen, and expressing his desire of accommodating matters between the two crowns.

At last the English plenipotentiaries having received letters from Elizabeth and her council, empowering them to conclude a peace on any reasonable terms, on the second of April this year, a treaty was concluded between Elizabeth and Henry on the following conditions.

"That

"That France should retain Calais, and the other places in Picardy conquered from the English, only eight years; and after that to restore them to the queen of England.

"That, within the space of six months, seven foreign merchants, not subjects of the French king, should engage for the payment of five hundred thousand crowns of gold to Elizabeth, as a penal fine in case the restitution of the places, within the time limited, was either refused or delayed by Henry or his successors.

And, "That, notwithstanding whether the said sum was paid or not paid, the king of France, and his successors, should remain under the obligation to restore Calais, and the other places, as they engaged in this treaty.

Moreover, "That the king of France should deliver to the queen, as hostages, till the promised security was given, Ferry de Foix, count of Caudale and capital of Buche; Lewis de St. Maure, marquis of Nesle and count of Laval; Gaston de Foix, marquis of Trans Antoine; du Prat, president of the parliament of Paris; and the lord Nantouillet."

Another article of this treaty with France ran in this form: "That neither the king of France nor the king and queen of Scotland should attempt any thing against one another, directly or indirectly, in prejudice of this treaty. That if the queen of England violated this article, the king of France and the king and queen of Scotland should be freed from their engagements, and their hostages and securities be discharged. In like manner, if the violation came from the king of France, he should be obliged to restore Calais and the other places, as if the eight years were expired: and if he refused to make the restitution, the securities and hostages should still remain bound," &c.

On the same day a treaty was signed between England and Scotland, which contained the following articles.

"I. That neither of the parties should attack the dominions now possessed by the other, either in person or otherwise.

"II. That they should give no aid to attack the dominions of one another, to any person, in whatsoever degree of consanguinity or affinity he might be related to them, or whatever might be his quality.

"III. That they should not receive or maintain rebels, fugitives, malefactors, &c.

"IV. That in three months the fortifications of Eyemouth, and all others erected in Scotland since the treaty of 1549, should be razed.

"V. That all other mutual claims and pretensions should remain entire.

"VI. That in two months commissioners should be appointed on both sides, to settle certain articles, concerning which the ambassadors of France were not sufficiently instructed."

Francis and Mary ratified the treaty on the eighteenth of April; and on the thirty-first of May the commissioners of the two kingdoms, at Upsalinton, signed a second treaty upon the articles left undecided in the first.

By these treaties tranquility seemed, but indeed only seemed, to be established between England and its neighbours; for Henry II. soon pulled off the mask, and shewed, by his actions, that he never intended to fulfil his words and agreements.

His first act was to order the dauphin his son who had married the young queen of Scotland, to assume the title of king of Scotland, England, and Ireland, and to quarter the arms of England in their seal, and on their plate and furniture, by which the court of France endeavoured to prefer the title of the queen of Scots to the crown of England to that of Elizabeth, whom they took all occasions to treat as illegitimate. Elizabeth complained loudly of this ill treatment by her ambassador (Throgmorton) at Paris, but was always shuffled off with evasive excuses; and therefore she from this time considered Mary as her most dangerous rival, and the Guises, princes of Lorraine, her uncles, the authors of this usurpation, as her most mortal enemies; the truth of which was soon confirmed.

At the same time that the peace between France and England was concluded at Chateau Cambresis, a treaty of pacification had also been signed between the courts of France and Spain; to strengthen which, it was agreed that the French king should give his eldest daughter in marriage to the king of Spain; and that Philibert, duke of Savoy, should marry the French king's sister. These marriages were accordingly solemnized about Midsummer this year, when Henry II. was accidentally killed by a wound he received in his eye by the splinter of a lance, at a tournament held in honour of the nuptials. His son and successor, Francis II. being a prince void of genius and experience, was an absolute tool in the hands of the house of Guise, who hurried him into measures which corresponded with their ambition and vanity. Thinking that the accession of England to France, in right of their niece, would aggrandize them in the eyes of the French, they had persuaded Henry II. under various pretences, foreign to their point in view, to keep up an army in Scotland, as the only avenue by which the English dominions were accessible; and this army they now considerably augmented, having gotten the government of France into their own hands, under the name of their nephew the young king Francis, who was incapable of managing public affairs. But as their projects were founded upon the situation of affairs in Scotland at that juncture, it is necessary to give a brief recital of the state of matters in that kingdom.

During the queen-regent's competition with the earl of Arran, now duke of Chatelerault, for the regency, she had favoured the protestants of Scotland, and exasperated the catholic party, who, under the archbishop of St. Andrew's, opposed her with the greatest animosity; but having carried her point, she changed sides, regained the esteem of the catholics, and openly approved the decrees of the convocation which condemned all the principles of the reformers; and, instigated by her brothers, the duke of Guise, and the cardinal of Lorraine, she determined to suppress protestantism in Scotland, in which work she was encouraged to persevere by the assurance her brother gave her of a considerable reinforcement to the French army already in Scotland.

The principal nobility and others of the reformed religion in that kingdom being advised of the preparations of the French, and that the pope, the emperor Ferdinand, and the king of Spain had entered into a combination to reduce again the most part of Europe to the popish faith, and to pursue all opposers and dissenters with fire and sword; and to begin with Scotland, as being convenient for their master-stroke meditated upon England, they resolved to divert the storm which threatened them; and being convinced that their security depended on their unanimity, and the vigour of their resolutions, they endeavoured to cement their union by entering into a stricter bond of mutual defence. The duke of Chatelerault, and his eldest son, the earl of Arran, acceded to this association, and inspired the confederates with resolution, at the same time that they added reputation to their cause.

The earl of Arran had resided in France, where he commanded the Scottish guards; but having embraced the protestant religion, was marked out by the princes of Lorraine as a victim, to intimidate the rest of that persuasion, and to prevent the growth of their principles: but the cardinal of Lorraine having let fall some expressions which discovered his intentions, the earl avoided the intended blow by a sudden flight, and, after infinite labour and danger, getting to Geneva, he from thence came over to England, about the end of July this year. Elizabeth gave this young nobleman a most cordial reception; and, during his stay here, which was very short, failed not to inflame his resentment against the court of France: so that when the earl returned to Scotland, he communicated his sentiments to his father, and induced him to join the lords of the congregation, as the heads of the reformed party were called.

About the same time one Knox, a famous preacher, who had been persecuted for his religion, and obliged to fly to Geneva, having lately returned home, by his preaching soon worked up the Scottish reformed to such frenzy, that they took up arms, and for some time carried every thing before them, under their two chief leaders, the earl of Argyll, and James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, a natural son of James V. by a daughter of the lord Erskine. This nobleman being designed for the church, had the priory of St. Andrew's conferred upon him; but being disgusted with the inactivity of a monastic life, he left the cloister, and appeared at the head of the reformed, who had already sent several respectful messages to the queen-regent, for evacuating the nation of French soldiers, but without any other effect than her threatening that she would denounce them rebels, if they did not instantly lay down their arms.

This produced a numerous meeting of the lords of the congregation, on the twenty-first of October, at Edinburgh, when they immediately assembled a parliament, consisting of the peers, barons, and representatives of the boroughs, before whom they represented their grievances; and an act was passed, whereby the authority of the queen-regent was declared to be suspended. But now the lords finding themselves under the utmost distress for want of money, and dreading to be crushed by the more powerful army of the French and the queen-regent, they had recourse to Elizabeth, with whom some of the party had already entered into a secret correspondence.

Elizabeth, willing to counterbalance the French interest in Scotland, and to prevent that kingdom being united to France, by issue which Mary, queen of Scotland, might have by her husband Francis II. received their proposal with great shew of friendship, and dispatched Randolph into Scotland, with assurances of support, and to animate the leaders of the congregation in their design.

Mean while the French army in Scotland had been reinforced with a thousand men, under the command of Martigues, and a more considerable supply was expected under the marquis of Elbeuf. Elizabeth therefore, who considered her own interest as intimately connected with that of the Scottish protestants, resolved to exert her utmost efforts in order to support their declining affairs. With this view she fitted out a fleet, consisting of thirteen ships of war, and bestowing the command of it on vice-admiral William Winter, she sent it into the Firth of Forth, in the beginning of January, 1560; at the same time she appointed the young duke of Norfolk her lieutenant in the northern counties, and ordered an army of eight thousand men to rendezvous at Berwick, on the thirtieth of January, under the conduct of the lord Grey of Wilton, warden of the East and Middle Marches.

The appearance of Winter with his ships in the Forth gave a new face to the affairs of the congregation. The French army, terrified at the loss of some of their ships, which the English admiral had burned in his passage up the river, retired to Leith, to wait the expected reinforcements, with which they were immediately to invade England; but the troubles of France, which began at this time to demand all the power and attention of that ministry, obliged them to lay aside all thoughts of this expedition: nay, the French court, dreading the consequence of Elizabeth's interfering in the affairs of Scotland, and thereby cutting them out work at such a distance from home, endeavoured to divert her from her purpose by offering to restore Calais, and all its dependencies, provided she would draw her forces out of Scotland; but she nobly rejected the offer, telling the ambassador, that she did not value a paltry fishing-town so much as the peace and quiet of her own kingdom; and dispatched the lord Montagu to inform Philip of Spain of the reasons of her refusal, which, she said, was from the certain knowledge she had that the Guises had projected an union of France with Scotland, and concerted the murder of the earl of Arran, who, failing Mary's issue, would be the next heir to the Scottish crown.

By this time, the duke of Norfolk being joined by commissioners from the congregation, at Berwick, all the operations for the ensuing campaign were digested, and a formal treaty between queen Elizabeth and them was signed. As this treaty was attended with great consequences, we shall insert the whole of it from the records.

"At Berwick, the twenty-seventh day of February, the year of our Lord God 1559, it is agreed, contracted, and finally appointed, between the noble mighty prince Thomas, duke of Norfolk, earl-marshal of England, lieutenant for the queen's most excellent majesty of England in the North, on the name and behalf of her highness, of the one party; and the right honourable lord James Stuart, Patrick lord Ruthven, sir John Maxwell, of Fearegloss, knight, William Maitland, of Lethington, younger, John Wishart, of Pettarhow, and Mr. Henry Balnaves, of Halihill, in the name and behalf of the most mighty prince James, duke of Chatelerault, second person of the realm of Scotland, and the remnant of the rest of the lords of his party, joined with him in this cause, for maintenance tenance and defence of the ancient rights and liberties of their country, on the other party, in form as hereafter followeth, that is to say: That the queen's majesty having sufficiently understood, as well by information sent from the nobility of Scotland, as by the manifest proceedings of the French, that they intend to conquer the realm of Scotland, suppress the liberties thereof, and unite the same unto the crown of France perpetually, contrary to the laws of the said realm, and to the pactions, oaths, and promises of France; and being thereto most humbly and earnestly required by the said nobility, for and in the name of the whole realm, shall accept the said realm of Scotland, and the said duke of Chatelerault, being declared by act of parliament to be heir apparent to the crown thereof, and the nobility and subjects of the same, in her majesty's protection and maintenance, only for preservation of them in their old freedoms and liberties and from conquest, during the time the marriage shall continue between the queen of Scots and the French king, and one year after; and for expelling out of the same realm all such as presently goeth about to practise the said conquest."

Elizabeth having thus taken every precaution which could insure success, and received from the Scots hostages for the performance of the articles, she commanded her fleet and army to begin their operations, and the confederates assembling from all parts, to the number of six thousand foot and two thousand horse, were joined by the English forces, under the lord Grey of Wilton, at Haddington, in the month of April, and marched together to Leith, publishing as they went a manifesto, in which Elizabeth complained of "the injury done her by the king and queen of France in assuming her titles and arms, and in plain terms charged the duke of Guise and the cardinal of Lorraine with being authors of the troubles in Scotland, in order to effect more easily their designs against England."

The combined army having now formed the siege of Leith, the queen-regent retired from the French army into the castle of Edinburgh, commanded by John Erskine, who had express orders from the states not to deliver it up without their direction. The siege of Leith was carried on for some time with various success; but as the place was defended by the whole French army, the English found great difficulty in their operations; and, after several unsuccessful storms, were ready to relinquish their enterprize, when, in the beginning of May, they were strengthened by a powerful reinforcement under the duke of Norfolk, which accession of force on the part of the English, and the conspiracy of Amboise in the heart of France, inspired the princes of Lorraine with more pacific sentiments, and it was resolved to recall their forces out of Scotland.

Accordingly Francis II. sent Monluc, bishop of Valence, and the count de Randan, into Scotland, with full powers to conclude a peace. Their proposals being transmitted to Elizabeth, she appointed secretary Cecil and Dr. Wootton her plenipotentiaries to treat with the French commissioners, at Newcastle. The death of the queen-regent, which happened at the castle of Edinburgh, on the eighth of June, not a little facilitated the negotiations. The conferences were now transferred to Edinburgh, a truce being agreed to in the mean time; and in the beginning of July the peace was finally concluded. Most historians confound in this treaty two things, which however ought to be distinguished, namely, the concessions of Francis and Mary to their Scottish subjects, and the treaty between France and England. As of these two treaties one was observed, the other not, it is necessary to have a distinct idea of them. We find from Buchanan and Keith, that the concessions made to the Scots were as follow:

"I. That the French forces should leave Scotland in twenty-four days, and return to France in ships to be furnished by Elizabeth.

"II. That the town of Leith should be restored to Scotland, and the fortifications demolished.

"III. That the works made by the French at Dunbar, should be razed.

"IV. That the king and queen of France and Scotland should grant an act of oblivion to the confederates for every thing done from the tenth of March, 1559, to the first of August, 1560; and that this act should be approved and confirmed by the states of Scotland, to be assembled in the following August, with the consent of the king and queen.

"That the French should have liberty to leave sixty men in the isle of Leith."

But with regard to the interests of Elizabeth, a real treaty was concluded between her and the crown of France, which will be often mentioned hereafter by the name of the Treaty of Edinburgh, and, according to our public records, contained the following articles.

"I. That for the future, the king and queen of Scotland should not assume the title of king and queen of England or Ireland; nor bear the arms of those kingdoms.

"II. That the patents and other acts, which had been dispatched with that title, should be altered, or remain of no force.

"III. That the farther satisfaction required by the queen of England, for the injury done her, should be referred to a conference at London, between the commissioners of the two crowns.

"IV. That if the commissioners could not agree, the decision should be left to the king of Spain.

"V. That the king and queen of France and Scotland should perform the promises made to the Scots at Edinburgh by the plenipotentiaries of France."

In perusing the last of the articles granted to the confederate Scots, the reader may be at a loss to conceive what service it would be to Francis and Mary, to have only sixty men of their French subjects left in Scotland: Buchanan gives this reason; that the queen of Scots might not seem to be thrown out of the entire possession of Scotland.

After the conclusion of the above treaty the French and English withdrew out of Scotland, the fortifications of Leith and Dunbar were demolished, and the amnesty was confirmed by the Scottish parliament, which enacted several laws in favour of the Reformation. As for Francis and Mary, though they confirmed those laws, they flatly refused to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, on pretence that Elizabeth had treated with their rebellious subjects as if they had composed an independent state; but the real intention of the princes of Lorraine was to deprive Elizabeth of the English crown, and place it on the head of their young niece. This was a scheme, however, which, happily for England, they were never able to effect: for the troubles they brought upon themselves, by their persecutions against the Hugonots (a name given to the protestants) in France, the murder of twelve hundred for a pretended conspiracy at Amboise, the seizing and unjust condemnation of the prince of Condé, which so desperately exasperated the French nation, and the death of Francis II. on the twenty fifth of September this year, defended Elizabeth from all their machinations from that quarter.

It will not be impertinent to the purpose in hand, to take a short view of Elizabeth's situation in regard to her own subjects and to foreign princes. It may truly be said, that she had scarcely any foreign ally, to whom she could trust, and had every thing to fear from the most powerful of her neighbours; and though she could not be apprehensive of an invasion from Scotland, or a new war with that kingdom, yet she, in case of an invasion by any other enemy, could not expect any sort of assistance from them; on the contrary, she saw herself under an indispensable necessity to support the protestant party there, well knowing Scotland to be the inlet into her country from France, whenever the domestic troubles of that kingdom could be surmounted. Elizabeth had also great reason to doubt of the fidelity and loyalty of the Irish, many of whose nobles held themselves, and acted on many occasions, as independent of England; and the whole nation, being extremely attached to the popish superstition, which workshop best suited their extreme ignorance, were ready to revolt and insist under the banner of the first invader in the pope's name, on account of the innovations which they thought Elizabeth was about to introduce into their favourite religion.

Pope Paul IV. dying in the last month of the preceding year, was succeeded by cardinal Angelo de Medici, a Milanese, who assumed the name of Pius IV. The family of Lorrain eagerly laid hold of this opportunity to solicit the new pontiff to enter heartily into the schemes of his predecessor, and compel the heretics by force to re-enter the pale of the church, pointing out to him England as the most proper place to begin with, as its queen was become the nursing mother of the enemies of the papal see and authority. But Pius being resolved to try all means rather than extremities to reclaim England to his obedience, sent, in the summer of this year, Vincenzo Parpaglia, abbot of St. Sauveur, with certain instructions, and a letter to the queen, exhorting her to return to his communion, and promising to continue the general council of Trent, which had, under many interruptions, been sitting several years; and with an offer, in his holiness's name, to repeal the sentence of divorce of Henry VIII. from Anne Boleyn; as also to confirm the English Liturgy, and to permit the English to communicate in both kinds: the nuncio was also ordered to invite the queen to send some English bishops to the council of Trent. But Elizabeth, not to be moved by all these artifices, returned for answer, that though she heartily desired a general council, yet she would never honour a popish one with an ambassador representing her person; and that she desired no connections with the bishop of Rome, who she said had no more power than other bishops.

As for Philip II. king of Spain, her ambassador brought such a report of his behaviour, that she could expect no other than an enemy in him: he even returned with contempt the collar of the order of the Garter, which had been sent him by Elizabeth. It was only at home then, in England, that the queen could hope for help or safety, in the affections of her subjects, by whom she was beloved to a degree of adoration, for the noble spirit which she had shewn in defence of their freedom and independence, and the resolution with which she had baffled the united attempts of France, Spain, and the court of Rome.

Elizabeth was now in the very bloom of life, being twenty-five years of age, and her alliance by marriage had been coveted by most of the chief princes of Europe. The duke of Finland, brother to Eric, king of Sweden, had for some time resided in London, and courted her for his brother. The duke of Holstein, nephew to the king of Denmark, was likewise in England, and addressed her in behalf of his uncle. The German protestants earnestly pressed her to marry Charles, archduke of Austria, second son to the late emperor, and a known favourer of protestantism; and the Scottish parliament had preferred a solemn address to her, for leave to send commissioners to treat concerning a marriage between her and the earl of Arran, son to the duke of Chatelerauld, and presumptive heir to the crown, which would afford a probable prospect of uniting the two kingdoms: but Elizabeth, for reasons of her own, had declined all these offers.

Several of her own subjects were not with hopes of obtaining her in marriage: of all these, the lord Robert Dudley seemed to bid fairest for success. He was fifth son of the late duke of Northumberland, whom he resembled in the gracefulness of his person, and in the ambition of his heart. Taking part with his father in raising the lady Jane Grey to the throne, he was involved in her misfortune, taken prisoner, committed to the Tower, and condemned to die the death of a traitor; but was pardoned at the intercession of the courtiers, and afterwards queen Mary restored him in blood, received him into favour, and made him master of the English ordnance at the siege of St. Quintin. What endeared him so much to Elizabeth is not very clear; but, as soon as she ascended the English throne, she gave him the earliest marks of her favour, by making him master of the horse, and dignifying him with the order of the Garter: and, indeed, truth obliges us to confess that Elizabeth was rather too much above the delicacies of virgin-conduct with regard to Dudley; and that the public, both at home and abroad, knew of no other way to reconcile it to virtue, or indeed to prudence, but by supposing she would marry him: but then, on some occasions, she would express herself so far as to signify, that she could never resolve to give her hand to a subject, after having refused the first princes of Europe who sought her in marriage.

The person who, next to Dudley, was thought to stand fairest in Elizabeth's esteem, was sir William Pickering. He was a gentleman of private fortune, but of great reputation for wisdom, hospitality, and every quality that could entitle him to the highest distinction. He declined all public employments, and seldom came to court; and his great interest in the nation lay amongst those who wished well to the Reformation established by Edward VI.

Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel, was another suitor to the queen. He was a nobleman of high birth, and had always behaved with vast spirit, but had gone too far into the violent measures of the late reign, but still he flattered himself with the agreeable hopes of procuring his sovereign in marriage. The closeness of Elizabeth, whenever applied to on any subject of this nature, and the different conjectures which the public formed concerning their sovereign's marriage, either at home or abroad, was of the utmost service to her affairs; all parties were obsequious to her command, and ready to execute her orders. She improved this their disposition to the advantage of her favourite scheme of settling the Reformation on a firm basis in England, and thereby freeing herself and people forever from that state of slavish dependence in which they had formerly been held by the Roman pontiffs.

The queen, by her letters patent, had already recommended to the ecclesiastical bodies of the kingdom, king Edward's Book of Common Prayer: the ecclesiastical livings all over England were filled with men who hated popery; and a form of belief was published by the bishops to justify the Reformation: the parliament which was now sitting in Scotland, in like manner proceeded by Elizabeth's advice, and under her protection, to extirpate popery. Westminster abbey was, from a monastery, converted into a collegiate church: the queen received a public address from the bishops against the use of images: and Elizabeth, to shew how steadily she meant to proceed, ordered the numerous tribes of protestant sectaries, who, under pretext of seeking protection on account of religion, were now swarming all over the kingdom, to leave the realm. At the same time, in order to bring her civil and ecclesiastical government as near as possible to an equality, the queen set about reforming the coin, which had been greatly debased in the late reign. In a word, Elizabeth applied herself with the utmost assiduity to all affairs of government, in conjunction with those two excellent statesmen, and her great favourites, secretary Cecil and sir Nicholas Bacon, keeper of the great seal, being resolved to leave nothing undone to render her subjects as happy as possible; well knowing her chief assistance must flow from them in case of an invasion, which she had reason to expect. And thus stood matters in church and state in this kingdom at the end of the year 1560.

On the fifteenth of January, 1561, the queen-mother of France, the famous Catherine de Medici, was appointed regent during the minority of her son Charles IX. who, at the age only of ten years, succeeded to his brother Francis II. who was not eighteen when he died. The king of Navarre, the first prince of the blood, was constituted lieutenant-general of the kingdom; the sentence which had passed against the prince of Condé, was reversed; the constable de Montmorency, another chief of the Hugonots, who had been banished, was recalled to court; and the princes of Lorraine, though they still possessed the highest posts and offices, now found their authority greatly diminished.

Elizabeth was overjoyed to hear that her declared enemies had been so severely humbled; and she was resolved to avail herself of the present conjuncture to compel the Scottish queen to renounce her pretensions to the English crown: she accordingly sent orders to Throgmorton, her ambassador in France, a very faithful and able minister, to make application to Mary for that purpose, and to demand her ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh; for though, by the advice of her uncles, the princes of Lorraine, Mary had, immediately upon the death of her husband Francis II. laid aside the arms and title of England, yet Elizabeth was not to be satisfied with a bare relinquishing of them, but insisted upon a formal renunciation of her titles and arms, and an acknowledgement that she never had any right to assume them; that in case Mary, who was very young, should marry a powerful prince, he might have no pretence to renew the claim. Mary, however, was upon her guard: she saw sufficiently into the spirit of this demand; she declined giving any direct answer to the English ambassador, before she had consulted her friends in France and Scotland: and Throgmorton renewing his instances she told him, that she was resolved to entrust the whole management of her concerns with the lord James (so the prior of St. Andrew's was commonly called); but that nobleman was too deeply engaged with queen Elizabeth, for Mary to continue long in that mind. Both she and her uncle, the cardinal of Lorraine, believed him to have no other principle but interest; while he thought that they had no other view but revenge. They tempted him with all they thought could bribe his ambition to break his own connections, and that of his party, with Elizabeth; but he continued consistent, notwithstanding all their efforts. It was this steadiness that first rivetted him in the esteem of Elizabeth, and was the foundation of his future fortune. In the mean time Elizabeth, desirous of keeping her footing in Scotland, and still apprehensive of an invasion there, sent Randolph, one of her trusty agents, about the middle of March, to Scotland, whose states, or parliament, was then sitting; and gave him in charge to engage the Scots, if possible, to enter into a protestant league, in the same manner as the protestants in Germany had done, for the defence of religion. Mary, who was informed by her friends in Scotland of all these practices, could not fail of being highly incensed at this ungenerous behaviour of Elizabeth, and hinted to Throgmorton, that she was not ignorant of his mistress's dealings with her rebellious subjects; and that, for her own part, she was resolved not to receive any laws from them.

In the mean time, a misunderstanding having arisen between the queen-dowager of France and the Scottish princess, this latter, unable to brook the slights and indignities to which she found herself exposed, in consequence of this rupture, resolved to listen to the invitation of the states of Scotland, who had sent the lord James over to request her return to her native country and her faithful subjects. Accordingly she sent d'Oysell over to England, about Midsummer this year, to demand from Elizabeth a safe conduct for herself and the ships that were to attend her. Elizabeth who had been extremely nettled by Mary's refusing to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, returned for answer, that "she hoped the queen of Scots would first ratify that treaty; after which she should not only have a safe-conduct, but also, without being exposed to the fatigues and dangers of the sea, might pass through England, where she should be received with all the marks of affection she could expect from a sister."

Upon d'Oysell's return to France with this answer from Elizabeth, Mary could not contain her resentment: she sent for Throgmorton, and asked him, what offence she had given his mistress, that she should act thus towards her? She said, that she was very sorry she had subjected herself to the mortification of being publicly refused a favour, which she had no need to ask, being her equal in degree: that Elizabeth, by such a proceeding, subjected her own character to severe censure; "for (added she) it will be thought very strange by all princes and countries, that your mistress should first animate my subjects against me, and now, being a widow, impede my going into my own country: I ask nothing of her but friendship; I do not trouble her state, or practise with her subjects; and yet (continued this spirited princess) I know there be in her realm that be inclined enough to hear offers: I know also they be not of the mind she is of, neither in religion or other things." In fine, she concluded by telling Throgmorton, that as she came into France in spite of Edward*, she could return into Scotland notwithstanding Elizabeth's opposition†.

Accordingly she did not delay her departure from France an instant on account of Elizabeth's refusal of a safe-conduct; and being attended by all her uncles, and several noblemen of the first rank in France, to Calais, she set sail from thence in the beginning of August; and on the eighteenth of that month arrived safe at Leith, in her native kingdom, after having been absent thirteen years. She was received by her subjects with every possible mark of esteem and regard. It is said that Elizabeth gave orders to intercept Mary in her passage from France to Scotland; but no evidence has been brought to support such an assertion: queen Elizabeth had always a fleet at sea, for the guard of the English coast and the security of commerce; but we cannot find that she had any design, or gave any orders, for intercepting her rival; and she expressly disavowed the having made any attempt for that purpose.

Mary, in pursuance of the plan which she had concerted in France, entrusted the whole management of public affairs to protestants: her council was composed of the most eminent persons of that party, and not a single papist was admitted into any office of trust or confidence. She also acquiesced in the regulations made by the states in favour of the Reformation. The prior of St. Andrew's, and Maitland, of Ledington, seemed to possess the first place in the queen's favour, and enjoyed all the credit and reputation of favourite ministers. This choice was universally acceptable to the people, who now seemed to vie with each other in their expressions of zeal and loyalty. These happy omens, notwithstanding the unfavourable aspect of affairs just before Mary's arrival in Scotland, seemed to foretel a very different issue of her reign; and though some sudden gusts of faction and popular discontents might have been expected from the diversity in religious opinions, yet there was no appearance of the destructive violence of that storm which soon after burst on the kingdom of Scotland.

Soon after the arrival of Mary in her kingdom, she dispatched Maitland of Lethington, her secretary, to London, to pay her respects to Elizabeth, and to signify her desire of cultivating a friendship and good correspondence with that princess: the secretary was also charged with letters from the Scottish nobility, recommending such an union as their earnest request, "since say they, in case of a misunderstanding we are obliged to serve our sovereign." But Maitland was charged likewise with a farther commission, which could not be well received: this was, "to move, as the best and most certain method for maintaining peace and amity between the two queens and their realms, that Elizabeth should declare Mary her heir and successor in the kingdom of England, in case she should die without issue; and this to be done by act of parliament."

No request could be more unreasonable, or made at a more improper juncture. Elizabeth was extremely nettled at it: she answered the ambassador with great warmth, "That she would not suffer the queen of Scotland to rob her of the crown during her life; neither did she intend to do any thing that might tend to prejudice that queen after her death; nevertheless she was determined not to run the hazard of seeing her subjects adore the rising sun: that to design a successor was to expose her own life to danger; to destroy the security of her government, to let a winding-sheet continually before her eyes, and to bury herself alive." After this she put Maitland in mind of his mistress's refusing to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh: "she desired nothing of Mary but what was in her power as queen of Scotland; what her own nobility had known and approved; and what was absolutely necessary for the continuance of their amity."

There had passed nothing but acts of unkindness, resentment, and animosity between the two queens whilst Mary was in France; and the making of the demand above-mentioned the moment of her return to Scotland, before any step taken for a reconciliation, for removing suspicions, or creating a friendship, could not but inflame the jealousy which Elizabeth had already entertained of Mary's designs against her crown and dignity. It did not however hinder Elizabeth from sending sir Peter Meutas with compliments to Mary on her safe return to her kingdom, and to insist on her ratification of the treaty: but Mary still eluded the demand, pretending that she could not conveniently do it till the affairs of Scotland were more firmly settled. At the same time she proposed to Meutas, in some conferences she had with him, to have the treaty of Edinburgh reviewed by commissioners, and to have the article obliging her to abstain from using the arms and title of England "in all times to come," retouched in such a manner, as to guard against its being interpreted to the prejudice of her succession: and, after repeating her demand to have the succession settled, and dismissing Meutas without the ratification, she wrote a long letter to Elizabeth, in which she proposed the reviewing and remodelling the treaty; offered to engage herself to guarantee the succession to the crown of England to the person of Elizabeth, and the lawful issue of her body: and lastly, she offered a meeting to Elizabeth, in order to compose all differences the more readily. In this situation were matters between England and Scotland at the close of the year 1561;

but the obstinate refusal of the queen of Scots (whether the effect of her uncle's advice or her own ambition) to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, giving Elizabeth just reason to suspect that a design was formed to dethrone her whenever an opportunity offered; and this latter rejecting with contempt the demand of settling the succession, rivetted that jealousy and animosity between the two princesses, which at last proved so fatal to Mary.

We must not forget to mention, that about the end of the year Mary gave the lord James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's the title of earl of Murray; and created John Erskine earl of Marr.

Elizabeth all this while was indefatigably applying herself to the affairs of government. Her first care was to put the navy in a better condition than it had ever been known in the time of her ancestors; she augmented the pay of her sailors; she stored her magazines with arms; she introduced the manufacture of gunpowder into England; she ordered a great number of iron and brass pieces of English metal* to be cast; she reinforced the garrison of Berwick; she fortified the borders towards Scotland; she introduced and encouraged great improvements in agriculture, and ordered her people to attend the exercise of arms at stated times.

Her late refusal to have any communication on any terms with the see of Rome, had exasperated the papists to the utmost; and there is extant a minute under Cecil's hand†, of certain cautions she was to take with regard to her own person, as also for her apparel and diet; by which it should seem that she was apprehensive of being taken off either by assassination or poison: and we find that some severities about this time were shewn to the papists, several of their bishops and clergy being deprived of their liberty. Sir Edward Wgrave, who was a leading man in the late reign, and his lady, were committed to the Tower, as was the lord Hastings, another of Mary's chief favourites, for no other crime (that appears) than being present at the mass, and having priests in their houses.

Though this severity was, perhaps, necessary, yet Elizabeth is not so defensible in her conduct to the lady Catherine Grey, the younger sister to the lady Jane Grey, who lost her head in the late reign: this lady had the same right to royalty as her sister had; and Elizabeth was so extremely tenacious of her power and authority, that she could not forbear looking on her with a jealous eye: she knew not what party might be formed in favour of the lady Catherine, upon the plan of Edward's will; and she foresaw what a handle the Scots might make, by setting aside the will of Henry VIII. by which their queen was deprived of the succession in the same manner as she herself, after the example of her sister Mary, set aside the will of Edward VI.

The lady Catherine had been married to the earl of Pembroke's son, but had been lawfully divorced; and afterwards she privately married the earl of Hertford, son to the regent-duke of Somerset, a young nobleman of a bold, restless, aspiring disposition. The marriage was soon discovered by the lady's pregnancy, and Elizabeth committed her to the Tower; and her husband, the earl of Hertford, being sent for out of France, and, upon examination, owning his marriage, was likewise committed to the Tower, where the lady Catherine was soon after delivered of a son. This event inflamed still farther the indignation of Elizabeth, who appointed a court of delegates, with the archbishop of Canterbury at their head, to enquire into the validity of the marriage; and they found their cohabitation to be unlawful. Not content with this, Elizabeth caused a fine of fifteen thousand pounds to be imposed upon Hertford, and ordered the confinement of both him and his wife to be more rigid and severe. They remained in this condition for the space of nine years, till at last the lady Catherine dying, the queen was freed from all apprehensions, and again restored the earl to his liberty.

Elizabeth behaved with more generosity, in an affair of another and even more dangerous nature. Arthur Pole and his brother, nephews to the late cardinal of that name, and great-grand-children of George, duke of Clarence, brother to king Edward IV. together with one Fortescue, a gentleman who had married a sister of their's, and some other persons, had formed a design of retiring into France, in order to procure succours from the duke of Guise; to return thence into Wales; that Arthur Pole should then assume the title of duke of Clarence, and as such should treat of a marriage between his brother and Mary, queen of Scotland, whom they were then to proclaim queen of England‡. This conspiracy being discovered, they were brought to their trials, and owned the fact, but declared at the same time, that they never meant to execute these projects till the queen's death, which some pretenders to judicial astrology had assured them would certainly happen before the end of the year. They were condemned to death by the jury, but the queen was pleased to indulge them with a pardon: the excessive rigour therefore shewn to Catherine Grey throws a great blemish on Elizabeth's character, since it is plain that unhappy lady's right to the crown, whether well or ill grounded, was her only offence.

We have nothing farther to add to the transactions of this year, than that Elizabeth still farther endeared herself to her subjects by revoking all warrants granted to the purveyors for victualling the fleet, which were generally executed in a very oppressive manner, and ordered the people to be paid in money for whatever provisions they furnished. The impositions of the Exchequer were now by her reformed; and the popish clergy, to whom pensions had been assigned for the loss of their livings now in the hands of the crown, were punctually paid. The queen also increased the salary of the judges, and first allowed them a provision for their respective circuits. Camden, who has furnished us with these anecdotes of Elizabeth's government, observes, that her œconomy always went hand in hand with her liberality, insomuch that she gave very little out of her own demesnes, but on condition it should, on default of male issue, revert to the crown. It would have been happy, perhaps, if her successors had always observed this rule!

It was not without reason that Elizabeth was thus studious to gain the love of her subjects by the good order she introduced into the kingdom, since many endeavours were used at this time to corrupt and draw them into rebellion. The catholics began to meet and plot to restore their religion by arms. Besides the design of Arthur Pole and his accomplices above related, Elizabeth, in the beginning of the year 1562, found out that the earl of Lenox and his countess (daughter to Margaret, queen of Scotland, eldest daughter to Henry VII. by the earl of Angus) held a secret unlawful correspondence in Scotland, the plan of which was to assert Mary's prior right to the crown of England, and raise a party to defend the same. This correspondence being discovered, the earl was committed to the custody of the master of the Rolls, and the countess to the care of sir Richard Sackville.

Mary, from what reasons may easily be guessed, did not shew the least resentment at this usage of the earl of Lenox, though he was her own subject; on the contrary, she affected to shew great complaisance to Elizabeth's resident, Randolph; and the queen of England was not behind her in those dissembled marks of a good understanding. The proposal of an interview was again revived, but did not take place this year.

Elizabeth's attention was now called towards the affairs of the continent, particularly those of France, which were now involved in the utmost confusion and disorder. The duke of Guise and the cardinal of Lorraine, still pregnant with design upon England, had endeavoured to gain Anthony de Bourbon, king of Navarre, over to their scheme, by promising him their niece, Mary of Scotland, in marriage, and, by the assistance of the pope and Philip of Spain, to put him in possession of the throne of England. Elizabeth, coming to the knowledge of this scheme, dispatched sir Henry Sidney into France, under pretence of complaining of some acts of piracy committed by certain French freebooters on the English merchantmen, but in fact to inform himself exactly of the affairs of the French, and of what was contriving against her, that she might take her measures accordingly.

Catherine de Medici, the queen mother and regent, still continued to foment the differences between the two factions, and seemed to incline to the side of the Huguenots, who were the weakest. As the Guises had artfully persuaded the catholics to compromise their differences with the chiefs of the protestant league, she feared to see herself once more left to their mercy, as she had been in the last reign, if the Huguenots were oppressed. For this reason she supported them, and procured them a favourable edict, called the Edict of January, because published in that month this year: it permitted the protestants to have preaching places without the city. But though the intent of this edict was to quiet matters in the kingdom, it proved the source of the civil wars which soon after desolated France. The duke of Guise, though removed from his post of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, still wanted to be its master. He was already looked upon by the people as the protector of the catholic religion. As he was going through Vassy, a town on the borders of Champagne, he fell in with a body of Huguenots, who in consequence of the privilege granted them, were singing Psalms, after their manner, in a barn: he gave orders to his servants to fall upon these poor defenceless people, of whom upwards of sixty were killed by them, and the rest, being wounded, fled to the woods for shelter from the murderous cruelty of their own countrymen. Upon this there was a general rising of the protestants in almost every part of the kingdom, and the nation became divided between the duke of Guise and the prince of Condé: Catherine de Medici fluctuated between both; nothing was seen on all sides but bloodshed and pillage. The queen was then at Paris, with the young king her son, where finding herself deprived of all authority, she wrote to the prince of Condé, to come to her deliverance. The fatal letter was as a mandate for continuing the civil war, which was carried on with the greatest inhumanity: every town was a fortified post, every street a field of battle. Anthony, king of Navarre, the first prince of the blood, a weak and irresolute man, who knew not of what religion or party he was, jealous of his brother Condé, and obliged against his will to serve the duke of Guise, was dragged to the siege of Rouen, together with the queen-mother: he was killed at this siege, and deserves a place in history on no other account than that of being the father of the great Henry IV.

Philip II. who was uneasy at the progress which the Huguenots made in France, and who apprehended that the contagion might spread into the Low Country provinces under his dominion, who had already given strong intimations of their affection to the reformed religion, had engaged in a secret alliance with the duke of Guise, for the defence of the ancient faith, and the extirpation of heresy. He now sent six thousand men with a supply of money to strengthen the catholic party. The first pitched battle between the catholics and the reformed was fought near Dreux: the battle was remarkable by both generals being made prisoners; de Montmorency, who commanded the king's army, in quality of constable of France, and the prince of Condé, who was at the head of the reformed army. The duke of Guise, who was second in command to the constable, gained the battle, and after his victory went and laid siege to Orleans, of which the reformed had possessed themselves at their first taking up arms.

The Huguenots, unable to resist such a powerful confederacy formed against them, supported by the royal authority, were obliged to dispatch the vidame of Chartres and de la Haye, with some other agents, to solicit the assistance of Elizabeth for preventing the total ruin of the protestant cause in France. The vidame and his colleagues arrived at London in the latter end of June this year (1562), and, having obtained an audience of the queen, demanded, in the name of the prince of Condé, and the protestant league in France, a supply of ten thousand men, and a considerable sum of money; but the politic Elizabeth, though inclined to assist the prince, would not agree to send either, unless some strong places were delivered to her, for the safety of her troops, and to remain in her hands till Calais was restored to the crown of England. This demand proved very disagreeable to the French; but Condé and his party were in too much distress to reject any terms that should be insisted on, and a treaty in his name, and that of queen Elizabeth, was signed on the twentieth of September, at Hampton-court, by which the prince engaged "to put Havre de Grace into the queen's hands, to be kept by a garrison of three thousand English English, till the restitution of Calais." Elizabeth on her part undertook "to send three thousand men to assist in the defence of Rouen and Dieppe, and to supply them with one hundred thousand crowns, besides forty thousand for the garrisons she should put into these two last places: and both of the contracting powers obliged themselves not to treat with the adverse party, but by common consent*."

These were the principal articles of the treaty, in consequence whereof Elizabeth immediately sent over Ambrose Dudley (one of the sons of the late duke of Northumberland, whom she had the year before created baron Lisle and earl of Warwick) to France, with six thousand men, part whereof were landed at Dieppe, and the rest took possession of Havre. The queen published at the same time a manifesto, declaring, "that she did not send troops into Normandy with a design to recover that province, the ancient patrimony of her ancestors, and unjustly wrested from them; but to preserve it for the king of France, during his minority, and to rescue it from the ambition and tyranny of the princes of Lorraine: that she was the more concerned to endeavour to prevent that province falling into their hands, as it was manifest their design was to seize the ports of Normandy, and from thence to invade her dominions, after the extirpation of the reformed in France: that for these reasons she thought herself obliged to assist the young king, hinder his subjects from being oppressed by the Guises, protect the professors of the reformed religion, and provide for her own safety."

Immediately upon this manifesto being published, and that the English troops had landed in France, a proclamation was issued by the faction of Lorraine in Paris, in which queen Elizabeth being charged "with breach of faith, seizing the king's fortresses, and aiding his rebels, war was declared against her, her dominions, and subjects†." This hasty step, which was taken by the advice of the cardinal of Lorraine, and was followed by a seizure of all the English ships at Bourdeaux, and the imprisonment of her ambassador's courier at Boulogne, soon appeared to be impolitic. The English began to fit out privateers to make reprisals on the French; and at the same time the queen required the court of France to declare plainly their resolution, whether they would have peace or war with England. The court was resident at Paris at the very time the proclamation above-mentioned had been made, but, not being prepared for an open war, thought fit to disavow any knowledge thereof, hoping thus to elude Elizabeth's demands: but that princess, not satisfied with a verbal disclaiming of the proclamation, insisted that the king and queen-regent should, either by some public act, notify to the world that no proclamation of war had been made against England in Paris, with their knowledge, or by their orders; or else write her a letter, under the king's hand, to the same effect. This being complied with by the court of France, Elizabeth declared herself satisfied, and hereupon declined following the advice of Throgmorton, that she would take advantage of the proclamation for the recovery of Calais, which he represented as an easy enterprize. The best soldiers it seems had been drawn out of the place to join the army, insomuch that there were not left in it two hundred fighting men; and if six thousand men were landed from Havre, in a moonlight night, on the sands about it, they might easily make themselves masters of Newenham bridge, and of Calais itself before it could be relieved. What were the queen's reasons, or those of her council, for neglecting so favourable an opportunity of recovering this place, we have no authorities to declare from: thus much, however, is certain, that the parliament, which met in January following, offered to grant the supplies necessary for the recovery of Calais. Such was the state of the French affairs at the end of the year 1562.

In Scotland, the family of the Gordons, of which the earl of Huntley was the chief, being privately countenanced by the house of Guise, endeavoured to take queen Mary out of the hands of her brother James Stuart, earl of Murray. The proceedings in this affair not having any immediate connection with England's concerns, we shall not stop to relate them, but only observe that the attempt proved fatal to the enterprizers, the earl of Huntley being defeated by the earl of Murray, in a battle fought near Inverness, and himself, with his eldest son George, taken prisoner, and conducted to Dunbar, where they were tried, and sentenced to die; but the sentence was not executed. While these things were transacting in that kingdom, James Melvill, author of the Memoirs that bear his name, was employed at Inspruck (in Germany) to sound the inclination of the Imperial court concerning the marriage of Mary with the archduke Charles of Austria, one of the sons of the emperor Ferdinand. The first overture of this design had been made by the cardinal of Lorraine, in his way through Inspruck to the council of Trent, with the offer of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland for his niece's portion, whom her uncles were ready to dispose of to any powerful prince who would assist them with his forces in their unremitted plots against England, especially as their project had been lately in part spoiled by the death of the king of Navarre.

Elizabeth at this time lived in so good correspondence with Mary, that she made her boast of it in all the courts of Europe, to prove that all their misunderstandings had been owing to the practices of the Guises alone; but when this negotiation came to her knowledge, she could not bear the thoughts of Mary's matching with any foreign prince, as being extremely jealous of every accession of power to one whom she on all occasions had discovered to be her chief rival to the crown of England: she therefore ordered Randolph, her ambassador at the Scottish court, to acquaint that queen, "that if she encouraged any notion of the marriage, it would put an end to their friendship, and to all Mary's hopes of succeeding to the crown of England, since the English would never run the hazard of falling under the dominion of the house of Austria." She added, "that Mary's only way to remove all jealousies betwixt them, was for her to marry some English nobleman, to be recommended by Elizabeth." So far the ambassador was ordered to represent to queen Mary, and then to intimate to the earl of Murray and secretary Maitland, that he believed Elizabeth had intentions to recommend Robert, lord Dudley, whose lady was lately dead. Mary, on the other hand, thought (and indeed not without some justice) that she had a right to chuse a husband for herself, and had already entertained some notions of giving her hand to Henry Stuart, lord Darnley, a handsome young nobleman, and eldest son to the earl of Lenox: however, she thought it politic for the present to reject all farther treaty with the archduke.

This year Shan O Neil earl of Tyr Oen, in Ireland, who had, in 1560, broke out into rebellion, came and made his submission to queen Elizabeth, and received her pardon.

On the eleventh of January, 1563, the parliament of England sat down, and Mr. Thomas Williams was chosen speaker of the house of commons. The chief intention of the members in this parliament was to second Elizabeth's laudable zeal for the improvement of trade and manufactures, for the increase of her navy, for the suppression of vice, and the more effectual curbing of popery. She had done the greatest things, with the least burden to her subjects that had ever been known, and it was thought reasonable that she should be supported; it was therefore voted, that the clergy should grant one subsidy, and the laity another, besides two fifteenths and tenths. "A fifteenth and tenth (says Camden) is a certain tax on every city, borough, and town; not upon every man in particular, but a general sum, in proportion to the fifteenth part of the wealth of the respective places. A subsidy, we call that which is imposed on every single person, as they were assessed by poll, according to the value of his goods or lands."

A little before the meeting of this parliament, the queen had been seized with the small-pox; and as her life had, for some time, been in great danger, the commons presented an address to her majesty, entreating her to fix the succession in such a clear and explicit manner, as might prevent the calamities to which the neglect of so important a point would certainly expose the nation. But Elizabeth found means to elude their application, by alleging the same reasons which she had formerly given to the queen of Scots.

The bill that made the greatest noise, and was most vigorously opposed in this parliament, was "An act for assurance of the queen's power over all estates," which was levelled against the usurped jurisdiction of the Romish see within England. By this act all who maintained, by printing, preaching, or teaching, the pope's authority within Elizabeth's dominions, were made, by the first offence, liable to the penalties of Præmunire. The oath appointed by the statute which revived the supremacy, in the first year of this reign, was by this act, "extended to all who have been, or shall be admitted to holy orders, or to any degree in the universities, and to all school-masters and lawyers almost of any denomination." But if it was tendered and refused a second time, the penalty was then the same as in the cases of high-treason, only the blood was not to be corrupted, nor the heir disinherited, nor the dower forfeited. It is farther enacted, "that all members of the house of commons are to take this oath, or to lose their seats in parliament. But it was provided, that the oath should not be pressed the second time upon any but ecclesiastics, or notorious recusants, who are to take it, or become liable to the penalties of treason. All persons of or above the degree of a baron, are exempted from this oath. Mr. Atkinson, in the house of commons, and the lord Mountagu (who was now returned from Spain) in the house of lords, made strong speeches against the tyranny of this bill; nor do their adversaries seem to have answered some of the arguments urged against it.

The other acts of this parliament chiefly related to the discouragement of prophecies, magical practices, and forceries, to which the ignorant were much addicted. A celebrated convocation sat at the same time with the parliament; and, after many altercations, published the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion of the Church of England, in the same form we now have them. The parliament continued sitting till the tenth of April, and the queen, after passing an act of general pardon, with some exceptions, ordered the same to be prorogued till the second of October.

While Elizabeth thus regulated her domestic concerns, the duke of Guise was carrying on with great vigour the siege of Orleans, which was defended by d'Andelot, brother of the admiral, who marched into Normandy to make a diversion in favour of the besieged, and receive supplies of men and money, which he expected from the queen of England. Orleans was almost reduced to extremity, when the duke of Guise was mortally wounded with a pistol-bullet, by a young enthusiast of the protestant party, named Poltrot de Mere, who, pretending to be a deserter from the town, had been received into the camp of the royalists, and watched an opportunity to shoot the duke in the back. The duke, finding his end approaching, expressed a deep-felt remorse at the remembrance of his having excited a civil war, and exhorted the queen-regent to conclude a peace with all possible expedition.

The death of the duke of Guise, which happened on the twenty-fourth of February, 1563, rendered the queen-mother mistress of the court and army of France, and the imprisonment of the prince of Condé had disposed him to an accommodation. The queen-mother, alarmed by the accounts of the English preparations, sought nothing so much as to unite the kingdom against the English. The progress of this accommodation amongst the French is foreign to our history: suffice it to say, that both parties being heartily tired of the war, they soon agreed to the conditions of a pacification, the chief articles being the extension of the Edict of January, with a few qualifications for the Huguenots free exercise of their religion, the repeal of all the decrees and sentences against them, the release of prisoners on both sides, and that all the parliaments in France should publish and register the edict to be issued for the observation of the treaty. This edict was passed on the nineteenth of March, at Amboise, and, being approved by the parliament, was executed without any difficulty or delay. Orleans, Caen, Lyons, and other cities in the hands of the Huguenots, returned to the king's obedience.

In this treaty, however, neither Condé nor his party paid the least regard to that generous friend, the queen of England; on the contrary, the Huguenots, impatient to see the English in possession of any part of their country, joined the army of the royalists in laying siege to Havre de Grace, garrisoned by the English troops under the earl of Warwick, wick, and distinguished themselves in driving the English out of a place which themselves had put into their hands, when their case was desperate and they could not have been supported without their assistance; a conduct which, though it might shew them to be good Frenchmen, proved them bad friends and perfidious allies. In this change of sides and distress, the earl of Warwick defended the town with great bravery and intrepidity, and it was verily believed would have baffled their united force, had he not been obliged to a capitulation by the plague breaking out among his garrison, which swept off fifty of his soldiers in a day, among whom were his chief officers.

The queen, hearing of the distress of her gallant soldier, sent a commission to the earl to yield up the place, and at the same time dispatched admiral Winter and another sea officer, with a squadron of ships and transports to bring off the garrison. The earl, having obtained honourable conditions, delivered up the place on the thirty-first of July; but the most fatal event of all was, that the English garrison, which arrived in England in the beginning of August, brought with them a pestilence so raging, that it swept off upwards of twenty thousand persons in and about London alone, amongst whom were the following great personages: first died William, lord Grey of Wilton, governor of Berwick, a man famous for his great military talents; then William, lord Paget, who had been equally serviceable in the cabinet, and, though he had always shewn himself a zealous patron of the Romish religion, yet was held in great estimation by queen Elizabeth; Henry Manners, earl of Rutland, descended by his mother's side from king Edward IV. fell likewise a prey to this raging destroyer; as did Frances, duchess of Suffolk, mother to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, and daughter to the unfortunate ladies Jane and Catherine Grey.

The interest of the queen of Scots was very much reduced in France by the death of the duke of Guise, especially as Charles IX. who had declared himself of age to govern, was wholly under the influence of his mother, who sought all opportunities to mortify Mary, her daughter-in-law: the Scottish guards were dismissed; the duke of Chatelerault was denied his revenues; and the payment of Mary's dowry was discontinued, notwithstanding the warm representations of the cardinal of Lorraine, whose credit sunk at court with the death of the duke his brother. This made him more anxious than ever to bring his niece to consent to give her hand to the archduke Charles; but Mary, after a mature examination of what had been offered on both sides, resolved to persist in her refusal of that prince, for fear of doing herself a prejudice in England; but withal she determined to evade the proposal Elizabeth intended to make her concerning the lord Dudley, without breaking however with her. It was absolutely necessary to shew a regard for Elizabeth, in order to continue with more ease her intrigues in England, and increase there the number of her friends, which was become very considerable since the death of the duchess of Suffolk, who was the only competitor with her for the crown, after the death of Elizabeth without issue.

In a word, both queens professed the most sincere affection for each other, and adopted, in all appearance, the sentiments as well as style of sisters.

In September this year, a new border-treaty was made between them, in which the stipulations are much more explicit than any of the preceding; but they are too minute to have a place here. In the beginning of December Elizabeth sent to Mary, as a token of her affection, the famous ring which we shall so often have occasion to mention, and which Mary received with great demonstrations of kindness. Elizabeth also inflicted a severe punishment on one Hales, who had composed a book against Mary's title; and the lord-keeper Bacon being supposed to have prompted Hales to this undertaking, he incurred her majesty's displeasure, and it was not without extreme difficulty that he could recover her good opinion.

Queen Elizabeth, having found by experience how fickle the French protestants had carried themselves towards her, resolved to embarrass herself no longer with their affairs, but to make peace with the court of France, if the same might be obtained upon honourable terms. Accordingly, in the beginning of the year 1564, negotiations were set on foot for that purpose, and a treaty was finally concluded at Troye, in Champagne, on the eleventh of April, by which each crown preserved entire all their pretensions; and Elizabeth agreed, by a separate article, to release the French hostages, on consideration of one hundred and twenty thousand crowns of gold. Throgmorton, who had been detained prisoner in France, was set at liberty; and Elizabeth nominated the lord Hunsdon, her kinsman, to carry the Garter over to the French king, who was so well pleased with the compliment that he offered to give the order of St. Michael to any two Englishmen the queen should name. England at this juncture enjoyed the most profound tranquility: her trade with the Low Countries had been interrupted by the intrigues of cardinal Granville, who, foreseeing a war in the Netherlands, wanted to remove the English, and persuaded the government to prohibit the importation of English cloth, a branch of traffic which was carried on to a prodigious extent; but Philip perceiving this prohibition was in all respects as detrimental to his own subjects as to those of England, desired the old treaty, called Magnus Intercursus, made in the reign of Maximilian I. might be renewed; and the affair was determined to the satisfaction of both nations.

The queen, no longer taken up with foreign cares, made a progress this summer to the university of Cambridge, where she was received with great pomp and magnificence. She testified her satisfaction in an elegant Latin oration, wherein she assured the university of her protection and intention to encourage learning to the utmost of her power. It was on her return from this progress that she, on the thirtieth of September, created the lord Robert Dudley baron of Denbigh, with a grant of that castle and honour, and the next day advanced him to the higher title of earl of Leicester, the castle and manor of Kenelworth, which had belonged to the ancient earls of Leicester, being given him for the better support of that dignity. He was soon after chosen chancellor of the university of Oxford; and (at the queen's recommendation) received from Charles IX. of France the order of St. Michael. In a word, Elizabeth seemed to set no bounds to her favours in behalf of a person who, according to her own declaration to Melvill, envoy to her from the queen of Scots, "she esteemed as her brother and best friend, and whom she would herself have married, had she not determined to live and die a virgin *."

This nobleman did not want talents and qualities to recommend him to a lady's good graces: he had great accomplishments of mind and body, an open countenance, a graceful address, a courteous and winning behaviour, and such an absolute command of his temper, that he could suit himself to all humours: but with all this he had great vices; he was void of all sense of honour, justice, or religion; his boundless ambition put him upon aspiring to the marriage of his own sovereign, and, in despair thereof, to that of the queen of Scotland, one of the finest and most accomplished princesses of her age. Such was the man recommended by Elizabeth as the fittest husband for queen Mary; and accordingly, in the month of May this year, she wrote a letter to her, wherein she laid before her many arguments, shewing the dangerous consequence of matching herself to a foreigner, and concluded with promising her, that if she would consent to marry the earl of Leicester, (then only lord Dudley) Elizabeth would, in the next parliament, acknowledge Mary as the successor to her crown and dignity; but that if she married without her consent, she must look on her affairs in England as ruined.

This liberty taken by Elizabeth to advise a queen, her equal, with such an air of superiority, so exasperated Mary, who was naturally warm and haughty, that, forgetful of her political maxim, not to quarrel with Elizabeth, she returned such an answer as greatly offended the English queen. However, Mary, when grown cool, reflecting how much it was her interest to maintain an intercourse with Elizabeth, sent sir James Melvill to London, with a letter containing some concessions, and a proposal of renewing their former friendship. The queen of England, who was a perfect mistress of the art of dissimulation, admitted her rival's excuses with great good-humour, expressed the warmest affection for her royal kinswoman, and concluded with several reasons why Mary should be convinced it was her interest to take Dudley as the most suitable person for her. Not that Elizabeth ever wished this match might really take effect: she loved Dudley too well to part with him to a detested rival; but her aim was to detach the queen of Scotland from the alliance with the house of Austria, and amuse her with a treaty which would never be brought to perfection.

In the mean time the court of France was greatly alarmed at the prospect of Mary's marrying an English nobleman. The queen-mother and the cardinal of Lorraine sent orders to de Foix, the French ambassador at the Scottish court, to offer Mary, if she would refuse the proposed match with Dudley, and adhere to her connections with France, that they would pay her dower-money that was in arrears, continue it punctually for the time to come, and restore the Scots to all their former liberties in France. They observed, that, beside the injury offered to Mary's royal dignity, Elizabeth never could be sincere in proposing to match her with a man who was so dear to herself: that as to the bait of declaring Mary her successor to the crown of England, she could have no security for the performance, even though it could be done by parliamentary authority, since it was no uncommon thing for one parliament to repeal the acts of another.

These suggestions had their effect upon Mary: but, willing to keep fair with Elizabeth, she consented that a conference (at that queen's desire) should be held upon the subject of her marriage with the earl of Leicester, at Berwick; that the earl of Bedford should be one of the commissioners on the part of England, and that the earl of Argyll should, with Murray and secretary Maitland, be for Scotland. This conference was accordingly held in the month of November this year; but as both parties were insincere, Mary never intending to take a husband upon Elizabeth's recommendation, and Elizabeth's sole view being to amuse the queen of Scotland, or, as it was suspected in that kingdom, only proposing the earl of Leicester to Mary that she herself might marry him with less dishonour, after his having been encouraged by an absolute queen; nothing passed in the conferences but what was trifling, dark, and general. Leicester himself seems to have thought himself so sure of Elizabeth, that he was not only cold in his addresses to the queen of Scotland, but secretly warned the earl of Bedford, the first commissioner on the part of England, not to be too eager in the affair. The Scottish commissioners, on their part, were so well instructed, that they rather outdid the English in their cold reception of the proposals made in Leicester's favour. Thus the affair hung for some time, till at length, as the conferences were going to break up, the earl of Murray frankly declared to the English commissioners, that the situation of his mistress's affairs would not suffer her longer to live single, and that if she did not match in England, she would with some other foreign prince. Mary, however, had other views, as we shall soon see. Thus stood affairs between England and Scotland in 1564. This year died the emperor Ferdinand I. leaving the Imperial dignity and his hereditary dominions to his eldest son Maximilian.

The year 1565 opened a new scene of discontent and troubles between the two queens, and between Mary and her subjects. We have already observed, that she had for some time fixed her mind on marrying the lord Darnley, son to the earl of Lenox: she was first inspired with this design by one David Rizzio, a musician, whom she employed in her service. He had come to Scotland in the ambassador of Savoy's train, and his parts far exceeding his station, it is no wonder that, in a country rude like that of Scotland in the times we are describing, a princess, who had necessarily so great a foreign correspondence as Mary had, put him in a station about her person beyond what he could claim from his excellency in his profession. His person was mean, shrivelled, and deformed: he was advanced in age, so that it seems the pure invention of scandal and malice to represent him as possessing from Mary other favours but those to which he was entitled by his superior capacity in her service as secretary for the foreign tongues. However, the queen at length distinguished him so much by her favours, that almost every one who had any thing to ask of the court applied to him, so that in a short time he amassed a handsome fortune: but as he was suspected to be a pensioner of the pope, it gave grounds of suspicion that he would find means to set the queen against those of the reformed religion; and the lord Darnley being a papist, and Rizzio the pope's emissary, it is generally believed that Mary was determined on this match by her favourite's advice: but, indeed, there appears to have been very many reasons in sound policy why Mary should have listened to such an alliance.

Young Darnley was her cousin-german by the lady Margaret Douglas, niece to Henry VIII. and daughter to the earl of Angus, by Margaret, queen of Scotland. He had been born and educated in England, where his father had constantly lived ever since he had been expelled his native country by the superior interest of the Hamiltons. Darnley was likewise by his father descended from the same family with Mary, and would, by marrying her, preserve the royal dignity in the house of Stuart. He was, after her, next heir to the crown of England; and those who affected to deny her title on account of her being a foreigner, had endeavoured to maintain his claim, and gave it the preference. It was, moreover, deemed no inconsiderable advantage, that she could by espousing him, unite both their titles; and as he was an Englishman by birth, and could not, by his power and alliances, give any cause of suspicion to Elizabeth, it was presumed that the proposal of this marriage would not be disagreeable to her.

But that jealous prince's presently dived into Mary's politics; and as her drift was always to keep the royal widow in a state of submission to her will, she strove all in her power to prevent this marriage also, by which the titles of the two families to both crowns would be united, and the queen of Scotland become independent upon her as to the succession; she therefore became now more urgent than ever for Mary to give her hand to the earl of Leicester: and so intricate and unaccountable was the conduct of each of these princesses at this juncture, that, by one of Randolph's dispatches to Cecil, it appears that so late as the fifth of February this year, Mary shewed some compliance to this match, provided she was gratified in her demands of a large pension from England, and being declared next heir to the crown; though but a very little time before she had sent for the earl of Lenox into Scotland, by the advice of the countess of Lenox, her aunt, under pretence of restoring him to his ancient inheritance, from which he had been banished twenty years; but in reality to consult with him about her marriage with his son; and Elizabeth had not only agreed to the earl's departure, but actually wrote to Mary, earnestly recommending that nobleman to her favour, and thanking her for her kind intentions towards him: and the earl accordingly went into Scotland.

But as Darnley was yet in England, some way was to be found to get him clear of Elizabeth's power, before the intended match could be made public: this was effected on pretence of his presence being necessary in the assembly of the Scottish states, summoned to restore his father to his honours and estates. Accordingly leave was asked and obtained of the English court for his absence for three months on that business, Elizabeth and her council not supposing that this young lord would dare to marry Mary without the queen of England's consent.

Darnley arrived in Scotland in the month of March this year, and by his presence completed the conquest he had made by his fame: Mary, forgetting all her ideas of grandeur, and all her schemes of policy, listened only to the dictates of her growing love; and secretary Maitland was named ambassador to go into England, and from thence to France, to notify and excuse her marriage with Darnley. Rizzio soon found means by his address to win the confidence of this young nobleman, who made him his friend and companion. This gave great umbrage to the English party, who, with Randolph, immediately doomed Darnley and him to the fate they afterwards experienced.

In the mean time Murray, perceiving his credit daily decline, and foreseeing the difficulties and dangers such a match, with a popish lord and contrary to the advice of the queen of England, would precipitate the reformed religion and state into, withdrew from court, and was soon joined by the duke of Chatelerault, the earl of Argyll, and others of the nobility, who thought it time to apply effectual remedies to the impending mischiefs; and their party being strengthened by several who opposed the advancement of the house of Lenox from private views, they set about means to overturn that by force, which could not be otherwise prevented.

On the other hand, Mary, who had intelligence of their designs, endeavoured to strengthen herself by taking into favour all the enemies of the opposition. She recalled the earl of Bothwell from France, and the earl of Sutherland from Flanders; and she not only released George Gordon from the castle of Dunbar, then under sentence of death, but pardoned him, and permitted him to assume the title of earl of Huntley. These nobles and their party were now the only attendants at court, and these the queen assembled as soon as notice arrived of the pope's dispensation for her marriage with Darnley being granted, and asking their advice concerning her intended espousals, obtained their unanimous consent. Buchanan says that even the earl of Murray, when he perceived there was no hindering it, proposed to gain Elizabeth's consent, provided the protestant religion could be secured.

Secretary Maitland, who had been sent to England, executed his commission to Elizabeth, who referred him to her privy-council, where the thing was for some days very seriously debated. At last, on the first of May, they came to a resolution, "That such a marriage would be dangerous to religion and to the kingdom of England, and therefore that the queen of England could not give her consent thereto." And Throgmorton was immediately ordered to repair to Scotland with a copy of the said resolution, and with instructions for dissuading queen Mary from marrying the lord Darnley: at the same time letters were sent to Randolph, to be delivered from Elizabeth to Lenox and Darnley, ordering them, upon the expiration of their leave of absence, to return home, under the highest pains and penalties the law of England could inflict: and the countess of Lenox and her second son, who were then in England, were committed to close confinement in the Tower.

The conduct of Elizabeth, though usually judicious, was always full of duplicity and deceit; but never did she behave with greater insincerity than in her transactions with the queen of Scotland. Notwithstanding that she at this time expressed so violent a resentment against the projected match with Darnley, she was in her heart not averse to it: she would rather have wished indeed that Mary had remained for ever in a single state; but finding that her sister (as she always affected to call her) had less ambition, or at least less continence, than herself, she did not dislike a choice which delivered her at once from the fear of a foreign alliance, and the necessity of yielding up her favourite Leicester: but she had strong reasons of a political nature for affecting displeasure on the present occasion, it furnished her with a plausible pretext for refusing to declare Mary her successor to the English crown, a point which she had always laboured to evade; and it likewise served her for another purpose, still more unjust and dangerous, namely the fomenting a spirit of discontent and rebellion among the Scottish nobility and clergy; a scheme which, unhappily for the peace of Scotland, she succeeded but too well in.

As to Mary, when the resolution of the English council was notified by Throgmorton, she very properly observed, that as Elizabeth had already signified her inclination for her marrying an English subject, to avoid the umbrage her matching into any foreign great family might give her, she was in effect following her advice. She promised however, that, to give time for Elizabeth seriously to weigh the matter, she would defer her marriage for three months. Elizabeth, not contented with this concession, directed Throgmorton and Randolph to encourage the malecontents of Scotland with the promise of her assistance and protection. Accordingly the noblemen began to enter into association, the townsmen of her capital to raise tumults, and all the Scottish nation appeared under a panic, on account of the queen's marriage. But Mary, whatever representations had been made to the contrary, was still dear to her people: Edinburgh was in an instant reduced to her obedience; and the traitors found themselves so warmly pushed, that they actually applied to Elizabeth for support, in order immediately to take arms against their prince, who had not yet done one public act to justify resistance, much less rebellion. Mary however, notwithstanding all opposition, married the lord Darnley, about the middle of July; and drove the malecontents to such a brink of despair, that they were obliged to take refuge in England about the beginning of November. In this distress they nominated the earl of Murray their deputy to Elizabeth, and he repaired to London to solicit her protection: but the subtle princess gave them to understand, that he had nothing to expect from her, unless he would publicly own that she had no concern in their revolt. Having extorted such a confession from the mean-spirited nobleman, in the presence of the French and Spanish ambassadors, she reviled the Scottish lords as rebels and traitors, and forbade them to appear in her presence. Nevertheless they found protection in her dominions; and the earl of Bedford, by her private orders, supplied them with money for their subsistence. Mean while Mary convoked an assembly of the estates of her kingdom, that the fugitives might, by an act, be degraded and banished.

The transactions of this year between England and France carry with them nothing particular. The proposal of Elizabeth marrying the archduke of Austria had been lately revived, but, on the accession of Maximilian to the Imperial dignity, a new difficulty started; the Imperial court pretended that they could not in honour suffer the archduke to match with a princess, who had given such extravagant marks of affection to a man, as Elizabeth had to Leicester: even the English council could not reconcile to their own judgments the enigmatical behaviour of their queen; and Elizabeth went so far as to have it debated at the council-board, whether she should marry the earl of Leicester or the archduke of Austria. There is extant, in lord Burleigh's papers, a curious abstract of this debate, which we shall give to the reader, on account of the instructive matter it contains.

The reasons which ought to move the queen to marry the arch-duke, besides his person, his birth, his alliance, were as follow: "I. She shall not diminish the honour of a prince, to match with a prince. II. When she shall receive messages from kings, her husband shall have of himself by birth a countenance to receive them. III. Whatsoever he shall bring into the realm, he shall spend it here in the realm. IV. He shall have no regard for any person, but to please the queen. V. He shall have no opportunity nor occasion to tempt him to seek the crown after the queen, because he is a stranger, and hath no friends in the realm to assist him. VI. By marriage with him the queen shall have the friendship of king Philip, which is necessary, considering the likelihood of falling out with France. VII. No prince of England ever remained without good amity with the house of Burgundy; and no prince had ever less alliance than the queen of England hath, nor any prince ever had more cause to have friendship and power to assist her estate. VIII. The French king will keep Calais against his pact. IX. The queen of Scots pretendeth title to the crown of England; and so did never foreign prince since the conquest. X. The pope also, and all his parties are watching adversaries to the crown."

The reasons against the queen's marrying the earl of Leicester were as follow: "I. Nothing is increased by marrying him, either in riches, estimation, or power. II. It will be thought that the slanderous speeches of the queen with the earl have been true. III. He shall study nothing but to enhance his own particular friends to wealth, to offices, to lands, and to offend others: sir Henry Sidney, earl of Warwick, Sir James Crofts, Henry Dudley, sir Francis Jobson, Appleyard, Horsey, Leyghton, Molineux, Middlemore, Colshil, Westman, Killigrew, John Dudley, Christmas, Foster, Ellyfs, Middleton. IV. He is infamed by the death of his wife. V. He is far in debt. VI. He is like to prove unkind or jealous of the queen's majesty."

Leicester, who was of an haughty impatient temper, could not brook the freedoms that were taken with his character; and, depending on his interest with Elizabeth, he treated some of his enemies with great indecencies; but Elizabeth soon convinced him that he was but the second idol of her heart, and that she was resolved to suffer no affection to come into competition with her power: for even at the time when she suffered the expediency of his becoming her husband to be debated, she ordered him not to appear in her presence.

This

This severe mortification, joined to the marriage of the queen of Scots, which Leicester always believed to be effected by Elizabeth's private intrigues, soon convinced him, that obedience was his best course, and zeal his strongest recommendation to the favour of his mistress.

Pope Pius IV. dying in September this year, his successor took the name of Pius V. We return now to the affairs of Scotland, which are very material to clear the history of Elizabeth.

After the dissolution of the council of Trent, the pope had endeavoured to form a league with the courts of France, Spain, and the empire, for the extirpation of the reformed religion: at length, in a conference between the queen of Spain and her brother, the French king, who met on the frontiers, and by means of a correspondence between the queen-mother of France and the duke of Alva, a resolution was taken, and measures concerted, for crushing the Huguenots in France, the protestants in the Low Countries, and the Reformation in all parts of Europe. This league, thus formed at Bayonne, was sent over to Scotland, and subscribed by Mary; and the cardinal of Lorraine pressed her, by Rambouillet, the French ambassador, to proceed with the utmost vigour against the protestant leaders, who had presumed to take arms against her: and the cardinal had gained such an ascendancy over the mind of his royal niece, that he diverted her from the more mild and moderate course which she intended to have pursued, and made her resolve on the total ruin of the fugitive lords.

A parliament was summoned to meet at Edinburgh in the beginning of the year 1566, for their trial; and as the crime of which they had been guilty was notorious to all the world, it was generally believed that sentence would be given against them, notwithstanding the warm instances of the English ambassador, who conjured the queen to pardon them, or at least delay their sentence: they were, however, preserved by a sudden and unforeseen accident, which brought Mary herself to utter and irretrievable ruin.

The fugitive lords had many friends in Scotland, and amongst them the lord Darnley himself, now consort to the queen, to whom he had been married but a very short time before there appeared visible marks of discord between them. Mary had been so captivated with the external charms of this young nobleman, that she had entirely overlooked the imperfections of his mind, which little corresponded with the fair form set forth to the eye of the world. He was of a weak understanding, but of an insatiable ambition and intolerable pride; he was mean, loose, and dissolute in his manners; and so little regard had he to gratitude, or the common laws of decency and honour, that he is said to have brought to the arms of his royal bride, the most lovely of her sex, a disease that should never be known out of the confines of a brothel. Not content with these domestic injuries, he demanded from her the matrimonial crown in such a manner as shewed him to be determined to strip her of her own, and he openly put himself at the head of a party that wanted to deprive her of all authority, that they might engross it to themselves under his weak management. His unhappy wife in vain attempted to reclaim him by every effort of conjugal tenderness, but, finding her endeavours fruitless, her former love sunk into indifference, and from thence soon to aversion.

The discontented faction, who looked upon Darnley, from his disposition, as a proper tool for ambition and treason, spared no pains to improve the visible discord between him and the queen to their own advantage. Rizzio, Mary's secretary and favourite, had at first exerted his utmost endeavours to forward the marriage of Darnley, and a firm friendship seemed to be established between them; but in the following change of the queen's sentiments, it was easy for Henry's companions to make him believe that Rizzio was the real cause of the queen's coldness towards him, and even to infuse into his mind jealousies of the most unjust as well as of the most dangerous nature.

The earl of Morton, the lord-chancellor, was the chief of those, who, under pretence of religion, set themselves up as opposers of Mary's government: with him were joined George Douglas, natural brother to the countess of Lenox, and the lords Ruthven and Lindsey. These had the ear of the weak Darnley, and moulded his mind to their own purposes. They persuaded him to expostulate with the queen on her too great intimacy, as it was called, with David Rizzio; and the queen, secure in conscious innocence, treated these insinuations with the indignation they merited; and, in order to let her consort see, that in exalting him she meant not to divest herself of all authority, she ordered his name to be omitted on the coin, and to be set after her own in public acts, which at first she had ordered to be set before; and, perhaps, from a spark of female pride and resentment, might shew more countenance to Rizzio, after this insult she had received on his account than she otherwise, would have done. The event, however, was what the incendiaries had well foreseen: the hot-headed Darnley, inflamed with rage, resolved to make the favourite fall a victim to his resentment, hoping by his death to remove the cause of his royal consort's coldness and aversion to himself; and, consulting with Morton and his other friends on the occasion, they not only encouraged him in his design, but also advised him to recall the exiled lords, and by their means form a balance of power in his favour, sufficient to supersede the authority of Mary; promising him in that case not only to fix the matrimonial crown on his head, but also to get an act of parliament passed for continuing the succession in his person, should he survive his queen. But as they knew that Henry was no less fickle than rash, they persuaded him to sign a paper, in which he engaged to screen them from any danger to which the assassination of Rizzio, now resolved upon by the junto, might possibly expose them, avowing that undertaking, and declaring it to be done in consequence of his desire. These necessary precautions taken, a messenger was dispatched, in Henry's name, to the banished lords, who were lurking about the borders (all but the duke of Chatelerault, who had been permitted by Mary to return, on his humble concessions, and promises of future peaceable behaviour), inviting them to return to their own country, and binding himself to obtain their remission, restore them to their estates, espouse their quarrels, and concur with them in supporting and establishing the protestant religion.

However, Darnley could not conceal his intention so closely, but some of his domestics, whom he had endeavoured to gain over to his assistance in the projected murder, discovered it to the queen, who expressed herself with so much resentment against Darnley for his base design, and vindicated her favourite with so great warmth, that Henry began to fear for his own liberty, and therefore was easily persuaded by his advisers to have the fact perpetrated without farther delay. That Mary was blameable in giving Rizzio so great ascendancy at her court, is indeed past dispute; and, perhaps, her favour had rendered him insolent; but he might have been removed by legal methods, while Darnley had recourse to ruffian force; and his design, so detestable in itself, was rendered still more odious by the circumstances which attended the execution. A full account of the whole barbarity was drawn up by the lord Ruthven, the principal actor, and is now in print, by which it appears in worse colours for the conspirators than any historian has represented it; we shall therefore give it in that lord's own words.

"Upon Saturday, the ninth day of March, the earl of Morton, lord Ruthven, and lord Lindsey, with their accomplices, passed up to the queen's outer chamber; and the said lord Ruthven passed in, through the king's chamber, and up through the privy way to the queen's chamber, as the king had learned him, and through the chamber to the cabinet, where he found the queen's majesty sitting at her supper at the middle of a little table, lady Argyll sitting at one end, and David Rizzio at the head of the table, the king speaking with the queen's majesty, and his hand about her waist. The lord Ruthven, at his coming in, said to the queen's majesty, "It would please your majesty to let yonder man, Davie, come forth of your presence, for he hath been over-long here." Her majesty answered, "What offence hath he made?" The said lord replied again, "That he had made great offence to her majesty's honour, the king her husband, the nobility, and commonweal of the realm." "And how?" saith she. "It will please your majesty (said the lord), he hath offended your majesty's honour, which I dare not be so bold to speak of: as to the king your husband's honour, he hath hindered him of the crown matrimonial, which your grace promised; besides many other things, which are not necessary to be expressed: and as to the nobility, he hath caused your majesty to banish great part, and most chief thereof, in so far as he suffered not your majesty to grant or give any thing but that which passed through his hands, by taking of bribes and goods for the same; besides many other inconveniences that he solicited your majesty to do." Then the said lord Ruthven said to the king, "Sir, take the queen's majesty, your sovereign and wife, to you," who stood all amazed, and whist not what to do. Then her majesty rose, on her feet, and stood before Davie, he holding her majesty by the plait of her gown, leaning back over in the window, his whyniard drawn in his hand. And then Erskine and the abbot of Holyrood-house, and others began to lay hands on the said lord Ruthven, none of the king's party being present: then the said lord pulled out his whyniard, and freed himself while more came in, and said to them, "lay not hands on me, for I will not be handled." And at the incoming of others in the cabinet, the said lord Ruthven put up his whyniard; and, with the rushing in of men, the board fell to the wall wards, and the meat and candles being thereon, the lady Argyll took up one of the candles in her hand, and in the same instant the said lord Ruthven took the queen in his arms, and put her into the king's arms, beseeching her majesty not to be afraid, for there was no man there that would do her majesty's body more harm than their own hearts, and assured her majesty all that was done was the king's own deed and action. Then the remanent gentlemen being in the cabinet, took Davie out of the window, and, after they had him out of the queen's chamber the said lord Ruthven followed, and bade take him down the privy way to the king's chamber: and the said lord returned to the cabinet again believing that the said Davie had been had down to the king's chamber, as said; but the press of the people pursued him forth to the outer chamber, where there was a great number standing, who were so strenuously moved against the said Davie, that they could not abide any longer, but slew him at the queen's far-door, in the outer chamber*."

The queen was then above five months gone with child, and it may be easily judged what an effect the committing such a deed in her presence was likely to have on a person in her condition. Melvill (and truly I think not without some reason) says it appeared to be done to destroy both her and her child; for they might have kill Rizzio in any other place and at any other time. Ruthven tells us, that the lords concerned in this murder were for dispatching him in his own chamber in a morning, or elsewhere; but the king insisted it should be done in the manner it was. However, it must be confessed that Mary, on this occasion, behaved with admirable prudence: after having paid a decent tribute of grief to the cruel fate of a man she had honoured with her confidence, she dried up her tears, and said she would weep no more, she would now seek revenge; while the assassins, conscious of their own guilt, and dreading the resentment of their sovereign, detained her a prisoner in the palace, dismissing all who might attempt her delivery. But, notwithstanding all their precautions, she found means to send her commands to the provost of Edinburgh to assemble the people, and come to her relief. But when the tumultuous rabble appeared before the palace, the king told them, from a window, that Rizzio had been slain by his command, upon which, and at his request, they dispersed and returned home.

Mean while Mary, who had very justly conjectured that the return of the banished lords would be the speedy result of the late rebellious proceedings against her authority, determined to secure herself against the malice of her inveterate enemies, by a coalition with those who had been at the worst but insolent opposers. With this view she found means to dispatch her trusty servant, Melvill, to confer with the earl of Murray, and endeavour to gain him over from the rebel party, by the warmest promises of her future affection and favour. Murray, who knew enough of the parties concerned in the late assassination, and of the treasonable force put upon the royal person, to be sensible that they had acted only for themselves, and had made overtures to him and his fellow exiles, not out of any real friendship to them, but only to secure themselves a party, readily listened to the proposals Melvill made him from his sister; and being returned to court with the other banished lords, he gained admission to the queen, when a perfect reconciliation was effected between them; and himself, with the other lords his companions, were indulged with a free pardon, and restored to the possession of their honours and estates.

The perpetrators of Rizzio's murder applied to her for the same favour, but she artfully eluded their application, by telling them, that while she was confined in custody and surrounded by guards, any deed which she should sign would be considered as null and void: but finding that they still pressed her to an acquiescence, she had recourse to managing her husband so as to detach him from the conspirators; and this she did so effectually, that Darnley's weak head was brought to deny all that his heart had contrived, or his hand had executed: and having, by the help and policy of Murray, got her guards dismissed, she even persuaded the king to escape with her in the night, and take refuge in Dunbar. Here she was joined by so many of her subjects, that she soon assembled an army which the conspirators were unable to resist; and advancing to Edinburgh, she compelled them to fly into England, where they got leave from Elizabeth to reside: two of them only, who were left behind, were proceeded against in the way of justice, and executed. Darnley, by a proclamation, declared himself innocent of the murder of Rizzio, and declared that he repented having given any countenance either to the conspirators or the banished lords.

Mary in a short time reconciled herself to all the nobility about her court, and them to each other, and Murray once more appeared to be the most zealous of her friends. But Randolph, the English envoy, had by this time fallen into great disgrace with Mary, who accused him of having not only privately given three thousand crowns to the conspirators, but of being the author of a scurrilous pamphlet against her person and government; and sent Robert Melvill to the English court, to have that minister recalled. Elizabeth was not at a little loss how to behave on this occasion; however, after mature reflection, she ordered Randolph home, who had been forbidden to appear at Mary's court, and named Henry Killigrew to succeed him: at the same time she, at Mary's earnest instances, gave orders to Morton, Lindsey, Ruthven, and others of the conspirators, to withdraw out of her dominions; but Ruthven dying at Newcastle on the thirteenth of May, Mary, out of her own good-nature, gave, before the end of the year, a remission to the rest, at the intercession of some of the nobility. Murray, Argyll, and Glencairn, were soon after sworn of the privy-council, and the earl of Huntley was made chancellor in Morton's stead. As for the king, he made but a very indifferent figure at this time, being universally despised for his late behaviour, even by the murderers of Rizzio, for disowning the part he acted in that affair, and every one shunned his company. The queen now effected a formal reconciliation between the fugitive lords and the earls of Huntley and Bothwell, though it does not seem to have been sincere on the part of the latter, who utterly hated the earl of Murray; and being by this time become a favourite with Mary, he soon involved her in fresh troubles.

All this time the two queens were each of them labouring in private, by their emissaries, to corrupt each other's subjects, and inspire them with a spirit of rebellion against their lawful sovereign, in order to turn their dissensions to their own advantage. These proceedings, however, they pretended to conceal under the mask of regard and deference for each other. Elizabeth had her spies about Mary; and when she sent the fugitive lords out of England, it was with assurance of her protection in time of need, in order to retain them as instruments of disturbance in their own country when time served. Mary kept her ambassadors at the English court to spirit up a faction: and, if we may believe Melvill, that minister executed his instructions so well, that at the birth of the young prince James, many whole shires were ready to insult, and their leaders already named by some of the nobility.

During these transactions, Mary, on the nineteenth of June, 1566, was delivered of a son, afterwards James I. of England, in the castle of Edinburgh, and sir James Melvill was forthwith sent to impart the news to Elizabeth, and desire her to stand god-mother to the new-born prince. Melvill acquaints us, that this princess, the evening of his arrival at London, had given a ball to her court at Greenwich, where she appeared in high good-humour and gaiety; but that when the birth of the prince of Scotland was communicated to her, she threw herself into a chair, leaning her head upon her hand, without speaking a word; upon which one of her ladies taking the freedom to ask the reason of her sudden melancholy, she replied, "Know ye not that the queen of Scots is mother of a fair son, while I am no better than a barren flock?" Next day, however, at the audience of the Scottish ambassador, she reassumed her usual dissimulation, put on a chearful countenance, thanked Melvill for the dispatch he had made in bringing her the agreeable news, and expressed the most cordial friendship for her dear sister of Scotland. Soon after she sent the earl of Bedford, with his relation George Carey, son to the lord Hunsdon, in order to assist at the baptism of the young prince, and charged them with several magnificent presents for the queen of Scots.

The birth of a son contributed greatly to encourage the zeal of Mary's partizans in England; and even men of all parties began to cry aloud for some settlement of the succession; but Elizabeth, whenever she was pressed on this point, put off the matter by pretending an inclination to match with the archduke Charles. However, the duke of Norfolk, the earls of Pembroke and Leicester, with several others, imagining that the prince's birth, which had encouraged them to declare openly their sentiments in Mary's favour, might have a like effect upon their mistress, and engage her to declare that princess her successor, advised Melvill to make the proposal. This he did, but with great circumspection, telling her "he was assured she formerly delayed declaring his mistress presumptive heir of the crown of England, only till she might see some issue of her body; and this being now the case, he hoped her majesty would no longer defer gratifying the the desires of her subjects, who wished to see one point settled, in doing justice to the title of his sovereign, who would never seek any place or right in England, but by her favour and furtherance." To this Elizabeth replied, "that the prince's birth was a strong inducement to her using greater diligence in making an inquisition into that matter; and that she thought the right belonged to her good sister, in whose favour she heartily wished it might be decided; but waved making the declaration till the young prince was baptized, when she said she would certainly satisfy the queen of Scotland in that matter." The ambassador took this to be a mere evasion, and so it proved.

About the beginning of December, the earl of Bedford, by Elizabeth's order, assisted at the ceremony of baptizing the prince of Scotland, which was performed in presence of the ambassadors from France, England, and Savoy. After the ceremony, the earl of Bedford pressed the queen of Scotland to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh; but Mary declined complying with this request. Nevertheless she offered to sign a new treaty, importing that she should not assume the title or arms of the queen of England during the life of Elizabeth and her posterity. Before Bedford's departure from the Scottish court, sir James Melvill acquaints us, that he was very earnest with Mary for her receiving Darnley again into her good graces; but that princess would by no means listen to any proposal of the kind; and, indeed, the affront he had caused to be offered to her person (exclusive of his domestic ill treatment of her) in the affair of Rizzio's murder, the blemish he had endeavoured to throw upon her character, the danger to which her life had been exposed by his brutal behaviour, on account of her pregnancy, were injuries so great and intolerable, that they seemed entirely to preclude him from all hopes of overcoming her just indignation.

The earl of Bothwell was now in great credit with Mary. He had been always sincerely attached to her family and person, and had performed signal services to both. His courage and conduct, as a soldier, were unquestionable, and he had a most cordial hatred of the English, against whom he had been a great and successful commander upon the Borders, where his estates lay. He had been for some years before banished, through the influence of the earls of Arran and Murray, but had been recalled by Mary, and pardoned. In his private life he was completely profligate; he had, by his intemperance, dissipated a large estate, but he still retained all the means of mischief except money, and all manner of vice but hypocrisy. His appearance, however, was manly, though now advancing to the decline of life; he was equally gallant in the court as in the field; and he had that openness of manners that, with his experience in life, rendered him to both sexes an agreeable companion. Such a man could not but be ill-relished by the gloomy reformers of Scotland; and this very circumstance, perhaps, served to rivet him in Mary's esteem. But, notwithstanding all the malicious suggestions of Buchanan of a criminal conversation between Mary and Bothwell, we should be careful how we too lightly give our assent to charges unsupported by authentic documents.

As the knowledge of the affairs of Scotland is absolutely necessary for understanding the motives of queen Elizabeth's conduct and politics, we have therefore thrown together, without interruption, whatever passed of moment in that kingdom in the year 1566, but shall now proceed to other matters.

In England, this year, Elizabeth was not without both her pleasures and perplexities. The troubles of Ireland gave her some concern; but it was allayed by the submission of Donald M^c Carty More, an Irish nobleman of great power, who, upon his knees, made a surrender to her of his estate, which was returned him with the title of Glencairn. But her chief vexation proceeded from the manifest affection which many of her great men discovered for Mary's title, which was more strengthened than ever, since the birth of her son. She was likewise not a little embarrassed by the pressing instances the Imperial ambassador made for her answer as to her marriage, which she continued still to evade with great dexterity. But her reputation abroad was now so high, that the marquis of Baden, with his wife the princess Cecilia, came to England with no other apparent design than to gratify a violent curiosity the lady had to see Elizabeth, the female Solomon of her age. This compliment pleased Elizabeth excessively; she gave a pension of a thousand crowns a year to the marquis, and prevailed with him to leave his wife in England till she should be delivered, as she soon afterwards was, of a boy, to whom Elizabeth stood god-mother. About autumn, Elizabeth, who had great pleasure in displaying her learning, made a progress to Oxford, where she harangued the university in Latin, to the no small admiration of the students and the foreign ambassadors who attended. During her stay she affected great concern for the prosperity of literature, and the welfare of the university, which so endeared the members to her government, that she became ever after the arbiter of all their disputes. She had paid the like compliment two years before, but not with the like success, to the university of Cambridge.

Upon her return from Oxford, on the thirtieth of September, the parliament, which had, for various reasons, been prorogued from time to time, sat at Westminster. The friends of Mary in England had now raised a powerful party in her favour, and it was resolved to leave nothing undone that might induce Elizabeth at length to recognize her right to the crown after her own decease. With this view the house of peers, which had hitherto declined touching on the delicate point of the succession, now led the way, and the commons soon followed the example of the lords.

For Mr. Molyneux made a motion, that the affair of the subsidy (which had been moved at the opening of the session, by sir Francis Knolles and secretary Cecil) might go hand in hand with that of the succession. The house in general expressed great satisfaction in the motion; but some of the privy counsellors, who knew how disagreeable a subject it was to Elizabeth, sought to divert it. They told the house, that she pledged to them the word of a queen, that she would marry as soon as she could find a person to her liking; that the appointment of a successor would expose her person to great danger; and that she was determined to delay to a more proper opportunity the decision of that important question. The house, not satisfied with these reasons, and resuming the subject with some some warmth, Elizabeth, on the ninth of November, sent a message by sir Francis Knolles, expressly commanding them to meddle no farther in the matter of the succession, but to be contented with her promise to marry.

Upon this Paul Wentworth, a spirited member, made a motion that the question should be put, "Whether that message was not a breach of privilege?" This brought on very warm debates; and, on the twelfth of the same month, the speaker was sent for, and ordered by Elizabeth to repeat to the house her commands against their meddling any farther in that matter. This threw the whole house into a flame; and such strong symptoms of discontent began to appear, that, on the twenty-fifth, she found herself under a kind of necessity to revoke, by the mouth of the speaker, her two former orders, by which she had imposed silence on the house in the affair of the succession, and to allow the house liberty of debate.

They were so mollified by this gracious condescension, that they thenceforth conducted the matter with more calmness and temper, and they even voted her a supply, to be levied at three payments, of a subsidy and a fifteenth, without annexing any condition to it. But Elizabeth, thinking this was only meant as a sweetener, to bring her to comply with their desires, remitted a third part of the sum, declaring, that she looked upon money in her subjects purse to be the same as if it were in her own Exchequer. Nevertheless, several very severe reflections were thrown out by some of the members against Cecil, on a supposition that he had the chief hand in advising Elizabeth to decline settling the succession. Her physician Dr. Huick, who was a member of the house, had his share likewise of censure, being charged with having frightened the queen from marriage, by persuading her that it would be hurtful to the constitution and frame of her body. These indecencies ruffled the queen so much, that, on the second of January, she put an end to the session with a very smart speech, reprimanding the members of both houses for their eager meddling in the point of the succession, and advising them not to try her patience for the future; declared she knew how to distinguish the principal offenders from the rest; and that the greatest part of the members departed in her good graces. To shew, however, to the nation her own opinion as to the successor, whose right there was no reason to doubt, she imprisoned Thornton, reader of the law in Lincoln's Inn, upon a complaint from the queen of Scots that he had written and published a book against her right. It is not improbable that this affair would have been debated again in the next parliament, if, in the mean while, the queen of Scotland had not lost herself by her ill conduct, and visibly lessened her party in England. But before we proceed to shew in what manner this happened, we shall close the year 1566 with a brief account of the affairs of the Netherlands.

After Philip had quitted these provinces, in 1559, in order to reside in Spain, the discontent of the nobles and people was grown to that height, that it was impossible for the affairs of that country to remain any longer in their present situation. This universal dissatisfaction flowed from several causes: I. The people's belief that the king had formed a design to abolish their liberties and privileges, and establish an arbitrary power. II. The erection of bishoprics, which greatly lessened the jurisdiction and revenues of the abbeys, in which many families were concerned. III. The Inquisition, which was intended to be set up in these provinces, and which was little less abhorred by the catholics than by the protestants themselves. IV. The prohibition to assemble the states. V. The king's project to extirpate the heretics, who were now very numerous in that country. VI. And lastly, the interest of the great men, who plainly saw how fatal to them the execution of the king's design would be. They had in vain, for several years, besought their governors to assemble the states, and prevent the calamities with which they foresaw their country was soon going to be afflicted. Their request was constantly rejected: this rigour had at length obliged the prince of Orange, count d'Egmont, count Horne, and several other lords, to withdraw from the council of state, and write to the king. The cardinal de Granville had rendered himself so odious, that the worst was to be feared if he continued any longer in the Low Countries: Philip not thinking proper to recal the cardinal directly, advised him however to withdraw. As soon as Granville was gone, the great men went and resumed their places in the council.

Mean while the Inquisition being universally abhorred, the people began to stir, and shew their resolution to free themselves from that yoke. The great men supported this resolution, and with two motives; first, because they perceived the Inquisition must prove destructive of liberty: in the second place, because they were informed the king had taken terrible resolutions against them, on account of what had passed about cardinal Granville: whereupon they formed a confederacy against the Inquisition, and Lewis, count of Nassau, brother to the prince of Orange, with four hundred attendants, presented a petition to the governors. On this occasion it was that the protestants received the name of Gueux, or Beggars. The governors not having the power to grant their request, the protestants, of their own accord, took the liberty to preach publicly, and the governors was forced to suffer it, and at length expressly to allow it. From that time Philip considered the people of the Low Countries as rebels; and they, for the most part, looked upon him as an unjust and cruel sovereign, who required to be absolute master of their estates, their bodies, and their souls. I shall enter no farther into these affairs: it suffices to have briefly shewn the spring of the troubles of the Netherlands, which I shall have occasion to speak of sometimes in the sequel. I now return to the affairs of Scotland, which more nearly relate to England.

The earl of Bothwell, whose character we have already given, had by this time acquired the entire confidence of Mary, and all her measures were directed by his advice and authority. Reports were spread of more particular intimacies and familiarities between them, and these reports gained ground from the continuance, or rather increase, of Mary's hatred to her husband. The queen seems to have been stung with these reproaches; for, on Darnley's falling sick, about the middle of January, 1567, at Glasgow, where he had for some time resided, she, in defiance of the inclemency of the season, the badness of the roads, and her own weakness so soon after lying-in, made a journey from Edinburgh

Edinburgh on purpose to visit him, and behaved to him on this occasion with the greatest tenderness, forgetting in the duty she owed him as a wife, the causes of resentment he had given her as his sovereign. This step gave great pleasure to all those who wished well to her character, and they flattered themselves with the hopes of a speedy reconciliation, especially when it was found that she had brought the king along with her to Edinburgh, and seemed disposed to live with him on terms more suitable to the connexions between them: but these hopes were soon overturned by a fatal accident, which was the astonishment of every one, and which brought upon Mary a load of blackest infamy; with what justice will best appear when we come in a few years to treat of this event, as becoming an English concern.

The queen lived in the palace of Holyrood house, but as the situation of that place was low and unhealthy, and the concourse of persons about the court was necessarily attended with noise, Darnley was lodged in a house in the Kirk Field, a place in the more healthful suburbs of the town. Here the queen continued to visit him with the most endearing marks of affection, and some nights lay in a room in the said house. It happened that on the ninth of February, one of the queen's maids of honour was married, and Mary, to shew her regard for a favourite servant, resolved to honour the ceremony with her presence, and therefore returned not that night out of the city. About two o'clock in the morning, the whole town was much alarmed with a violent noise, which, to the amazement of every one, proved to be from the blowing up of the house in which the king lodged, whose dead body was found at a distance in a neighbouring field. Buchanan and others, who have delighted in raking for every circumstance that can possibly fix an odium upon Mary's character, pretend that the whole was a plot concerted between her and Bothwell; that her assisting at the marriage of her servant was merely a pretext to be out of the way when the deed was performed; and they add, that when the dead body of Darnley was discovered, his shirt was not the least singed with flame, his slippers lay just by him, and that some black and blue marks were seen round his neck, whence they would infer that he was strangled before the house was blown up. But this supposition is contradicted by the confession of the criminals; and there is no necessity to admit it in order to account for the condition of his body: there are many instances that men's lives have been saved, who have been blown up in ships; had Henry fallen into the water, he had not probably been killed.

No doubt, however, could be entertained but Henry was murdered, and the general conjecture soon pointed out Bothwell as the author of that crime. As to Mary, she caused the body of Darnley to be interred with as much pomp as the four manners of the protestants in her court would admit of, in a vault, where, to ocular demonstration, it yet rests, with the remains of other royal personages, contrary to the infamous falshood of Buchanan, who has made Mary mingle his dust with that of the ignoble Rizzio. According to Leslie, Mary was inconsolable on this occasion: she shut herself up in the castle of Edinburgh, and could not be drawn from the melancholy life she led there, but by the repeated remonstrances of her council, and the advice of her physicians.

In the mean while, it appears from authentic papers, that she omitted nothing to bring the authors of her husband's murder to justice; and even the earl of Lenox, father of the deceased king, expressed under his own hand his satisfaction in that respect: but he advised her to call a meeting of parliament, as the most effectual course for discovering the truth. Mary readily agreed to this; and the earl of Lenox having named Bothwell and six others whom he suspected, on the twenty-eighth of March an order was made by the privy-council of Scotland for the trial of Bothwell and his supposed accomplices. This trial came on the twelfth of April, proper notice having been given to the earl of Lenox to come prepared with his witnesses: but whether he was conscious that he had no convincing proofs to bring besides the vulgar suspicion, which was pretty general indeed, or that he thought himself too weak in point of interest, he did not think proper to appear against Bothwell, who was consequently acquitted, as no person appeared to carry on the prosecution. Then a good number of the nobility engaged in a bond, acquitting Bothwell of the murder, and engaging to maintain his innocence with their bodies, heritage, and goods. The earls of Murray, Morton, and Argyll, were among the chief of those who signed this bond, which may account for Bothwell's insolence during the parliament which immediately succeeded his acquittal.

This nobleman being, as he thought, immovably confirmed in the great authority he had assumed in the government, by the late bond subscribed by the principal nobility of Scotland, began now to open the whole project of his ambition, which terminated in the enjoyment of Mary as a wife, and he resolved to marry her by force, if he could not obtain her voluntary consent. With this view he raised a body of eight hundred men, and, intercepting her on her return from Stirling, where she had been to visit the young prince her son, conveyed her to his castle of Dunbar, where he completed his rape. All this, it must be confessed, appears to have passed without any resistance on Mary's part; and, though it does not appear by any evidence, that Mary could of herself so much as suspect Bothwell to be the author of her husband's death, yet she doubtless acted very imprudently, not to give it a worse term, to smile upon him while he was committing a double rape upon her person and dignity.

Next followed a very illegal divorce between the earl of Bothwell and his countess; and Bothwell brought Mary to Edinburgh castle, still with an appearance of force. Some of the nobility, however, in order to put matters to a fair trial, sent her a private message, in which they told her, that if in reality she lay under force, they would use all their efforts to relieve her; but Bothwell, to remove this and all other difficulties, got many of the principal lords of the council to sign a paper, which was something between a petition and a command that the queen should marry him. Seeing the chief part of her nobility combined, and Murray's, Morton's, and Bothwell's factions united in this affair, and reflecting on the troubles of her reign, the parties that distracted the kingdom, the continual danger ger of insurrections, and her own inability to govern them without the assistance of her nobility, she found herself under the necessity of conforming to the petition in the paper delivered to her, which fatally operated to her ruin by her giving her hand to Bothwell, on the fifteenth of May, after having granted him a pardon for all offences, and created him duke of the Orkneys.

The news of this transaction being carried to foreign countries, filled all Europe with amazement, and threw infamy not only on the principal actors in them, but also on the whole nation, who seemed, by their submission and silence, and also by their declared approbation, to give their sanction to these scandalous practices. As to Bothwell, not satisfied with the honour of espousing his sovereign, he endeavoured to make himself master of the young prince, who had been committed to the care of the lord Erskine, lately created earl of Marr; but this nobleman refused to part with his charge. This attempt excited the most serious attention; and the principal nobility, to whom Bothwell had rendered himself extremely hateful by his overbearing insolence, even many of those who had formerly signed the application in favour of his marriage with Mary, met at Stirling, and formed an association for protecting the prince, and punishing the murderers of the late king. The earl of Athol himself, a known catholic, was the first author of this confederacy: the earls of Argyll, Morton, Marr, Glencairn, the lords Boyd, Lindley, Hume, Sempil, Kirkaldy of Grainge, Tullibardin, and secretary Maitland, entered zealously into it. The earl of Murray, foreseeing such turbulent times, and being desirous to keep free from these dangerous factions, had some time before desired and obtained Mary's permission to retire into France.

Bothwell, by his insolence, swelled his guilt: he challenged to fight any man who should accuse him of the murder; and even treated the queen herself with the greatest brutality, insomuch that she passed almost the whole day in tears, and once even called for a knife to stab herself, not being able to bear the indignities offered her by this ungrateful wretch, whom she had so highly honoured by taking to her bed.

Mean while the associated lords having gotten together a large body of men, with all imaginable diligence and secrecy, marched, on the sixth of June, to surprize the queen and Bothwell in Holyrood-house. They had undoubtedly succeeded in their design, had it not been for an advertisement sent her by one of their number, supposed to be either Argyll or Boyd, who soon after quitted their party. Upon this notice she retired with Bothwell to the castle of Borthwick, which the associators resolved to besiege: and the lord Hume coming before it with eight hundred men, Bothwell fled to the Marches, while the queen was constrained to make her escape, in mens cloaths, to the castle of Dunbar, which was capable of holding out till her friends could come to her succour. Thus disappointed in their first project of seizing the queen's person, the lords marched to Edinburgh, where they knew the people were generally on their side; and, being admitted into the city, they published, on the twelfth of June, a proclamation, declaring their designs to be only "for taking revenge on Bothwell, who had murdered the late king, had ravished and detained prisoner the queen, and was now raising forces in order to murder the prince likewise; and ordering all who would not assist them, to quit the place in four hours, on pain of being treated as enemies.

The queen, in the mean time, was raising forces for her defence, and the country came in so fast to her aid, that she would soon have been much superior to her enemies; but being ill advised, she quitted Dunbar on the fourteenth of June, and advanced, with about four thousand men, to Preston, where she joined the earl of Bothwell. The associators marched the next morning out of Edinburgh, came, about noon, in view of the queen's forces, which were posted on Carberry-hill, and the armies prepared for an engagement. Le Croix, the French ambassador, an aged gentleman of honour and character, interposed his good offices for an accommodation: with this view he went to the associated lords, and assured them of their sovereign's inclination to peace, and readiness to forgive what they had done amiss: but Morton telling him they had taken arms, not against the queen, but the late king's murderer, and would admit of peace on no condition but either her delivering him up, or removing him from her presence; and Glencairn adding, that they were not come to ask pardon for any offence they had done, but to punish such as had offended; the ambassador, judging by these haughty replies, that nothing was to be done, took leave of the queen, and rode off to Edinburgh.

All hopes of an accommodation being now at an end, and the queen perceiving a visible backwardness in her officers and men to draw their swords in her cause, so long as Bothwell remained with her, she, in this extremity, took the fatal resolution of submitting to her enemies, and sent to desire to speak with Kirkaldy, laird of Grange; who arriving, declared to her, that the confederates desired nothing else than that she should send away the murderer of her husband. After some bravadoes of Bothwell, in which he discovered more insolence than courage, he thought proper to retire secretly, while the queen, upon Kirkaldy's promises of good treatment, delivered her person into his care, who, taking her horse by the bridle, led her down the hill, and delivered her into the hands of the confederates, by whom she was conducted to Edinburgh, where the populace treated her with the utmost indignity. From her palace of Holyrood-house she was sent, under a strong guard, to the castle of Lochleven, belonging to William Douglas, uterine brother to the earl of Murray, who received an order, signed by the associated lords, to detain her in safe custody. This was a house situated in the middle of a lake, and inaccessible on all sides but by a boat. But the most ingenious part of their cruelty consisted in committing her to the custody of the earl of Murray's mother, who pretended to have been married to James V. Mary's father, and that her son, the earl of Murray, was the fruit of that marriage; hence she was an irreconcilable enemy to all the legitimate branches of the house of Stuart, and she omitted no occasion to insult and maltreat the captive queen.

As to Bothwell, he fled unattended to Dunbar; and, fitting out some ships, set sail for the Orkneys, where he subsisted during some time by piracy. He was pursued thither by Kirkaldy, and his ship taken with several of his servants; Bothwell himself escaped in a boat, and found means to get a passage over to Denmark, where he was thrown into prison, lost his senses, and died miserably about ten years afterwards. An end worthy of his flagitious conduct and behaviour.

Elizabeth's conduct during those misfortunes of her kinswoman, was irreproachable; and though the conspirators undoubtedly trusted to be supported by her, yet, upon the strictest enquiry, it does not appear that she had any hand at this time in the troubles of Scotland. On the contrary, on the thirtieth of June, she ordered Throgmorton to set out for Scotland, and there to inform himself fully of Mary's situation, and to promise her all the aid in her power: though Throgmorton was at the same time entrusted to expostulate very freely with her upon the imprudencies of her conduct; which she received with a flood of tears, and acknowledged her mistakes. This minister had at the same time orders to talk roundly to the confederates, and to threaten them, in his mistress's name, to force them to set their sovereign at liberty, if they refused to do it of their own accord.

Throgmorton, however, found the confederates entrenched within the insolence of success, and that they were acting in such a manner as may naturally be expected from subjects who have their future fears to provide against, as well as their present animosities to gratify. The associated lords were determined to proceed with the greatest severity against the queen, but they were divided in their opinions what to do with her: some would have her banished perpetually into England or France; some would have her brought to a trial in open court, as an accessory to the death of her husband, committed to perpetual imprisonment, and her infant-son proclaimed king; another party still more inhuman, wanted at once to deprive her of princely authority, and even of life itself; Knox and the other fanatic protestant preachers in particular were for this last bloody expedient, which they recommended with all the insolent rage of enthusiasm from the pulpit*. Throgmorton supported the mildest proposal; but, though he promised his mistress's guarantee for the performance of articles, he declared, in Elizabeth's name, that she was determined not to see her sister oppressed by her rebellious subjects; and warned them not to draw upon themselves, by their violences, the public reproach which now lay upon the queen. He found, however, that, excepting secretary Maitland, he had not the good fortune to convince any of the leaders, and was fain to accept of (all he could get from them) a writing, without any subscription, wherein they protested that they had shut up the queen for no other intent but to keep her from Bothwell, whom she loved so desperately, that, for the enjoyment of his company, she would not hesitate to compass the ruin of them all, with that of her country; at the same time professing all the duty imaginable to her royal person, and that she should be restored to her liberty the instant proper enquiry had been made into the murder of her husband: protestations which their actions and behaviour towards the unhappy princess daily gave the lie to.

For now they doubled the rigour of her confinement, and even denied Throgmorton all access to her person; nay, though with tears she besought them to deal more mildly with her, and to let her have but one sight of her son, these fiends of rebellion denied her even this consolation, so dear to the heart of every tender parent. Conscious, however, that it was necessary for them to have the form at least of the ancient government of the realm, to countenance their traitorous proceedings, they resolved at last to force her, by the threats of whatever could shake her constancy, not sparing even menaces of death, to make her comply with their views; and being by this time afraid of Elizabeth's resentment, and that of other powers, they came to a resolution of sending the lord Lindsey, one of Mary's most desperate enemies, with three instruments, ready drawn, to be signed by her: the first, constituting the earl of Murray, who was then out of the kingdom, regent during her son's nonage, and in the mean while establishing a council for the exercise of the regal authority until that earl's return, and a power to continue, in case he should refuse to accept the commission: the next was an instrument of demission from Mary, in favour of her son: and the last, an absolute commission for Murray to act as regent, without any mention of a council. The earls of Athol and Marr, secretary Maitland, and Kirkaldy of Grainge, in great concern for the queen's life, sent her their advice by sir Robert Melvill, to sign them, since no act that she did under duress could be of any validity. Throgmorton sent her the same advice in a letter which Melvill was prevailed upon to carry her, concealed in the scabbard of his sword; but she could not be persuaded to follow it, till the ruffian Lindsey and his associates came to her, who acted their parts with as much brutality as their principals could have wished; and having terrified her almost out of her senses, by their inhuman threats, she submitted to the necessity, and, with a flood of tears, which prevented her from reading a word of the contents, she signed the instruments on the twenty-fourth of July; and these being presented the next day to the pretended council of the faction, at Edinburgh, Morton accepted her resignation, "in the name of the three estates of Scotland," from whom he had no powers, and who were not so much as mentioned in the instrument, the resignation being made only in the prince's favour; a deviation from the commission sufficient, in law and equity, to invalidate the action, with all subsequent proceedings thereon. The unhappy queen however found means to convey to Throgmorton a letter to Elizabeth, wherein she declared all that she had done, as having been extorted from her by the terrors of immediate death.

In consequence of this forced resignation, the young prince, then about thirteen months old, was, five days afterwards, viz. on the twenty-ninth of July, proclaimed king, by the name of James VI. He was soon after crowned at Stirling, and the earl of Morton took in his name the coronation-oath, in which a promise to extirpate heresy was not forgot. Some republican pretensions in favour of the people's power were countenanced at the ceremony, and a coin was soon after struck, on which the fa-he endeavours to prove, that the people have power to create and depose their king at will; and seeks to found facts which never existed, upon principles that never can be disputed.

mous saying of Trajan was inscribed, "PRO ME, SI MEREOR, IN ME, — For me, if I deserve it, against me." Throgmorton had orders from his mistress, who was punctually informed of all these transactions, not to assist at the coronation of the king of Scotland; and a protestation was put in by the Hamiltons, that all this ought to be no prejudice to the duke of Chatelerault, in his right of succession over the family of Lenox.

About the twelfth of August the earl of Murray returned out of France to Scotland, and, in a few days after his arrival, went to visit the queen in her prison, to whom he behaved with great harshness, upbraiding her for her supposed crimes and real inadvertencies, and talked to her (says Throgmorton, in one of his letters to Elizabeth) rather like a ghostly father than a counsellor. Sometimes the queen wept bitterly, sometimes she acknowledged her unadvisedness and misgovernment; and, looking for nothing less, at the hands of her rebellious lords, but an ignominious death, or perpetual confinement, she had recourse to her brother Murray, now as her only friend. This was the very point which the perfidious earl wanted to bring her, and he at last consented to stand her friend, but on condition that she should not attempt to regain her liberty, to meddle in the affairs of government, or to excite either the crowns of France or England to stir in her cause. It was no wonder if a princess surrounded, as Mary was, by merciless traitors, and fearing what they might do, from the experience of what they had done, was wrought to confess crimes they charged her with, of which perhaps she was never guilty, and to promise every thing that was required of her.

As to Murray, that he had held a private correspondence, not only with the Scottish rebels, but with Mary's enemies in England, appears very plain by a letter from Cecil to sir Henry Norris, the English resident in France, dated so far back as the twenty-sixth of June, part of which the reader will find in the note†: there is, moreover, great reason to suspect that he had other intentions of a very black nature; for, not to mention other particulars, he brought with him from France an agent, who offered the services of the French king to the lords, in case Elizabeth should proceed against them; but being denied access to Mary, the ambassador seemed very cold in soliciting: yet this very man (Murray) did the distressed broken-spirited queen, in one of his visits to her, beseech, with tears in her eyes, to take upon him the regency, the government of her son, and the custody of her jewels, which he accepted with an insolent condescension; and, upon a second visit, deigned to give her assurances of the preservation of her life and honour, but would promise nothing as to her liberty.

Murray being proclaimed regent, signed an instrument, by which he bound himself to do nothing which should concern either war or peace, the king's person, or his marriage, or the liberty of the queen, without the consent of the confederates; and then gave Throgmorton warning, by secretary Maitland, not to make any farther intercession for the queen's liberty, for that he, and the rest of the party, would run the hazard of all events rather than suffer it. He soon after convoked a parliament at Edinburgh, in which he broke, in the most public manner, all terms of decency with the unhappy Mary: for that assembly, after voting that she was undoubtedly an accomplice in her husband's murder, condemned her to imprisonment, ratified her demission of the crown, and acknowledged her son for king, and Murray for regent.

His power thus confirmed, Murray, who was a man of vigour and abilities, employed himself successfully in reducing the kingdom. He bribed sir James Balfour to surrender the castle of Edinburgh, which had hitherto held out for the queen; he constrained the garrison of Dunbar castle to open their gates, and he demolished that fortress. He signed a warrant for the execution of Dalglish, Powry, and two others, servants of Bothwell, who had been taken, tried, and convicted of assisting in the king's murder: but it is not a little to Mary's honour, that, with their dying breath, they solemnly protested, before God and his angels, that they had heard Bothwell declare, that Murray and Morton were the contrivers of the murder, and that the queen was intirely innocent. This was a strong vindication of Mary, and did not fail to operate to such a degree amongst the wiser and more dutiful part of her subjects, that the conspirators had now no safety but in continuing her bondage. It is now time to turn to the affairs of England.

Towards the beginning of this year Elizabeth was alarmed with a copy of the league which has been already mentioned to have been signed by the Roman catholic powers, for the extirpation of the protestant religion: but the malignity of it was in a great measure diverted by the progress of the troubles in the Low Countries, of which we have, in the close of the last year, given some account.

Though the chief attention of Elizabeth, this year, was turned to the affairs of Scotland, yet she did not forget what was owing to her own and her subjects interests in other countries. The term of eight years since the treaty of Chateau Cambresis being now expired, sir Thomas Smith was sent over to Picardy, in April, with Winter, master of the ordnance, to demand the restitution of Calais, which they accordingly claimed by sound of trumpet, at one of the gates of that town, in presence of a public notary and several witnesses. But the French, without any regard to the faith of treaties to which their king had sworn, absolutely refused to restore that town to England: and Elizabeth, whose policy was to spin out a long and peaceable reign, if she could, by putting herself in a capacity to defend and maintain her possession of the throne against all attempts, did not care to be the aggressor, nor invade so powerful a neighbour as France; so the matter dropped for the present.

Whilst this matter was in agitation, the count de Stolberg came into England from the emperor Maximilian, to renew the treaty for a marriage between his brother the archduke Charles, and Elizabeth, who, either to please her subjects, or from some other political view, seemed to favour the motion. The earl of Suffex, who had been just before sent to invest the emperor with the order of the Garter, did all in his power to farther this match; but it was as strenuously opposed by the earl of Leicester, with reasons drawn from the inconveniencies of engaging in so close an alliance with a foreigner, which he said England had so severely experienced in the late reign: in a word, this treaty, which had been carrying on, at different times, for seven years, was, after long debates touching the maintenance of Charles, his assuming the title of King, and the settlement of the succession, was now entirely broken off, on account of the difference in point of religion; and the archduke soon after married Mary, daughter to Albert V. duke of Bavaria.

† "At this time I send unto you certain packets of letters, left here by Mr. Melvill, who lately came hither from the queen of Scots. The sending of these to my lord of Murray requireth great haste, whereof you may not make the Scottish ambassador privy; but I think you may make Robert Stuart privy, with whom you may confer for the speedy sending away of the same letters. His return into Scotland is much desired of them, and for the weal both of England and Scotland. I wish he was here (i. e. in England.) And for his manner of returning, touching his safety, I pray require Mr. Stuart to have a good care." Cabala.

In this same year (1567) John Basilowitz, grand-duke of Muscovy (since called Russia), sent ambassadors to queen Elizabeth, with proposals of a league offensive and defensive, and to renew and confirm the privileges he had granted to the English Muscovy company. But Elizabeth fearing such a treaty of alliance might engage her in quarrels foreign to her interest, wisely evaded the proposal, and contented herself with sending Anthony Jenkinson (who had been for some years resident in that country, and was the first Englishman who ventured through the Caspian sea into the territories of the Bactrians) back with the ambassador, giving him a commission to execute some private treaties, by which means the English obtained several very valuable privileges, and, amongst others, an exclusive trade for the above-mentioned company to Archangel.

Whilst the queen was procuring advantages to her subjects in point of commerce, she saw an happy end put to the dangerous commotions which had for some time disturbed the peace of Ireland, and had cost her great sums to endeavour to suppress: this desirable event was brought about by the vigilance, conduct, and valour of sir Henry Sidney, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom.

Shan O' Neil had tyrannized over the inhabitants of Ulster, reduced Armagh to ashes, expelled Macguire from his paternal inheritance, ravaged the lands of Macguire, and others, who were under the protection of the English, and openly rebelled against Elizabeth: but upon his submission she created him baron of Dungannon and earl of Tyrone. Not satisfied with these honours, he assembled an army of his vassals, assumed the title of King of Ulster, and offered to hold the kingdom of Ireland under the sovereignty of Mary, queen of Scotland. Randolph, a brave warrior, being sent against him by the lord-lieutenant, routed him with great slaughter at Derry, though the victor lost his life in the engagement. Shan fled to the bogs and fastnesses, while sir Henry Sidney built some fortresses to straiten him in his quarters, and re-established O' Donnel, who had been driven from his country. But Sidney being called away, to compromise a quarrel between the earls of Ormond and Desmond, Shan re-assembled a body of troops, and attacked Dundalk, from whence he was repulsed by the garrison, though he carried off O' Donnel's wife, and retired to Clandeboy, to solicit the assistance of the Scottish Highlanders, who had formerly joined his adversaries, and been defeated by his forces; he had even slain two brothers of the Highland chieftain's, who received him with seeming courtesy; but whether they had determined to make away with him, or he provoked them over his cups with brutal language touching the chastity, of their mother, they slew him with all his company. Though he left two legitimate sons, his estate was confiscated by the Irish parliament, and Tirlagh O' Neil was, by the queen's permission, elected chief of the sept, by the appellation of O' Neil. Nevertheless, as a check upon this new chief, she received into favour Shan's nephew Hugh, baron of Dungannon, a young man of a very intriguing genius. The disorders of Ulster being thus appeased, the quarrel between the earls of Ormond and Desmond, who had fought a battle near Dromish, was partly quieted by the authority of the lord-lieutenant, who was afterwards obliged to surprize Desmond and his uncle, near Killmalloc, and send them prisoners to England.

This year, on the eighth of June, sir Thomas Sackville, ancestor to the present duke of Dorset, was created baron of Buckhurst. And the duke of Norfolk, who was also greatly in favour with the queen, lost his duchess this year; she was his third wife, and he had not lived with her above twelve months; her name was Elizabeth, she was daughter of sir Francis Leybourne, knight, and widow of Thomas, lord Dacres, of Gillestland: by her death the duke unfortunately saw himself in a condition to form projects which proved his destruction.

The affairs of the Low Countries were much altered during this year. The great men were divided, and several had betrayed the common cause. The prince of Orange was withdrawn to his government, count Horn to his own town, and count Egmont continued with the governers, who, improving the dissension, revoked whatever she had been obliged to grant to the reformed. Then she sent for forces out of Germany, and raised some Walloon regiments. Soon after Philip II. resolved to send the duke of Alva into the Low Countries, with an army of native Spaniards, to chastize both the nobles and the people: whereupon the prince of Orange retiring into Germany, the duke of Alva entered the country at the head of his army, without any opposition. On his arrival at Brussels, the duchess of Parma put the government into his hands, and then the duke exercised cruelties which it is needless to relate, since they are universally known: the counts of Egmont and Horn lost their lives by the hands of the executioner, whilst Montigny suffered the same punishment in Spain, and all the prince of Orange's lands were confiscated.

On the other hand, the court of France, under colour of fearing the duke of Alva, who was to pass near their frontiers, levied six thousand Switzers, with design to extirpate the Huguenots, whilst the duke of Alva should do the same in the Netherlands, pursuant to the agreement at Bayonne. It is easy to see, that at such a juncture Elizabeth could not attempt the recovery of Calais; it was sufficient if she could avert the flames which threatened England. Mean while the prince of Condé, having difficultly escaped the snares of the court, re-assembled the Huguenots, by the admiral's assistance, and had very near succeeded in his design of carrying off the king at Meaux. After that disappointment, he went and blocked up Paris.

In

In short, on the tenth of November was fought, at the gates of Paris, a battle, wherein the constable de Montmorency was slain. This action not being decisive, the prince marched to meet Casimir, count Palatine, who was bringing him a reinforcement of three thousand foot and six thousand five hundred horse: in September, la Noue, one of the chiefs of the Huguenots, took Orleans. Thus all the neighbouring countries of England, namely, Scotland, France, and the Low Countries, were in trouble and confusion, whilst the English, by the wise management of the queen, enjoyed a profound peace.

It was, however, at the expence of her own, that Elizabeth secured the repose of her people. She had to fear both at home and abroad, and consequently was obliged to attend perpetually as well to foreign as domestic affairs, in order to prevent the designs of her enemies. The state of the Huguenots in France made her very uneasy; their enemies were likewise her's, and as there was little appearance of their withstanding the catholics, who were an hundred to one, and supported by the royal authority, she was apprehensive that, after their extirpation, the storm would fall upon England. It was scarce to be doubted that the war which was waging at once with the protestants of France and the Low Countries, was the effect of the mutual councils of the French and Spanish courts, and that the destruction of the protestant religion was the principal object these two courts had in view; Elizabeth therefore thought it absolutely necessary to let the king of France know she was concerned for the preservation of the Huguenots, whatever reason she might have to complain of their behaviour to her. To that purpose she ordered Norris, her ambassador to Charles IX. to intercede earnestly for them, and give him to understand she knew her own interest too well to suffer them to be entirely ruined. These threats from England, the resolution of the Huguenots, and their assistance from Germany, produced a good effect, and procured them a peace; but it was only a treacherous peace, wherein the court intended only to deceive them, and which, for that reason, was afterwards called the Lame Peace. Catherine de Medici, knowing it would not be long before the war was rekindled, resolved to be before-hand to prevent Elizabeth from assisting the Huguenots. To that end she began now to hint to the English ambassador a marriage between Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou, who was but seventeen years of age: but we shall have occasion elsewhere to speak of the sequel of this project.

Philip, who was now become an implacable foe to Elizabeth, as well on account of the zeal she had shewn for the restoration of the reformed religion, as through resentment of her refusal of him for her husband, took this opportunity to shew his enmity against her, by confining her ambassador, Mann, on some frivolous pretence, to his own house. On the other hand, sir John Hawkins, an English merchant, who was gone to trade in the Bay of Mexico, with five ships, by virtue of the treaty between Charles V. and Henry VIII. was insulted by the Spanish fleet, which took and rifled three of his ships. These outrages were very grievous to Elizabeth, especially as the merchants loudly murmured, and were importunate for a war with Spain; but she did not think proper then to shew her resentment, for fear of being engaged farther than the situation of her affairs would permit. She had the more reason not to enter into a war of this nature, as at the same time the affairs of Scotland, which touched her more nearly, took a new turn, and might be to her of very great consequence.

While Mary continued in prison at Lochleven, she found means so far to mollify the hearts of her jailors, that, on Lady-day, 1568, some of them undertook to favour her escape, which she attempted in the habit of a laundress; but one of the boatmen discovered her by the whiteness of her hand, which she put up to prevent her mufflers from dropping from her face: the fellows were so honest to their master, the keeper of the castle, as to row her back, notwithstanding her commands, but so humane to her as to conceal her attempt, notwithstanding their danger in so doing. Murray, on his part, was too secure to give much heed to the repeated advertisement he received of Mary's meditating an escape, and had the insolence to refuse a new ambassador from France, one Beaumont, a man of great quality, admission to her.

Mary's next attempt, however, proved more successful. She found means, by her charms and caresses, to gain the confidence of Charles Douglas (brother to William Douglas, lord of the castle and isle to which she was confined), a youth only in the eighteenth year of his age, who, unable to resist the temptation of so much beauty, suing to him in distress, yielded to her importunities, and drew others into a plot to effect her flight; and on Sunday, the second day of May, while his brother was at supper, and the rest of the family engaged in their devotions, he stole the keys out of his brother's chamber, and opening the gates to the queen and one of her maids, locked them behind her, and threw the keys into the loch; then getting into a small boat, rowed her to the shore, where, upon a signal given (and previously concerted) the lord Seaton, James Hamilton of Rochbank, and John Bethune of Pillochie, came down to the shore, with a few servants, and received the queen with the utmost transports of joy. She instantly mounted on horseback, and rode towards Hamilton, where she was soon joined by numbers of the nobility, with their friends and dependants. A bond of association was formed for her defence, and signed by the earls of Argyll, Huntley, Eglinton, Crawford, Cassils, Ross, Montrose, Sutherland, Errol, nine bishops, the same number of barons, and a great posse of the most considerable gentry: and in a few days she found herself at the head of an army amounting to no less than six thousand men.

So sudden a revolution in favour of a princess, who, but a day before, seemed abandoned to all the world, and doomed to drag out the remains of a wretched life in a loathsome prison, may seem to border upon the romantic; it may therefore be necessary to assign the causes which apparently produced this unforeseen effect. It must be observed then, that, notwithstanding the universal submission which was paid to the regent's authority, there still remained in the kingdom many secret murmurs and cabals: the friends of the house of Hamilton considered Murray's promotion to the regency as an injury to the duke of Chatelerault, who, as first prince of the blood, had, in their opinion, the best title to that office: all those who leaned to the ancient opinions in religion, were naturally inclined to favour the interests of Mary; and even the people in general, though they had formerly detested her crime, or condemned her imprudence, in being so closely connected with Bothwell, the murderer of her husband, now that obnoxious person was removed, began to be touched with pity for the unhappy condition of their imprisoned sovereign, and lamented that a person, endowed with so many amiable qualities, and possessed of such high dignity, should be subjected to such hard and severe treatment. Moved by these considerations, many of the principal nobility began to assemble at Hamilton, and to concert measures for supporting the cause of their oppressed sovereign. Such was the favourable disposition of the nation towards Mary, when she received her liberty in a manner no less surprizing to her friends, than unexpected by and mortifying to her enemies.

Among the first steps that Mary took, after her escape, she dispatched Bethune, a person of abilities, and one who had been very instrumental in her release, with a letter to Elizabeth, to acquaint her with the transaction, and to demand of her a body of forces to act against her rebel subjects: but as Bethune was ordered, after having obtained an audience of Elizabeth, to proceed to France, to ask an aid from that king likewise, Elizabeth thought proper to send Leighton, a gentleman of her court, to Scotland, to assure Mary of her readiness to assist her, both with her good offices in the way of mediation between her and the malecontents, and with a body of forces if the exigence of circumstances should require it; but, as she was afraid of the entrance of French troops into a kingdom so nearly bordering on her own, she begged that the difference between Mary and her subjects might be left entirely to her arbitration, and that no foreign succours might be invited or suffered to enter into Scotland.

The intention of Mary was to avail herself of the general good disposition of her subjects in her favour, and to have retired to the strong castle of Dunbarton, there to wait till she could be either restored to her throne in a parliamentary way, or be reinforced from England or France, so as to crush the opposition: she had even taken some steps towards bringing on a treaty with Murray, by means of secretary Maitland and Kirkaldy of Grainge; and had also employed Beaumont, the French ambassador, for that purpose: but Murray refusing to hearken to any terms that were to divest him of his ill-assumed power, every thing was prepared by both parties to decide matters by a battle. The regent could get together no more than four thousand men; but notwithstanding that his army was so inferior in number to that of the queen of Scots, he took the field against her; a battle was fought, on the thirteenth of May, at Langside, near Glasgow, which was intirely decisive in favour of the associated lords, and the queen's troops were entirely discomfited.

Mary was so dispirited with this event, which she looked upon as the destruction of her last reserve, that she lost her usual courage, and, with a few friends, betook herself to flight, not stopping till she arrived on the borders of England. Here she held a consultation about the course she ought to pursue, and which, in all probability, would determine her future happiness or misery. It was probably the late good offices done this princess by Elizabeth, in sending Throgmorton to solicit for her liberty, and the assurance given Bethune, which, with her own unwillingness to disoblige the queen of England by retiring elsewhere for succour, and the hopes of forming a strict friendship with her, determined Mary to take refuge in England, contrary (as the Scottish writers say) to the opinion of the wisest of her servants: but, however it was, the resolution seems to have been taken on a sudden, for, on the fifteenth of May, the second day only after the battle, the lord Herries wrote to Lowther, deputy-governor of Carlisle, to know whether the queen of Scots, his sovereign, might come safely to Carlisle, if she should be forced to seek refuge in England? But the next day, without waiting for an answer to this letter, she embarked herself, with that lord and a retinue of sixteen persons, and landed at Warkington, in Cumberland; from thence she was conducted to Cockermouth, and remained there till Lowther, assembling all the gentry of the country, attended her in an honourable manner to the castle of Carlisle.

Mary, the same day she landed on English ground, wrote a letter to Elizabeth, acquainting her with her misfortune in losing the battle of Langside, of having taken refuge in her territories, and desiring liberty to visit her good sister (as she called her), and soliciting that aid and assistance which her former professions of friendship gave her reason to expect. The lord Herries was the bearer of this letter, and was charged by his mistress to deliver into Elizabeth's own hand the very ring she had formerly sent Mary as a pledge of her sisterly affection and readiness to assist her on all occasions.

Had Elizabeth been left on the present occasion to follow the natural bent of her own mind, the manner in which she received this letter seemed to shew that she would willingly have complied with the request of the Scottish queen; but, from such a resolution, which indeed would have been more generous than prudent, she was soon diverted by the remonstrances of Cecil: however, she determined to proceed in a seemingly friendly, but really cautious, manner with the queen of Scots; and soon after the receipt of her letter, she dispatched the lord Scroop, warden of the Marches, and sir Francis Knolles, vice-chamberlain, to pay her compliments to Mary; but, as the event proved, to detain that princess by fair words, in order to gain time for consultation, and improve this misfortune of her sister queen to her own advantage. In the mean time Mary was treated according to her high birth and royalty; but, for security sake, she was, on the sixteenth of June, removed from Carlisle, and lodged at Bolton, a place of more security, under the custody of lord Scroop.

The privy-council being assembled, great debates ensued concerning the manner how to proceed with the fugitive queen: to detain her in England had many mischiefs attending it, to send her into France as many, to send her back into Scotland still more; at length, however, it was resolved by the majority to have her detained, as one taken by right of war, and not to be dismissed till she had made satisfaction for assuming the title and arms of England, and for the death of her husband Darnley, who was born a subject of the queen of England. Leicester, the moment that Mary's misfortunes commenced, became her most mortal enemy, and Cecil had been so from the beginning.

ginning. It is plain, from the foregoing account, that Mary had entered England without Elizabeth's leave, or any safe-conduct; hence the majority of the council were of opinion, that she thereby became a prisoner. It cannot be denied that a sovereign has power to seize a foreign prince who enters his dominions without a safe-conduct; but there are cases wherein strict right becomes the greatest injustice: such was that of Henry IV. with regard to the prince of Scotland, afterwards James IV. but in Mary's case the circumstances appeared still more favourable; she had been driven out of her own kingdom by her rebellious subjects, and forced to take the shelter nearest at hand; and as she not only was in peace with England, but had received good offices from Elizabeth, that opinion was as contrary to the law of nations, as to the dictates of humanity.

It is hard to say what Elizabeth's secret resolutions were, after hearing the debates of her council; they probably were not favourable to Mary, for that princess having wrote a second letter of supplication to Elizabeth, to be admitted to her presence, or to be permitted to depart the realm, the queen returned for answer, "that as she (Mary) stood charged by the voice of the public with being privy to the murder of the king her husband, or at least with not causing strict enquiry to be made after the murderers, and with keeping still about her person, or in her service, such as were accused of being accomplices, she could not see her till she had cleared herself of so heinous an accusation; and desired to know in what manner she intended to justify herself."

Mary, upon receiving this letter, perceived that Elizabeth expected she was to clear her honour in a formal legal way, and before commissioners. This filled her with surprize and apprehension, and she could not help expressing herself as highly offended (in a letter she wrote to Elizabeth) that her good sister would not hear the cause herself, but refer her, who was an absolute prince, to subjects, whose proceedings she had no reason to abide by. However, as she saw no other method of extricating herself from her present difficulties, she sent the lord Herries with another letter to Elizabeth, wherein she declared that she would willingly vindicate herself to her sister from all imputations, and would submit her cause to the cognizance of so good a friend.

Elizabeth, taking Mary at her word, offered to send two noblemen as her commissioners, to hear the mutual charges between her and her subjects. The noblemen named were the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Suffex, and to them, because of his knowlege in Scottish affairs, was added sir Ralph Sadler. Elizabeth then wrote to Murray, in a very peremptory manner, to desist from any farther hostilities against the queen of Scotland's party, and to appear in person to justify his conduct with regard to his sovereign, before the commissioners, who were to sit at York, on the fourth of October following.

Murray was somewhat surprized at a message which had so much the appearance of a command; but he had from the beginning been the abject slave of England, and as his domestic enemies were many and powerful, and Elizabeth was the only ally upon whom he could depend, he was determined to digest the affront, rather than forfeit the friendship of the queen by a refusal. Accordingly, in spite of the remonstrances of Maitland, and several of the most judicious of his party, who represented to him the the dishonour it would bring upon himself and country, to accuse his lawful native sovereign, in a judicial way, before foreigners, professed enemies of the Scottish nation, he, on the eighteenth of September, passed a commission under the great-seal, empowering himself, James, earl of Morton, Adam, bishop of Orkney, the lord Lindsey, and the abbot of Dumfermlin, to appear as delegates from the king of Scotland; to whom were added, as assistants, Maitland of Ledington, James M'Gill, a Scottish lawyer, Henry Balnaves, the laird of Lochleven, George Buchanan, the historian, and Mr. David Lindsey. The commissioners named by the queen of Scotland were the bishop of Ross, the lords Boyd, Livingston, and Herries, Cowan, abbot of Killwinning, sir John Gordon, of Lochinvar, and sir James Cockburn, of Stirling. But it is now proper to attend other affairs, which, having a great influence on Elizabeth's proceedings towards Mary, are necessary to be premised in this place.

After the convention patched up between the queen-mother of France and the protestants, the civil war, towards the end of the last year, broke out more furiously than ever in that kingdom. The court of France made dispositions for seizing the persons of the chiefs of the Huguenot party; but they were so much upon their guard that they made their escape to Rochelle, as the cardinal Chastillon did his, in the habit of a sailor, to England, where he managed the affairs of his party with Elizabeth. The prince of Condé having brought the queen of Navarre and her young son (afterwards the great Henry IV.) to declare themselves in favour of the Huguenots, soon after took the field, and the beginning of the year was spent in a variety of military operations, not much to the advantage of either party. The queen-mother in the mean time renewed her proposal, through Norris, the English resident at the court of France, for a marriage between Elizabeth and her son the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. then only seventeen years of age, and far from being a bigot to any religion. Elizabeth, for certain reasons, did not seem to discourage this motion; and the prince of Condé, fearing her steadiness, in September this year, dispatched Cavaignes, one of his friends, into England, with such instructions as were most likely to bring Elizabeth over to his party. Cavaignes exerted himself so effectually, that he entirely fixed Elizabeth in the resolution of powerfully assisting the protestant cause in France, and she agreed to pay the prince of Condé one hundred thousand crowns, and to lend him a good train of artillery, with ammunition. At the same time, perceiving that the protestants were debarred in France from the exercise of their religion, she offered a safe retreat to the Huguenots in England: upon which many of the principal manufacturers came over hither, who were kindly received, and permitted to settle at Norwich, Colchester, Sandwich, Maidstone, and Southampton, to the inexpressible improvement of the English woollen manufactures; for they were the first who brought into the nation the art of making bays, says, and other light stuffs, to which we were before strangers.

The

The conduct of the duke of Alva in the Netherlands was equally alarming to Elizabeth as was that of the court of France: he had now established the court of Inquisition, he had abolished all the privileges of the inhabitants and nobility of the Low Countries, he ruled them by Spanish laws, and omitted no occasion of persecuting with the utmost cruelty all whom he suspected of favouring the reformed religion, in order to extirpate protestantism in those provinces, and render Philip absolute there. The prince of Orange had raised an army in Germany, with which he marched to support the protestants; but the duke of Alva took such precautions, and the prince's army was so ill paid, that he was obliged to take shelter in France.

These proceedings convinced Elizabeth that she had nothing to expect from France and Spain but to be attacked also in her own dominions by their united forces, should she suffer the protestants to be destroyed, and put her upon a resolution to aid them as above, and to seize upon a great sum of money which was on board some vessels of Biscay, that had been driven by stress of weather, or otherwise, into some of the English ports, and which the cardinal de Chastillon offered to prove not to belong to the king of Spain, but to certain private merchants, who designed the money to be employed by the duke of Alva to the ruin of the protestant cause. The seizure of this treasure so exasperated the duke, that, though Elizabeth promised to repay it, with interest, as soon as it should be made appear, by good proofs, to belong to the king of Spain, he seized all the effects of the English within his power, and sent their persons to prison; which was returned on the part of Elizabeth by the like treatment of the Flemings in England. De Spesi, the Spanish ambassador, behaving on this occasion with great indecency, and even reflecting personally on the queen herself, this, joined with the treatment which Mr. Mann had received in Spain, exasperated Elizabeth so much that she ordered de Spesi to be confined to his own house, under a guard.

On the fourth of October, Elizabeth's commissioners and those of queen Mary had their first meeting, and both parties produced and exchanged copies of their powers. But the duke of Norfolk, who is said, about this time, to have conceived hopes of gaining the queen of Scots in marriage, so managed Murray and his assistants in private, that by his persuasions they refused to produce their allegations against their queen, till Elizabeth had given them a formal promise under her hand, to pass sentence as soon as the proofs should be produced, and to support the king of Scotland's party, in case the queen his mother was found guilty; alleging their apprehensions that Elizabeth had only in view to make the troubles of Scotland subservient to her own ends.

Mary, on her part, endeavoured to ward off their proceedings, by a message to queen Elizabeth, which the lord Herries delivered in these most pressing terms.

"Madam,

"The queen, my mistress, who is nothing subject to you, but by misfortune, does desire that you would consider, that it is a work of evil example, and most pernicious consequence, to give way that her rebellious subjects should be heard against her; who, not being able to destroy her by arms, do promise themselves to assassinate her even in your own breast, under colour of justice. Madam, consider the state of worldly affairs, and shew some compassion to the calamities of your poor suppliant. After the most horrid attempt upon the king, her husband, the murder of her servants, and the cruel design on her sacred person; after so many prisons and chains, the subjects are heard before their queen; the rebels against their lawful mistress; the guilty against the innocent; and the felons against their judge. Where are we? or what do we do? Though nature hath planted us in the extremities of all the earth, yet hath she not taken the sense of humanity from us. Consider, she is your own blood, your nearest kinswoman, one of the best of queens in the world, for whom you are preparing bloody scaffolds, and that in a place where she was promised, and expected, greatest favours. I want words to express so barbarous a deed. But I am ready to come to the effects, and justify the innocence of my queen, by witnesses unreprieveable, and by papers written and subscribed by the hands of the accusers. If this will not suffice, I offer myself, by your majesty's permission, to fight hand to hand, for the honour of my queen, against the most hardy and resolute of those who are her accusers. In this I do assure myself of your equity, and that you will not deny this favour unto her, who will acknowledge herself obliged to your bounty."

This pathetic remonstrance, however, produced very little effect upon Elizabeth or her counsellors, who had already planned out the track they meant to pursue. But Murray having now engaged in a correspondence with the duke of Norfolk, and being gained over by his arguments, Maitland, his secretary, the captive queen's friend, and privy to the resolution which had been formed of effecting a marriage between Norfolk and his mistress, to which Mary had shewn herself not at all averse, was more explicit, and opened the congress with a speech, directed to the regent and deputies of Scotland, telling them, "that whereas it appeared by the authority granted by the queen of England to her commissioners, that her whole design was to engage the Scots to throw a blemish on the reputation of their king's mother, they would therefore do well to consider carefully beforehand, what hazard they exposed themselves to, and how they would draw upon themselves the resentment of the queen, her relations, and friends, and the indignation of all Europe, should they impeach her of a crime which must stain her honour, and in so public a manner, before the English, the professed enemies of Scotland: what account would they be able to give their king, when he came of age, of a charge so bold and dishonourable to the king, to his mother, and to the whole nation? He therefore, for his part, thought it necessary to wave so scandalous an accusation; or, if they would proceed, it was requisite at least that the queen of England should expressly engage to assist them against such as should hereafter give them any disturbance upon this account."

This speech produced the desired effect; the regent and deputies acquiesced in Maitland's advice, and it is probable would never have departed from this resolution, had not Mary been weak enough to talk of the duke of Norfolk's friendship, and proceedings ceedings at York in her favour, which reaching the ears of Cecil, he caused the congress to be removed from York to Westminster, and from thence to Hampton-court, under a new commission, which opened a way to gain Murray over to Elizabeth's will, and in the end proved the ruin both of the duke and queen Mary.

This management succeeded to the wish of Elizabeth; Murray now thought that his best course was to link himself with Cecil more closely than ever, and wholly to throw himself upon Elizabeth's generosity: accordingly, on the twenty-sixth day of November, he first entered a protestation, containing his reasons for delaying to charge Mary home with her husband's death, and his unwillingness to do it then, were it not that he could not by any other means vindicate himself from her charge, which had made impressions upon Elizabeth, and her council, very much to his prejudice. This protestation was attended by an additional article of accusation against Mary, called by the Scots an Eik, and was as follows.

"The accusation against queen Mary, entitled, An Eik to the answer presented by us, James, earl of Murray, and regent of the realm of Scotland, and remanent commissioners, appointed for the king's majesty of Scotland, our sovereign lord, in his highness's behalf, and for ourselves and remanent states and people, his majesty's obedient and faithful subjects, to the letter presented to your grace the lords commissioners for the queen's majesty of England, at York, on behalf of the queen, mother to our said sovereign lord, presented the twenty-sixth of November, 1568.

"Whereas in our former, upon good respects mentioned in our protestation, we kept back the chiefest causes and grounds whereupon our actions and whole proceedings were founded, wherewithout seeing our adversaries will not submit themselves, but by their obstinate and earnest pressing we are compelled, for justifying of our cause, to manifest the naked truth; it is certain, and we boldly and constantly affirm, that as James, some time earl of Bothwell, was the chief executor of the horrible and unworthy murder, perpetrated in the person of unquile (deceased) king Henry, of good memory, father to our sovereign lord, and the queen's lawful husband, so was she of the foreknowledge, even to counsel, devise, persuade, and commander of the said murder to be done, maintainer and fortifier of the executors thereof, by impeding and stopping the inquisition and punishment due for the same, according to the laws of the realm; and consequently by marriage with the said James, some time earl of Bothwell, declared and unanswerably esteemed chief author of the above-named murder. Wherethrough they began to use and exercise an uncouth and cruel tyranny in the whole state of the commonwealth; and with the first (as will appear by their proceeding) intended to caule the innocent prince, now our sovereign lord, shortly to follow his father, and to transfer the crown from the right line to a bloody murderer and godless tyrant. In which respect the estates of the realm of Scotland, finding her unworthy to regiment (i. e. govern), discerned her demission of the crown, with the coronation of our sovereign lord, and establishing the regiment of that realm in the person of me, the earl of Murray, during his highness's minority, to be lawfully, sufficiently, and righteously done, as in the acts and laws made thereupon more largely is contained.

Patrick, lord Lindsey. Morton.

Ad. Orchard.

Dumfurline."

Copies of this eik being given to Mary's commissioners, some days passed before they made any answer, because of the delicacy of the subject: at last, on the first of December, they attended the commission; and both the bishop of Ross and the lord Herries, by their speeches, very properly took notice, that the matter had taken a new turn, and that the nature of the commissioners proceedings were altered; because, hitherto, Mary had been the accuser of Murray, but Murray was now of her: they therefore demanded, in the name of their mistress, that Murray should now in person clear himself before Elizabeth, her nobility, and all foreign ambassadors; and that in the mean while, the parties who had subscribed the eik, should be put under arrest till the matter should be tried; when it was promised to throw the whole blame of Mary's accusation on Murray and his colleagues.

Elizabeth found herself under inexpressible difficulties at this demand; but found means to shift it off by numberless evasions; which Mary's commissioners perceiving, and understanding Elizabeth's drift, they, on the sixth of December, entered a protest, that they would proceed no farther, unless Mary might be permitted to answer for herself: they also farther excepted against the English commissioners, and required that the French and Spanish ambassadors might be added to them: nothing of all which Elizabeth could consent to.

The necessary consequence of the queen of Scots revoking the powers of her commissioners, and refusing to give any answer to Murray's charge, seemed to be, that there could be no farther proceedings in the trial: but though this silence might be interpreted as a presumption against her, it did not fully answer the purpose of those English ministers (Cecil and Leicester in particular) who were the enemies of that princess; they still desired to have in their hands proofs of her guilt, and, in order to draw them with decency from the regent, a farce was now acted, which had been planned out by Elizabeth for that very purpose. Murray was called before the English commissioners, and sharply reproved, in the queen's name, for the atrocious imputations which he and his associates had the temerity to throw upon their sovereign; at the same time telling them, that though they had so far forgot the duty of allegiance to their prince, the queen would never forget the love of a good sister, and of a good neighbour and friend towards the queen of Scotland; and she therefore demanded to know what they could say in their own justification.

Murray, thus urged, proceeded to produce the proofs of his charge against the queen of Scotland, and, among the rest, some love-letters and sonnets of her's, to Bothwell, wrote all in her own hand, and two other papers, one wrote in her own hand, another signed by her and wrote by the earl of Huntley, each of which contained a promise of marriage with Bothwell. There were other papers likewise, which, if not forged to answer the villainous purpose purpose on foot, contained incontestible proofs of Mary's criminal correspondence with Bothwell, of her consent to her husband's murder, and of her concurrence in that rape which Bothwell pretended to commit upon her.

We shall not take upon us to enter into a discussion of the authenticity of these letters, a subject which has furnished immense volumes from the pens of the different advocates; we shall only remark in general, that they were said to have been intercepted during the siege of Edinburgh, by the earl of Morton, and that they all passed through that nobleman's hands, who was well known to be the least scrupulous of all Mary's enemies; and that it even appears, at the time they were produced, Mary's commissioners were not so much as present; and that the collation between them and other letters of her writing, to prove the hand to be the same, was made at a time when no friend of Mary's was present. Surely now there was a fair opportunity here for Elizabeth, and Mary's other enemies, to have justified themselves to all the world, by shewing her to be a monster, as they could easily have done, had the letters produced been demonstratively authentic!

This accusation produced another protest from Mary's commissioners, on the sixth of December, which should seem to be a full vindication of Mary as to the charge brought against her by some authors, as if she had declined to put in any answer to the regent's accusation, or to have the matter farther tried, from a consciousness of her own guilt, and an intention to stop all enquiry concerning the genuineness of the letters and papers produced against her. After recapitulating the many steps they had taken to have this matter brought to a full hearing, and Mary to be confronted by her accusers, which had been constantly denied them, even though they had offered to enter deeper into the matter than Murray himself had proposed, they go on thus:

"Because we could not obtain a direct answer to our petition and supplication (for the queen of Scots to be admitted to Elizabeth's presence) the desire thereof being so reasonable, we did signify to her majesty, like as we now presently do to your honours, conform to our commission and instruction, that we consent on no wise that any farther should be proceeded in this conference, nor yet our sovereign's disobedient and rebellious subjects be heard, to give in any pretended probation for proving of their said intended addition unto the time that the queen's highness, our sovereign, was present and had conform to the desire of our said supplication. And we also solemnly do protest, in case your lordships proceed in the contrary, that whatsoever has been, or shall be done hereafter, shall not prejudice any manner of way our mistress and sovereign's honour, person, crown, and state; and for our part dissolves and discharges this present conference, having special command thereto by our said sovereign, in case aforesaid. And also in respect that if her own presence was admitted (as all reason requires) her highness would not alennerly declare her innocence to the satisfaction of the queen's majesty, and all Christian princes, but also would make her rebellious subjects, for their heinous and ill deservings, unworthy to compeer before any Christian prince, to exhibit so contrived and invented allegations against their native sovereign, as hereafter to the world shall plainly be known. And desire, before any farther proceedings, this our present petition, protestation, and discharge, be inserted in this conference; and that we have the doublet thereof authentically subscribed for our warrant.

"Presented and given into the queen's majesty's commissioners of England, by the queen's highness commissioners of Scotland, at Westminster, the sixth day of December, in the year of God 1568, and subscribed with their hands.

Jo. Ross, Herries,
Boyd, Killwinning."

To say the truth, Mary's cause was plainly prejudged, since she was required to answer in a corner to a charge of the blackest nature, and upon points in which her judges had declared themselves to be against her; for, after her commissioners had protested against the conferences going on, unless she was admitted to a public audience in person, Cecil and her enemies refused to treat any longer with them as her commissioners, but as her servants. There was, however, great formality, and great shew of impartiality preserved in the proceedings of the other commissioners.

For Elizabeth, apprehensive that her conduct towards Mary might be liable to some misconstruction, she therefore resolved to acquaint the most eminent of her court with all these transactions, and to convince them of the equity of her proceedings. She convened the members of her privy-council; and, in order to add to the solemnity of the scene, as well as to shew her candour and impartiality, she joined with them the earls of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Shrewsbury, Worcester, Huntingdon, and Warwick.

The whole proceedings of the English commissioners were laid before them; the proofs adduced by Murray were examined: the authenticity of the love-letters and sonnets was ascertained by comparing the writing with that of several letters which Elizabeth had received from Mary: the refusal of the queen of Scots commissioners to make any reply was mentioned: and after considering all these circumstances, Elizabeth declared, that as she had, at first judged it improper to favour Mary with a personal interview, until she should have cleared herself from the crimes of which her enemies accused her, so, now that her guilt was proved by so many plausible evidences, and all answer denied, she must, for her part, adhere to the same resolution.

She then called in the queen of Scots commissioners, and after observing, that it would be more for the honour of their mistress to continue the conferences, than to demand the liberty of vindicating herself in person; she told them, that Mary might either transmit her answer by one of her own servants, or deliver it herself to some English nobleman, who should attend her for that purpose: but as to her resolution of giving no answer at all, she must consider it as the strongest presumption of her guilt; nor could they ever be her real friends who advised her to follow such an imprudent course. In a few days after, she wrote a letter to Mary herself, in which she insisted on the same topic.

The queen of Scots had no other method to elude these pressing instances, than still to require the liberty of visiting Elizabeth; a favour which she knew would never be granted: both because that expedient could be productive of no good effect, and because it would bring matters to extremity, which Elizabeth, above all things, wanted to avoid.

Mean while, in order to keep herself in countenance, Mary had recourse to another device. Even after the conference was entirely dissolved, she ordered her commissioners to accuse the earl of Murray and his colleagues of the murder of the king: but this impeachment, exhibited so late, occasioned merely by a complaint of Murray's, and supported by no kind of proof, could only be considered as an angry retaliation upon her enemy. She likewise required to have copies of the papers delivered by the regent; but as she still persevered in her resolution to make no reply, the demand was finally refused her.

The conference being now at an end, the regent was impatient to return into Scotland, where his enemies were endeavouring, in his absence, to raise some commotions. Elizabeth therefore dismissed him, after having gratified him with the sum of five thousand pounds, in order to defray the expence of this journey.

During the conference at York, the duke of Chatelerault arrived at London, in his way from France; and as the queen knew that he was strongly attached to Mary's party, and had some claim to the regency of Scotland, she detained him in England till after Murray's departure.

But notwithstanding these instances of favour, and some other assistance which she secretly afforded to Murray, she could not be persuaded to acknowledge the young king, or treat with Murray as regent of Scotland.

Murray having thus secured the friendship of Elizabeth, applied himself to re-establish a good understanding with Mary likewise. The Hamiltons and the earl of Huntley were in arms in Scotland, and had taken possession of Glasgow, with a body of seven thousand men, intending to march forward and to fight Murray as soon as he should arrive. Murray apprehending the consequences, before he set out sent sir Robert Melvill to Mary, to propose the marriage between her and the duke of Norfolk, and at the same time a cessation of all hostilities between the two parties in Scotland. Mary, though by this time fully acquainted with Norfolk's intentions, affected to be a stranger to the motion: she expressed herself to be ready to agree to any match that should be approved by her parliament, and to compromise matters with the rebels, but declined giving any definitive answer till she was set at liberty and restored; however, she condescended to send orders to the lords of her party to suspend all hostilities against Murray till her farther orders; and thus he obtained a safe re-admission into Scotland.

Mary now began to think her troubles were drawing to an end, but they were indeed only beginning. Elizabeth was exasperated to the highest degree by some letters which Mary had wrote to her friends in Scotland, which, being intercepted, were put into the hands of the queen of England; and being informed that the pope was endeavouring to raise a rebellion in England in favour of Mary, by means of one Ridolfi, a Florentine merchant; on the eighteenth of January, 1569, she ordered sir Francis Knolles to remove his prisoner (for so we must henceforth call the unfortunate Mary) to Tutbury castle, in Staffordshire, where she was put under the custody of George Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury. But it is now time to attend other affairs.

The difference which had lately arose between Elizabeth and Philip II. of Spain, brought on not only that king's resentment against the English merchants in Spain, and that of the duke of Alva in the Low Countries, but also put him upon several intrigues with her subjects, both in England and Ireland, in order to stir up a rebellion in both countries at a time; which being discovered to the queen by the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Ormond, to whom Philip had principally applied, the English, notwithstanding no war was proclaimed, fitted out a prodigious number of privateers, with which they fell upon all Spanish merchant ships that came in their way, and did Philip's subjects so much damage by sea, that Elizabeth found herself obliged to restrain their reprisals by proclamation, lest she should thereby be forced into a formal war, which she did not desire. The vigorous support which Elizabeth had given to the Huguenots in France, and the treaty which she had made with the prince of Condé, had so disobliterated that court, that it had ordered its subjects to interrupt the intercourse between England and Rochelle: this produced a kind of a piratical war between the two nations; but when Elizabeth found herself embroiled with Spain in the same manner, she ordered a proclamation to be issued, "for admitting Frenchmen to traffic in England as heretofore, notwithstanding the many great causes of offence she had with that court, which she had so greatly obliged, and whose king and ministers she hoped would amend."

While the commercial affairs of England were thus embroiled with France and Spain, they were not in a much better condition in Muscovy, through the avarice of the English merchants, who had injured the czar Basilowitz: but the queen speedily sent thither sir Thomas Randolph (the same who had been her minister in Scotland) to make up matters; and though he had no commission to treat of the favourite point which Basilowitz had in view, namely, a treaty offensive and defensive with England, yet he managed affairs so well, that he obtained divers privileges for the Russia company. Shortly after the czar sent Andreas Gregorewitz Saviena his ambassador to the court of England, who was magnificently received by Elizabeth. According to Camden, she gratified the czar, who, by his abominable cruelties, had rendered himself most hateful to his subjects, with a promise, if ever he should have occasion for it, of a safe retreat in England. This so pleased the tyrant, that he ever after took the English company and nation into his special protection.

This cautious behaviour in Elizabeth to avoid a war with Spain and France if possible, and to strengthen her interest by that alliance with Muscovy, was soon accounted for, by a plot she had discovered to deprive her of her most faithful and able counsellor, secretary Cecil. The duke of Alva had sent over d'Assonville, to reclaim the money that had been seized by Elizabeth from the Italian merchants; but d'Assonville receiving no satisfaction, returned to the duke his master, who thereupon oppressed all the English in his dominions nions in the most cruel manner. Cecil had been the chief adviser of that seizure, concerning the legality of which the council were greatly divided in their opinions, and a great handle was taken by Cecil's enemies to inveigh against him, as leading his mistress into wrong measures, both as to the breach with Spain and the enormous sums she had sent over to France to supply the Huguenots. The chief of those who set themselves against the secretary on this occasion were the duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Winchester, the earls of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Arundel, Pembroke, and Leicester, and sir Nicholas Throgmorton, who, having consulted privately together, it was agreed upon that they should order matters so as that Cecil should be sent to the Tower. But, to their great surprize, Elizabeth, who knew that Cecil always preferred her interest to every other view, and that the rest of her council were too frequently led to make the interest of their sovereign and country subservient to their own private intrigues, imposed such a profound silence on her secretary's accusers, as took from them all hopes of succeeding in a like enterprize for the future.

The proposal, however, of Norfolk's marriage with the queen of Scots was still very warmly pursued, and some talk was likewise held concerning a marriage between the young king of Scotland and the duke of Norfolk's daughter, who was about the same age. But Norfolk, before he would resolve on the matter, deliberated with the earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Westmoreland, Suffolk, Pembroke, and Southampton, whom he found all agree in advising him to it; and as the duke was extremely popular with men of all parties, he easily engaged the principal nobility and gentry in his scheme: the lord Lumley and sir Nicholas Throgmorton also embraced the proposal with great cordiality; and every thing being agreed upon, their next consultation was how to proceed in it with safety. Throgmorton advised the duke to open the affair to the earl of Leicester, who, though Elizabeth's declared favourite, and one who had formerly flattered himself with the honour of espousing Mary, yet relinquished all his pretensions, and seemed zealously to promote the interest of Norfolk, insomuch that when the bishop of Ross, by the duke's desire, made that nobleman a compliment that if his mistress's marrying with an English nobleman was necessary for the good of the two kingdoms, he (Leicester) might, if he pleased, be the man; Leicester answered, that he would have nothing to do with such a marriage; but he would be for the duke's espousal, if no other way could be found to be rid of so dangerous a rival, and provided Elizabeth was pleased with the match.

Some little time after the earl of Leicester himself mentioned the matter to the duke, and even wrote a letter to Mary, which was subscribed by several persons of the first rank, recommending Norfolk to her for a husband, and stipulating certain articles for the advantage of both kingdoms: these were, "that she should attempt nothing in consequence of her pretensions to the English crown, prejudicial to Elizabeth or her posterity; that she should agree to a league offensive and defensive between the two kingdoms; that she should confirm the present established religion in Scotland, and grant pardon to such of her subjects as had appeared in arms against her*." It may easily be supposed, that the queen of Scotland was not long in giving her consent to what seemed the ready road to liberty and recovery of royal dignity. But now the duke of Norfolk took a step, the most imprudent of any he had yet taken: he communicated the matter to the kings of France and Spain, who were warmly attached to Mary's interests, and who heartily approved of the projected marriage, a treaty concerning which he consulted foreign princes while he concealed it from his own sovereign, could not be deemed entirely innocent, nor was it possible that a confederacy so extensive and complicated could long escape the penetrating eye of Elizabeth.

But, to say the truth, Leicester, in the whole of this affair seems to have acted the same part as Murray did, that of a traiterous spy, and that he only seemed to join with the Norfolk party, in order to get at the bottom of their secrets and ruin them effectually with Elizabeth; for the rumour of this marriage becoming in a manner public, the duke feared it might have reached Elizabeth's ears, and make her resolve his ruin: he therefore repeatedly pressed Leicester to make her majesty privy to it out of hand, and, if possible, gain her consent, or at least know her disposition on that head. This Leicester promised to do, but put it off from time to time, under various pretexts. The duke then made it known to Cecil, who advised him to go and acquaint the queen with it himself. This counsel Leicester opposed, promising to open it to her majesty as she went in progress. At length, when the court was at Farnham, the duke standing by as the queen sat at dinner, she took occasion, in a tart manner, to bid him take heed what pillow he rested his head upon. Leicester, who attended the queen in her progress, pretended to be taken ill at Titchfield; and when the queen visited him in his apartment, he shewed great signs of fear and trouble, which she perceiving, asked him the reason. Then begging her pardon for having so long concealed from her a secret which he ought to have told her, he discovered all that had passed concerning the duke of Norfolk's marriage with the queen of Scots; whereupon she sent for the duke, and, after upbraiding him sharply for presuming to treat of such an affair without her knowledge, she commanded him, upon his allegiance, to desist. The duke made her a solemn promise of obedience, and even affected to speak contemptuously of the Scottish alliance.

Finding however, that the queen gave no credit to his asseverations, and that many of the nobility, and even Leicester himself, regarded him with an eye of coolness, he withdrew from court, without taking leave, and repaired to his house of Kenninghall, in Norfolk. He was so much beloved in that county, that he could have assembled a considerable army in his own defence; but he piqued himself upon his loyalty, and resolved to return again to court, and use his utmost endeavours to recover his sovereign's confidence; but he had proceeded no farther than St. Alban's, when he was met by Fitz Garret, lieutenant of the band of pensioners, who arrested him in the queen's name, and conducted him to Burnham, three miles distant from Windsor, where the court was now kept, where he underwent several examinations touching the marriage; his coffers were searched, his papers seized, and himself soon after sent to the Tower. Leicester also underwent an examination, but received the royal pardon. The earls of Pembroke, Arundel, and the lord Lumley, were confined to their houses; sir Nicholas Throgmorton and Robert Rodolfi, a Florentine merchant (and an emissary from the pope), were imprisoned; the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland made their submission to the earl of Suffex, warden of the Northern Marches. All these noblemen, as well as the bishop of Ross, agreed in declaring that the marriage had been proposed by the earl of Murray, and that neither the queen of Scotland nor they would have concluded the match without Elizabeth's consent. However, when the bishop of Ross applied to the queen for the enlargement of Mary, she, in a great rage, answered him, "that the best step his mistress could take would be to rest satisfied, unless she had a mind to see those on whom she most relied, shorter by the head."

While these things were transacting in England, the earl of Murray, on his return to Scotland, invited several of the nobility of that kingdom to a conference, on pretence of accommodating matters, and restoring the queen to her liberty; but as the duke of Chatelerauld, by Elizabeth's permission (who probably knew of the treachery intended against him); and the lord Herries, with the abbot of Killwinning, were repairing thither, in order to appear in Mary's behalf, the regent caused them to be way-laid, and conducted, under a strong guard, to Edinburgh, and, before any of the other lords could appear to be present at the proposed consultation, he committed them prisoners to the castle, and then proceeded by force of arms, to oppress every one whom he thought in the interest of his captive sovereign. It is not improbable, from the general tenor of Murray's conduct, but he could have been content that Mary should have been set at liberty, only that he was fearful her freedom might have brought on his own bondage; nay, Elizabeth perhaps would not have been unwilling to have had her restored to her kingdom, but that she doubted such an event might have been attended with consequences detrimental to her own interest and security. Thus, while they both regarded their own ends as the principal object, and her's only in a secondary light, she had the fortune to be pitied, but not the happiness to be relieved; and all she could do of herself, was to tie the knot of her bonds the faster: if she could have remained quiet, they would perhaps have loosened of themselves; but now the more she struggled, the more she was entangled.

The rigorous treatment of the duke of Norfolk, and the imprisonment of so many noble lords, filled the whole nation with terrors, and several suspicious assemblies began now to be held in the North, where Mary was the darling of the people. The earl of Suffex, lord-president there, had notice of this, and, alarmed at the proceedings, sent for the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, in order to question them on the subject; at the same time orders were sent to them from the queen to repair to court, and answer for their conduct. This unexpected summons reduced the two earls to take arms before they were fully prepared; and, without waiting for a supply of men and money, which it is certain they had actually solicited from, and which had been promised by, the duke of Alva.

The first hostile action happened on the sixteenth of October, when the earl of Northumberland, entering Durham, tore the Bible and Common Prayer Book in the public market-place, erected a crucifix in the cathedral, and caused mass to be openly said, no less than six thousand persons assisting at the celebration. He proposed likewise to seize York and Newcastle, but was prevented by the diligence of the earl of Suffex. The rebels, however, soon became very numerous, and detached a party of five hundred horse, to bring away the queen of Scotland from Tutbury: but she having been removed, before their arrival, to Coventry, that enterprize miscarried. They afterwards laid siege to Bernard's castle, which sir George Bowes, after holding out eleven days, was forced to surrender, for want of provisions; upon which the insurgents fortified Hartlepool.

Whilst part of their forces, which amounted to above fifteen thousand foot and two thousand horse, were employed in these operations, the rest, in different bands, over-ran all Yorkshire, while Suffex, the lord Hunfdon, and the governor of Berwick, were cooped up with five thousand men, a force far too weak to hazard an engagement. But the rebel-chiefs falling short of money, the only sinews of war, either civil or foreign, they could not furnish proper subsistence for their forces, which for that reason could not move for London, as was at first intended, nor keep in a body longer than the beginning of November. In these circumstances Westmoreland began to despond so visibly, that many of his men slunk away: the earl of Northumberland still kept up his resolution, and remained master of the field till the thirteenth of December, when the earl of Suffex, marching out of York with three thousand foot and two thousand horse, was joined by sir George Bowes, with a good body of both, raised in the palatinate of Durham. Upon this shew of resolution, and hearing that the earl of Warwick and the lord Clinton were advancing against them with eight thousand men, levied in the midland counties, the rebels fled to Hexham, and from thence, on Suffex's approach, into Cumberland, on the borders of Scotland, where they dispersed, the common men retiring to their own houses, and the leaders escaping into Scotland. Northumberland being found skulking in that country, was seized by Murray, and committed to the castle of Lochleven. Westmoreland took refuge among the clans of the Grahams and Kers, by whose assistance he made shift to get into Flanders, where he had a slender pension from the king of Spain, and there lived to an old age.

This rebellion was soon followed by another, still more rash and imprudent, raised by Leonard Dacres, second son to the lord Dacres of Gilleland. He was a party with the two earls in all their projects; but they breaking out into action sooner than he expected or thought prudent, he thought proper to temporize; and being then at court, and admitted to kiss the queen's hand, he tendered his service to go against them, and to that purpose was sent home: but, by a stretch of double disloyalty, he repaired to the rebels, and encouraged them, by all the arguments he could devise, to continue their insurrection; then, making use of the letters of credence he had received from the queen, he surprized the castle of Greystock (in Cumberland), and gathered together a body of three thousand men. But after the overthrow of the two earls, being encountered by the lord Hunfdon, at the head of the garrison of Berwick, after a sharp battle, in which Dacres behaved with a gallantry that would have done honour to any cause but that of rebellion, his army was put to flight: he himself fled into Scotland, from whence, soon after, he passed into the Low Countries, and, in great misery and poverty, died at Louvaine.

The unhappy people who had engaged in these criminal enterprizes were treated with great severity. Sixty-six petty constables were condemned to the gallows, and no less than eight hundred persons are said in the whole to have fallen by the hands of the common executioner: and the chiefs of the rebels, being convicted of high-treason, were proscribed, namely, Charles Neville, earl of Westmoreland; Thomas Piercy, earl of Northumberland; Anne, his countess; Edward Dacres, of Merton; John Neville, of Leveredge; John Swinburn; Thomas Markenfield; Egremond Radcliff, brother to the earl of Suffex; Christopher Neville; Richard Norton; Christopher Marmaduke; George Stafford, and forty other gentlemen of condition*.

It must be remarked, that both these rebellions declared for the releasement of Mary, queen of Scots, the settlement of the succession, and the restoring the popish faith and religion; and the conspiracy was looked upon by Mary's party so sure of success, that she sent a letter to the states of Scotland, desiring them to enquire into the validity of her marriage with Bothwell, who was still alive in Denmark, in order to have it annulled, and make room for her intended marriage with the duke of Norfolk: and Murray was assured, by a letter from sir Nicholas Throgmorton, that all the forces of England and Scotland were not able to prevent its success. It is surmised that Elizabeth herself was terrified at their first appearance in arms; and that, to take off the equity of the demand of her rebellious subjects in regard to the queen of Scots releasement, she wrote to the same states, demanding that they should either restore Mary to her throne, as formerly, or admit her to reign jointly with her son, or that she might live in Scotland with such honours as should not be prejudicial to the young king's authority. But after the danger was over, Elizabeth, in her discourse with foreign ambassadors, affected to laugh at the whole as a foolish trifling enterprize; and thought on nothing but how she might distress the queen and her friends more and more. Camden scruples not to say, that she entered into a private negociation with Murray, to deliver Mary into his hands, finding the detention of her in England so dangerous, that she would have been pleased, on any safe terms, to rid herself of a prisoner that gave her so much inquietude. But all these schemes were defeated by the death of the regent, who was murdered in revenge of a private injury, by a gentleman of the name of Hamilton.

While the rebellions were raging in England, the duke of Norfolk, who still remained in the Tower, underwent frequent examinations, to draw from him whether he had any concern with the conspirators; but either his constancy, or his innocence, baffled all attempts that way. The earl of Pembroke continued inconsolable at Elizabeth's displeasure; and his great age, his former services, and his penitence, won so far upon her, that she ordered the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Leicester, and Cecil, to send him a letter declaring that she took him again into favour, and was willing to accept of his services as lord high-steward: but he did not long enjoy this comfort, for he died some months after. As to the duke of Norfolk, the queen's resentment was so much appeased by his behaviour that she released him from the Tower, and, upon his engaging to relinquish all farther thoughts of the Scottish alliance, she allowed him to live in his own house under a slight guard.

France was this whole year distracted with the continuance of the civil war. On the thirteenth of March was fought the battle of Jarnac, wherein the prince of Condé was killed; d'Andelot, the admiral's brother, did not long survive him. Some time after, the duke of Deuxponts led an army into France to the assistance of the Huguenots; but died there in June, leaving the command of the army to count Mansfeldt, who joined the admiral. With this reinforcement the admiral laid siege to Poitiers, but was forced to raise it in September. In October the Huguenots lost the battle of Moncontour. This defeat obliged the admiral to send for a speedy aid from Elizabeth, who lent him money upon the queen of Navarre's jewels, which were sent to her in pawn: she also furnished a company of gentlemen volunteers, to be raised to serve in the army of the Huguenots. The campaign ended with the taking of St. Jean d'Angeli, which the king became master of before the end of October.

The duke of Alva still continued his oppressions in the Netherlands. The Inquisition, which he had set up, acted with the most bloody fury against the wretched protestants; and all who had the temerity to appeal to the king against the rigorous treatment they suffered, were punished without mercy: in short, these provinces were now considered by the Spaniards but as a conquered country, and every method taken to drive them to despair.

The death of the earl of Murray, regent of Scotland, which happened on the twenty-third of January, 1570, involved that kingdom in its former anarchy; for, immediately upon his assassination, a large body of Scots, under the command of Walter Scot, and Thomas Carr, or Ker, of Fernherst, entering England, ravaged the places where they came with greater cruelty than had been practised even in the most barbarous times between those two nations. This seems to have been done on purpose to provoke England to revenge these affronts on all the Scots without distinction, and thus to revive the old enmity between the two people, and unite all the Scots against the English; whilst the more zealous papists were to act their part in this kingdom: and, indeed, this intention is in a manner confirmed by an embassy to the duke of Alva from the Hamiltons, and the pope's bull which was soon after issued to stir up Elizabeth's subjects to rebellion, as will be hereafter shewn.

As Mary's party had resolved to bring the state into confusion by the regent's death, so they had address enough, under the specious pretence of conferring the regency on a person to be approved by both parties, to put off the election of a new regent till the great men on all sides should concur in such a choice: but as this was barely a feint to gain time to see how the court of England would behave under the late unprovoked ravages on their borders, Elizabeth and her council were too wise to give into the snare; on the contrary, the more they perceived the Hamiltonian scheme to be to unite the Scots in one interest, the more they judged it necessary to keep them divided, nothing being found more advantageous to Elizabeth's politics than to tie up her neighbours hands, by cutting them out a sufficiency of work at home, through the stirring up or encouraging intestine broils and confusion among them.

With this view Randolph, who had now returned from Muscovy and was made post-master-general, was dispatched to Scotland, to assure the king's party (as we must henceforward denominate those who headed the opposition against Mary, and had the young king in their hands), that she could not suppose them guilty of being concerned in the late unprecedented insult upon her subjects, nor was inclined to cast the blame on the whole nation; on the contrary, she offered her assistance to the young king to resettle the affairs of his kingdom, and to redress the great disorders that had been committed by Mary's friends upon the Borders; adding farther, that should her so friendly offers be rejected, she was ready to do herself justice by force of arms, which should attack, not the whole nation, but only take condign vengeance on such as had wantonly, and without the least provocation, insulted her crown and dignity.

This declaration, which was delivered by Randolph to an assembly of the states, on the tenth of April, discovered all the measures of Mary's friends, and all they could do was to take advantage of the excuse which the anarchy furnished the ministry with, namely, to put off their answer to the first of May, when the states were again to re-assemble. In the mean time both parties set all their political talents to work: Elizabeth prepared an army to give weight to her counsels, her ambassador artfully cherished the divisions of Scotland while he seemed to be labouring to promote its union; and the queen of Scotland's party employed the keenest writers they could engage to try what they could do, by publishing libels and the most provoking sarcasms upon Elizabeth and her council, to urge them to a general rupture.

Elizabeth's army being ready, and it being apparent that Mary's party, which grew daily stronger, waited only for promised succours from France and Spain, to enable them to carry their purposes against England into execution, she ordered it to march to Berwick, under the command of the earl of Suffex, to revenge her subjects, to support the king's party, and to influence the election of a regent that should be a friend to the interests of England. Accordingly the earl of Suffex, the lord Hunston, and the lord Scroop, warden of the Western Marches, entered Scotland on the eighteenth of April, and, in the space of a few weeks, razed, burned, and overthrew above three hundred towns and villages; but at the same time these generals declared against taking part in the quarrels of the two factions, though it visibly appeared by the whole of their conduct, that their orders were to oppress Mary's friends and countenance the king's party to the utmost of their power; and as the former were not in a condition to defend themselves, they could not hinder a resolution of the states, assembled in the beginning of July, in the king's name, by the earl of Morton, the chief of that faction, by which they chose the earl of Lenox their regent, upon the recommendation of Elizabeth; and he was accordingly invested with that high office on the twelfth of the same month.

But, notwithstanding this instance of partiality to Mary's enemies, Elizabeth still maintained her ambiguous conduct, and preserved the appearance of friendship with that princess: at the request of the bishop of Ross, and her other agents, as well as of some foreign ambassadors, she now procured a suspension of hostilities between the Scottish factions, and by that means checked the progress of the king's party, when they appeared likely to gain too considerable advantages over their opponents. By this variable conduct did the artful Elizabeth feed the flames of discord in Scotland, and rendered the whole country a scene of desolation and bloodshed. Throgmorton, who now remained under confinement in his house at Carshalton, scrupled not to load Cecil with all the blame of so perfidious a dealing, which, however reconcileable it may be to the policy of the sovereign or her ministers, is the disgrace of honour and humanity.

As a counter-scheme to these machinations of Elizabeth, several schemes were set on foot to procure the deliverance of the captive queen of Scots, who was now more closely confined than ever; and the instruments to carry on those schemes were appointed and supported by France, Spain, and the pope. Charles IX. sent Montluc, bishop of Valence, to London, to join with the Spanish ambassador in soliciting her enlargement of Elizabeth in a public manner, and at the same time to raise, if possible, a strong party to back them, in case of need: but when not all the instances of these ambassadors wrought any effect on Elizabeth, pope Pius V. tried to terrify her into a compliance, by fulminating forth a bull of excommunication against her, which was fastened, in the night-time, upon the gate of the bishop of London's palace, wherein he absolved all the queen's subjects from their oath of allegiance, or any other duty to her, and pronounced anathema against all who should continue to acknowledge or serve her as their sovereign. This bull was affixed by one John Felton, who, being seized, boldly owned the fact, for which he was arraigned, and hanged in Aldersgate-street, opposite the said palace. Upon this several insurrections presently began in different parts of the kingdom. John Throgmorton, brother to sir Nicholas, was detected of a design to take up arms, and executed for the same. It was also discovered that sir Thomas and sir Edward Stanley, two younger sons of the earl of Derby, by a daughter of the duke of Norfolk, had plotted to carry off the queen of Scotland, and set her at liberty; and as John Lesley, bishop of Ross, who acted as Mary's ambassador, was accused of being the chief promoter of these plots, it was thought proper to confine him prisoner in the bishop of London's palace.

The longer Mary continued in England, and the more closely she was confined, the more Elizabeth found her own dangers increase, both at home and abroad. She had been this summer upon a progress; on her return she feigned to listen more kindly than ever to the pressing remonstrances made in her favour by the ambassadors of foreign powers to release her captive sister; she even pretended that she desired nothing more earnestly than to find means to restore Mary to her royal dignity, provided it could be done without danger to England: and, the more easily to amuse and deceive that princess and her friends, she, in the beginning of October, dispatched secretary Cecil and sir Walter Mildmay, chancellor of the Exchequer, to Mary, who was then removed to Chatworth, in Derbyshire, to propose certain articles of agreement for her deliverance. The terms were somewhat rigorous, and such as the captive queen might expect from a jealous rival, whereby they bore a greater semblance of sincerity on the part of the English court.

"It was required that the treaty of Edinburgh should be ratified: that Mary should renounce her claim to the crown of England during the life of queen Elizabeth, and her heirs lawfully begotten: that she should not enter into any confederacy against England, nor permit foreign forces to land in Scotland, nor maintain correspondence with the English or Irish, but with the consent of Elizabeth: that she should deliver up the English fugitives who had taken refuge in Scotland; and repair the damage done to the English frontier: that she should punish the murderers of her husband and the earl of Murray, and send her son to be educated in England: that she should not marry an Englishman without the consent of Elizabeth, nor any other person except such as should be approved by the estates of Scotland: that her subjects should not cross the sea into Ireland, without permission from the queen of England: that this treaty should be signed by Mary and her delegates: that, for the ratification of the articles, six hostages, to be named by Elizabeth, should be sent into England: that Mary, by engaging in any attempt against the queen of England, should forfeit all title of succession to the crown: that Hume castle and Fast castle should remain three years in possession of the English; and some other fort, in Galloway or Cantyre, be delivered to Elizabeth, for preventing the Scots from infesting Ireland: and lastly, that the estates of Scotland should ratify these articles by act of parliament."

Queen Mary referred Cecil and Mildmay for an answer to the bishop of Ross, her ambassador, the bishop of Galloway, who was uncle to the earl of Huntley, and William, lord Levingston, who were delegates from her lieutenants in Scotland. These agreed to some of the articles, but refused to renounce the ancient league with France, because the queen would lose her dowry, and the Scottish nation forfeit the valuable privileges they enjoyed in that kingdom. "They promised that no foreign troops should be admitted into Scotland, except in case of a rebellion which could not be suppressed by the domestic forces of the nation: that the queen of Scotland should not maintain any correspondence with the subjects of England to the prejudice of Elizabeth, provided this last would enter into the same engagement with respect to the subjects of Mary: they said they could not deliver the prince to Elizabeth, because they were not masters of his person: that the demand with respect to the queen's marriage was altogether unreasonable, considering she was an independent princess: that the Scots should not molest Ireland, provided the Irish were prohibited from making descents on Scotland: that any hostages required, should be given, except the duke of Chatelerault, the earls of Huntley, Argyll, and Athol: that Mary should forfeit her title to the crown of England, according to the proposal on that subject, provided that queen Elizabeth should be restrained by the same penalty from attempting aught to the prejudice of the Scottish queen: but they absolutely insisted on Elizabeth's restoring Hume castle and Fast castle to the proprietor, and refused to deliver any fortresses, either in Galloway or Cantyre, into the hands of a foreigner." After these articles had been debated twenty days successively, the English commissioners returned, and made such a report to Elizabeth, that she declared herself perfectly well satisfied with the answers of the Scottish queen, and said, she did not doubt that the only difference remaining, would be removed at the arrival of the commissioners from the regent of Scotland, without whose consent the young prince could not be conveyed to England.

But it was not long before she altered her language, but without seeming to alter her sentiments; for she pretended, that before the treaty could be either ratified or executed, it was necessary to have the consent of the earl of Lenox and the nobility of the country; and it was agreed that the queen should require Lenox, the regent, to send up commissioners to treat of conditions, under her mediation. At the same time Elizabeth took care to support the spirits of the king's party, by informing them, through Cecil, that all the proposals she had done were so far from being irrevocably fixed, that they were to be canvassed anew in the conference, and that it should be her care effectually to provide for their future safety. Hereupon Lenox convened the Scottish parliament, and, laying before them the transactions in England, and the dispatches he had received from the queen, they proceeded to nominate commissioners for ending the treaty; these were the earl of Morton, the abbot of Dumfermling, who had been made secretary of state in the room of Maitland of Lethington, and sir James McGill, a famous civilian. In this situation were affairs between the courts of England and Scotland at the close of the year 1570.

In Ireland, Connor O'Brien, earl of Thomond, being disgusted with the government of Edward Fitton, president of Connaught, entered into a consultation with other malecontents, to raise a new rebellion; and they had taken their measures so well, that they were on the point of making themselves masters of the president's person, and of the whole province, when their plot was frustrated by an odd accident: the day before they were to have executed their project, Fitton, who knew nothing of their design, sent the earl word in a friendly manner, that the next day he, and a few friends with him, would come to be his guests. The earl, struck with conscious guilt, imagined that his machinations were all discovered, and that Fitton meant to make him his prisoner under the pretence of a visit, and thereupon, in a violent panic, took shipping and fled over to France, where he confessed the the whole plot to Norris, the queen's ambassador there, and, by his intercession and his own submission, and promises of future loyalty, he was afterwards pardoned and restored.

This year also produced a peace to the French Huguenots, which was concluded at St. Germain en Laye. This peace, though made by the queen-mother (Catherine de Medici) with a wicked view, bore a good appearance to the protestant cause, nor could the Huguenots have hoped for a better, in the most prosperous situation of their affairs: among other advantages, Rochelle was suffered to continue in their hands, by which they still retained their communication with England.

In the Low Countries, the duke of Alva continued his infamous cruelties: and being in want of money to pay his troops, imposed the most arbitrary taxes on the people. He not only required the hundredth penny, and the twentieth of all immoveable goods; he also demanded the tenth of all moveable goods on every sale: an absurd tyranny, which would not only have destroyed all arts and commerce, but even have restrained the common intercourse of life. The people refused compliance; the duke had recourse to his usual expedient of hanging. And thus matters came still nearer the last extremity between the Flemings and the Spaniards.

We enter now upon the year 1571, which began in Elizabeth's court with a commission to her faithful and most trusty servant and secretary, sir William Cecil (whom she now created baron of Burleigh), and to Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester; Radcliff, earl of Suffex; sir Nicholas Bacon, lord-keeper; Vere, earl of Oxford, lord-chamberlain; sir Walter Mildmay, and sir Francis Knolles, all privy-counsellors, to hear the reasons for and against the queen of Scots, alleged by the deputies from Scotland already mentioned, and those for queen Mary, who were the bishops of Ross and Galloway, with the lord Levingston*. The conference was opened at London, on the twentieth of February, but was spun out, in the same manner as the former, with fruitless enquiries and remonstrances, and at last broke up, on the eighteenth of April, without coming to any determination, Elizabeth's sole aim being to gain time, and to furnish herself with a plausible answer to the French king's unremitting solicitations in behalf of the captive queen, who, upon finding herself thus trifled with, and that the treaty of Chatworth was not likely to be ratified, lost all patience, and loaded Elizabeth and her council with the most bitter reproaches. This so nettled Elizabeth, that at first she ordered the bishop of Ross to leave London, with the other commissioners; but he pleaded the commands of his mistress for his remaining there: Elizabeth repeated her orders, and he his plea, till at last he drove her to the alternative, either to suffer him to remain in London, or to deny his privilege as an ambassador of an independent prince.

Upon the breaking up of the conferences in England, all Scotland became a scene of blood and confusion: the truce between the two factions was now expired, and the regent, Lenox, began hostilities with the surprize of the castle of Dunbarton, which was still kept for Mary by the lord Fleming, but in so careless a manner, that when it was attacked, the garrison had no time to save either their persons, their effects, or their papers. Amongst the prisoners was Hall, who had been deeply concerned in the late rebellions in the North of England; Verac, the French agent; and James Hamilton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, an inveterate enemy to all Englishmen. Hall was sent to England, and there executed; Verac was sent prisoner to St. Andrew's, but afterwards suffered to go to France; but the archbishop of St. Andrew's, being extremely obnoxious to the regent and his party, it was resolved to get rid of him at any rate; accordingly he was proceeded against as an accessory in Darnley's murder, on the evidence of a priest, who declared that he had revealed the same to him in confession; upon which the archbishop was condemned, and publicly executed on a gallows at Stirling.

Sir Nicholas Throgmorton during all the last year, had been kept in confinement, either in London or at his own house at Carlhalton; but perceiving that the earl of Leicester had abandoned his former party, in the matter of the duke of Norfolk's marriage with the queen of Scotland, both the duke and he threw themselves upon Cecil's friendship, who did them many services with Elizabeth: but Throgmorton, being soon after set at liberty, died suddenly at an entertainment in Leicester's house, and the public did not spare to load Leicester with the blame of having poisoned him, from an apprehension that he might make discoveries to his prejudice.

In the mean while Mary's party in England grew very alert, and more bold than ever, which gave a suspicion that some new plot was hatching against Elizabeth and her ministry, who being persuaded that nothing but a marriage could secure their queen from so many conspiracies, which were daily renewed, importuned her so much, that at last Elizabeth yielded for them to resume the negotiations for her marriage with the duke of Anjou; though, as it afterwards appeared, she never had any intention that the match should take place.

Soon after the peace of St. Germain en Laye was concluded, Elizabeth had recalled Norris from his embassy in France, to make room for sir Francis Walsingham, who was a creature of Cecil's (now lord Burleigh), and sent to reside in that court, to take care of Elizabeth's interests, and to countermine the many plots which the papists had formed against her crown. Walsingham was in all respects, as a statesman, a very extraordinary person: his sagacity in tracing all the windings of a conspiracy, is perhaps not to be paralleled; his intelligence being so admirable, that it gave him as it were a key to every cabinet in Europe. This man, therefore, was thought the most proper person to manage the affair of the projected marriage, and he had orders to talk at the court of France as if Elizabeth was sincerely resolved upon it, provided that court was equally well disposed. This brought on a negotiation, which took up great part of the summer, and was managed by Walsingham, on the part of Elizabeth, at the court of France; and here by the French ambassadors, Mauvassiere and la Motte Fernelon.

Towards the end of August each party was brought to state their respective demands: those of the court of France were, "that the duke of Anjou might be crowned king; secondly, that he might be joined in the administration of public affairs; and lastly, that he should have a toleration for his religion." The two first were points that had been already settled in the former negotiation between Elizabeth and the archduke Charles; and she readily agreed that the duke of Anjou should have the matrimonial crown, and be admitted to the joint-administration; but insisted "that the duke, if she thought proper to make him her consort, should promise to accompany her whenever she went to chapel, and not refuse to hear and learn the principles of the church of England; and that his domestics should use no rites and ceremonies repugnant to the church of God, and those only in a private place, and so as the people might not take occasion from thence to violate the established laws of the land*." After various conferences, in which the French court endeavoured to render Elizabeth more flexible on the point of religion, while she still persisted unalterably in her demand, this difference was made a pretext for breaking off the treaty, in which indeed both parties seem to have been alike insincere.

The queen-mother of France wanted to divert Elizabeth from a rumoured match between her and the young king of Navarre, and to create a false confidence in the chiefs of the Huguenots, whom she had devoted to destruction; while, on the other hand, Elizabeth's aim was to amuse the court of France with a negotiation, which would prevent their sending succours to Mary's friends in Scotland. After this treaty was laid aside, Francis, duke of Alençon, younger brother to Henry of Anjou, was proposed as an husband to the queen of England; but the same difficulties about religion recurred, Elizabeth objected to his youth, and declared she would not engage in any contract of marriage before she should have seen the person proposed to be her husband.

In the mean time a new parliament, after five years interval, was assembled at Westminster, on the second of April this year; and as the queen, by the rage of the pope against her, was become still more the head of the ruling party, it might be expected, both from this incident and her own prudent and vigorous conduct, that her authority over the two houses would be absolutely uncontrollable. It was so in fact; yet it is remarkable, that it prevailed not without some small opposition, and that too arising from the height of zeal for protestantism, amongst a new sect lately sprung up, called Puritans (of whose rise and principles we shall give an account in their proper place), and who had, in the former parliament, introduced several bills for a farther reformation in religion, but had not been able to carry any one of them. Religion was a point of which Elizabeth was extremely jealous; she pretended that, in quality of supreme head of the church, she was fully empowered, by her prerogative alone, to decide all questions which might arise with regard to discipline or worship; and she never would allow her parliaments so much as to take these points into consideration. The courtiers forgot not to insist upon this topic, when the Puritans resumed their motions for a farther reformation: this brought on several warm debates, in which many principles, very popular, noble, and generous, were advanced; but the open assertion of them was very new in England, and the queen was so highly offended with the speech of Strickland, one of the members, that she sent for him to the council, and prohibited him from thenceforth to appear in the house of commons. That act of power was too violent even for this submissive parliament to endure; and the queen, finding that the experiment which she had made was likely to excite a great commotion, sent, the next day, to Strickland her permission to give his attendance in the house; but, at the same time, the parliament was, by Elizabeth's orders, hurried to a close, on the twenty-ninth of May.

The following were the principal laws enacted this session: it was declared treason, during the life-time of the queen, to affirm, that she was not the lawful sovereign: that any other enjoyed a better title; that she was an heretic, schismatic, or infidel; or that the parliament has not power to settle and limit the succession of the crown: whoever should assert, in writing, or printing, that any person, except the natural issue of her body, is or ought to be the queen's heir or successor, was, for the first offence, to be imprisoned during a year, and to forfeit half their goods; for the second offence, they were to incur the penalty of a Præmunire. This law was directly levelled against the queen of Scots and her adherents; and plainly implied that Elizabeth never intended to name her successor.

It is observable, that the usual term of lawful issue, which the parliament thought indecent in speaking of the queen, as if she could be supposed to have any other, was changed into that of natural issue. But this alteration was a fund of much wit and humour during the time; and some people suspected a deeper design, as if Leicester intended, in case of the queen's death, to impose one of his own bastards on the public, as the offspring of her majesty.

It was also decreed, that whoever should publish bulls or other mandates of the pope, or should, by means of these, reconcile any man to the church of Rome, should themselves, as well as those who were so reconciled, be guilty of treason. Whoever imported any agnus dei, crucifix, or such other implement of superstition, was subject to the penalty of a Præmunire. It was likewise moved, that if, for the future, the queen of Scots should be concerned in any conspiracy, she should be proceeded against by law, as the wife of an English peer; but the queen hindered this bill from passing, being satisfied with letting her prisoner see to what she would be exposed, in case of such practices. The former laws against taking interest, which was called usury, were enforced by a new statute; and a supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths was granted to her majesty. We must now turn to other matters.

During the before-mentioned negotiation between Elizabeth and the court of France, the queen of Scotland, looking upon her own affairs as entirely ruined, should they unite, tried what assistance she could procure from the king of Spain, by the means of Rodolfi, the Florentine, whom she dispatched, with letters, to Philip and the pope; but first with copies of them in cypher, and a letter of credence to the duke of Norfolk, recommending him as a trusty person, and desiring he would give him full confidence. Rodolfi, who was the pope's private agent in England, prevailed upon the duke to undertake the queen of Scotland's defence, upon assurances of a powerful aid from the pope and the king of Spain, and the queen's repeated promises to make him her husband as soon as she should have recovered her liberty.

The duke of Norfolk was naturally cautious, and gave his ear rather than his assent to this plausible proposal; neither would he sign the letters of recommendation to foreign powers, which Rodolfi presented him in his own favour, and which Mary requested the duke to honour him with: however, he ordered Hickford, his secretary, who had the key to decypher the queen's letters to Rome, and Madrid, and to the duke of Alva, and then bid him throw them into the fire: but Hickford, whether he was already gained by the court, or thought to make his own fortune by betraying his master, hid all these papers under a matt in his bed chamber, which proved fatal to the duke and Mary also. These proceedings could not be long a secret in so prying a court as that of Elizabeth. Rodolfi, indeed, got safe abroad, but one Bayley, a servant to the queen of Scots, whom Rodolfi had sent to inform that princess of his negotiations, and had likewise entrusted with letters for her, the Spanish ambassador, the bishop of Ross, the duke of Norfolk, and the lord Lumley, was seized at Dover immediately upon his landing, and those letters were sent to the lord Cobham, governor of the Cinque Ports, who, being a friend to the duke of Norfolk, suffered the bishop of Ross to change the packet for other letters of no moment: but the privy-council were not to be so easily imposed upon; Walsingham had gotten notice of the whole affair in France, and was perpetually alarming Elizabeth and her ministry with the plots forming against them by Mary's party. Bayley was sent for to the council, and, being a simple young fellow, he betrayed as much upon his apprehension as made the government send him to be racked in the Tower, where he presently confessed all he had learned from Rodolfi; and that the original packet he had brought over, was in the bishop of Ross's possession.

The bishop had foreseen this, and, suspecting that his public character would not protect him, prudently secreted all his papers of any consequence; and, on the thirteenth of May, after undergoing a strict examination by a committee of the council, he was given into custody of the bishop of Ely; as Henry Howard, who had aspired to the archbishopric of York, was to the custody of the archbishop of Canterbury; and sir Thomas Stanley, sir Thomas Gerard, and one Rolston, to the Tower on suspicion. Hitherto nothing had appeared that could effectually hurt the duke of Norfolk; but another attempt, in which he was concerned, being diligently traced, produced a full discovery, which completed that nobleman's destiny.

Mary had given a large sum of money to the French ambassador, to be conveyed to her friends in Scotland. The ambassador, as afterwards appeared, with the duke of Norfolk's privity, gave the money to Bannister, one of the duke's gentlemen, who was to find some means to transmit it to Scotland; but a menial servant, who was not in the secret, suspecting from the weight and size of the box that it was full of gold, carried it, with a letter he was also charged with for Bannister, to lord Burleigh, who immediately caused Bannister and Hickford to be apprehended and brought before the council, where, being threatened with the torture, they immediately confessed the truth; and as Hickford, though enjoined to commit all the copies of Mary's decyphered letters to the flames, had disposed of them as above related, he now thought proper to put all the cyphers and papers into the hands of the government, together with other letters from Mary to the bishop of Ross, containing her resolution to retire to Spain rather than France; her intention to amuse don John of Austria, natural son to the late emperor Charles V. with overtures of marriage; her settled resolution to reserve herself entirely for the duke of Norfolk; many injurious reflections on queen Elizabeth; and a request that he would dispatch her messenger, Rodolfi, with instructions to Rome.

Norfolk himself, who knew nothing of the discoveries made by his servants, was cited before the council, and, though exhorted to merit the mercy of his sovereign by a full confession, he still continued to deny every article of the charge preferred against him; upon which the queen ordered him to be sent to the Tower, on the seventh of September. The bishop of Ross was already in private custody, and every method was used to make him disclose the share he had in the conspiracy: he at first alleged, that, as an ambassador, his person was sacred; but he was told, that as his mistress was no longer a sovereign, he could not be considered as a public minister, and that even if that character was allowed, it did not warrant him in forming conspiracies against the sovereign in whose court he resided. As he still refused to answer any interrogatories, he was informed of the discovery made by Norfolk's servants, and then he admitted the truth of some of the points alleged against him, by which the duke of Norfolk's guilt was more plainly proved. On the nineteenth of October the bishop was committed to the Tower, "for attempting to disturb the peace of the kingdom."

While these matters were in agitation, Scotland was more and more rent by intestine broils: each faction summoned a separate assembly of the states, and met in two different places, mutually condemning and annulling the acts of each other; but, by the policy and assistance of Kirkaldy, laird of Grainge, governor of the castle of Edinburgh for the young king, but in reality Mary's friend, her party got possession of the city and the said castle; and, about the latter end of August, met with such success that they seized the persons of the earls of Morton and Lenox the regent, and must have carried off all the lords of the king's party, assembled at Stirling, had not the earl of Marr sallied out of the castle, and with his garrison compelled the queen's soldiers to retire, who, for the sake of plunder, had dispersed themselves carelessly in parties about the town. In the disorder the earl of Morton happily escaped, but the regent was carried off, and murdered in cold blood on the road, by one captain Calder, on the eighth of September; upon which the lords of the king's party chose John Erskine, earl of Marr, to succeed him in the regency, to the great mortification of the earl of Morton, who aspired to that dignity, and was zealously zealously supported by the English ambassador, who knew him to be a pensioner to his court.

The imprisonment of the duke of Norfolk, and that of so many noblemen and gentlemen who had been committed with him*, made so much noise in England, that the court thought it was proper to satisfy the public concerning the same. Accordingly, by Elizabeth's orders, the recorder of London laid before the lord-mayor and court of aldermen a full account of all that the duke had been charged with and confessed; and they again were ordered to communicate the same to the several companies and wards of the city. This step had great effect upon the populace, whose vast regard for the duke of Norfolk was formidable to Elizabeth.

We have little to add to the account of public affairs in England this year, only that the English having, since the year 1552, carried on a gainful trade for gold with the natives of the coast of Africa, wherein they had often been disturbed by the Portuguese, who laid claim to an exclusive trade to that country, as the first discoverers of it, Elizabeth made a treaty with the court of Portugal this year, by which all differences were adjusted between the two nations on that score. On the fifth of October this year, the famous sea-fight of Lepanto was gained by don John of Austria against the Turks; and though the news was first communicated to Elizabeth by her mortal enemy, the duke of Alva, yet, to shew her great regard for the general interests of Christianity, she gave orders for public rejoicings to be made all over England for the victory†. In the beginning of this same year 1571, viz. on the twenty-third of January, queen Elizabeth went in great state into the city, to dine with sir Thomas Gresham, an eminent merchant, and visited the magnificent structure he had lately erected, upon the model of the Bourse at Antwerp, for the use and convenience of the merchants to meet and do business in, when she gave it, with great solemnity, and under the sound of trumpets, beating of drums, &c. the name of the ROYAL EXCHANGE. This year also died, in an advanced age, William Parr, marquis of Northampton.

Burleigh and his party were now very earnest to bring the duke of Norfolk to a trial, and were very importunate with the bishop of Ross to give full evidence against him, which that prelate, with a great and noble resolution, refused, insisting on the promise that had been made him by the council, at a former examination, that nothing of what he said should be made use of to accuse any man; and declaring that, as he had never conferred with the duke himself on any of the matters in question, but only with his servants, what he could say would not affect him; and he must at the same time publicly profess before the court, that he never heard him, in all his life speak one word at any time that was against his duty to his queen and country. This made them think it improper to produce him in person, though Basham, the queen's serjeant at law, in breach of the solemn promises of the council, made use of his confession at the duke's trial, who, on the sixteenth of January, 1572, was brought, with the other lords and gentlemen in confinement, by water to Westminster-hall, the streets being lined with soldiers, and the guards doubled at Whitehall, and arraigned before a jury of twenty-six peers, George Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, sitting as lord high-steward. The articles upon which he was accused, were as follow:

"That, in the eleventh year of queen Elizabeth, and afterwards, he had entered into a treasonable conspiracy about deposing her from the throne, and taking away her life, and invading the kingdom, by raising war, and bringing in a foreign power.

"That though he knew for certain, that Mary, late queen of Scots, had usurped the crown of England, with the title and arms thereof; yet he had treated about a marriage with her (without acquainting the queen) and had lent her a great sum † Pope Pius V. out of his great zeal for Christianity, had endeavoured to stir up several of the princes of Christendom against the Turks, who were by this time become very formidable; but there was only Philip II. who took part with the pope in his design. He alone, of all the Catholic princes, was sufficiently rich to answer the prodigious expence of the necessary armament; and was alone able, by the good regulations of his government, to carry this project into speedy execution. He was principally interested in this, through the necessity there was of securing his Italian dominions, and the places he possessed on the coast of Barbary, from the insults of the Ottoman fleet; accordingly he entered into an alliance with the Venetians, though always their secret enemy in Italy, against the Turks, whom he feared still more.

Never was so large an armament fitted out with so much expedition. Two hundred gallies, six large galleasses, twenty-five ships of war, with fifty sail of transports, were all ready in the ports of Sicily by the month of September, which was less than five months after the taking of Cyprus. The one half of this armament was furnished by Philip; the Venetians were at the charge of two thirds of the other half, and the rest was supplied by the pope. The command of the fleet was given to the famous don John of Austria, natural son to the emperor Charles V. and Marc Antonio Colonna commanded under him, in the pope's name.

Historians tell us, that there were no less than fifty thousand fighting men on board this fleet. Nothing but exaggerations are to be found in the accounts of battles. A fleet of two hundred and six gallies, and twenty-five other ships, could not contain at most more than twenty-thousand fighting men. The Turkish fleet alone was stronger than the three Christian squadrons all together: it was composed of about two hundred and fifty gallies. The two fleets met in the gulph of Lepanto, the ancient Naupactus, not far from Corinth. Never since the famous battle of Actium, had so numerous a fleet been seen in the Grecian seas, nor so memorable an engagement. The Turkish gallies were worked by Christian slaves, and the Christian gallies by Turks, who were, against their wills, obliged to serve against their country.

The two fleets engaged with all the ancient and modern weapons of offence; such as arrows, long javelins, grenades, grappling-irons, cannon, muskets, spears and sabres. Most of the gallies were grappled together, and the soldiers fought hand to hand on their decks, as on a field of battle. At length the Christians gained the victory, which was the more glorious, as being the first of its kind.

Don John of Austria, and the Venetian admiral Veniero, attacked the ship which carried the Turkish admiral Ali, who was taken with his galley, and his head struck off, and hoisted upon his own flag-staff. This was abusing the rights of war; but those who had slayed Bragadino in Famagosta, did not deserve better treatment. The Turks lost above one hundred and fifty ships in this engagement. It is difficult to tell the number of slain: some make them amount to fifteen thousand; about five thousand Christian captives were set at liberty. Venice celebrated this victory with such feasts as she alone was capable of giving at that time. Constantinople was in the utmost consternation; and pope Pius V. when he received the news of this signal victory, the honour of which was ascribed to the generalissimo don John, but in which the Venetians had the greatest share, cried out in a transport of joy: "There was a man sent from God, and his name was John!" words that were afterwards applied to John Sobieski, king of Poland, when he delivered Vienna. Volt. Gen. Hist. vol. v. p. 259—261.

of money, contrary to what he had promised under his hand.

“That though he was sure that the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, Markenfield, and others, had raised a rebellion against the queen, and were driven into Scotland, yet he had supplied them with money.

“That, in the thirteenth year of the queen’s reign, he had, by his letters, craved auxiliary forces of pope Pius V. the queen’s professed enemy, of the Spaniard, and the duke of Alva, to set the queen of Scots at liberty, and restore the popish religion in England.

The duke desired that he might be allowed counsel to plead for him, and that he might be informed which were articles of treason, and which not; but both his requests were refused. It was on the two suppositions, that Mary, and the lords of her party, were enemies to Elizabeth and her crown, that the charge of high-treason was chiefly founded against the duke, who was by his peers found guilty, to the astonishment of every unprejudiced person, the infinite concern of all good men, and the grief of the people in general; for no public evidence that could convict him of high-treason, was produced against him, nor were the witnesses brought into court, as the statute of 5 & 6 Edw. VI. required*: nor had he the smallest indulgence, or opportunity to prepare his defence. It is true, while in the Tower, he confessed so much, that it was thought he came within the exception of the above-mentioned statute, which, in case of voluntary confession, dispenses with the producing witnesses in court; but still the proceeding against him was inhuman and ungenerous. The reader may see a full account of the above in Camden, and in the Collection of State Trials.

The condemnation of a nobleman so high in rank, and so dear to the people, revived the compassion of the public for his fate; and several plots were laid for his deliverance, which coming to the knowledge of Elizabeth, she thought no remedy was so effectual against the danger of the times as a parliament, which was suddenly summoned to meet at Westminster, on the eighth of May. In the mean time the Spanish ambassador was ordered to quit the kingdom, for having entered into a plot with one Mather and Barney, two desperate ruffians, to kill both the queen and secretary Burleigh, and set the duke of Norfolk at liberty. Mather confessed, that he had been offered money by the ambassador and his secretary, to kill Burleigh; and Hall, another assassin in the plot, swore the same; upon which they were all three executed.

The disgraceful dismissal of the Spanish ambassador was so highly resented by Philip, that he ordered all the English subjects in Spain to be imprisoned, and their effects confiscated, and prohibited all commerce between the two nations. His resentment was very little regarded by Elizabeth, who, in the month of April, concluded a defensive league, at Blois, with Charles IX. of France, by which both parties agreed to assist each other against all invasion: they agreed that no innovation should be made in the kingdom of Scotland; but that they should jointly defend it from all foreigners; and it was stipulated, that in case any English ships should be taken or seized in the Low Countries, or in Spain, the French king should solicit restitution at the court of Madrid, or, that intercession failing, make reprisals upon the Spanish and Flemish subjects in his dominions; Elizabeth engaging to act in the same manner in his behalf†. The lord high-admiral Clinton, now created earl of Lincoln, was sent, with a magnificent train, to Paris, to see this treaty ratified by Charles; and the marshal de Montmorency arriving in England, to procure Elizabeth’s ratification, was invested with the order of the Garter. Immediately after this event the post of lord-keeper of the great-seal, vacant by the death of the old marquis of Winchester, was conferred upon lord Burleigh; the privy-seal was given to the lord Effingham; the earl of Suffex was appointed lord-chamberlain of the household; and secretary Smith made chancellor of the order of the Garter. About the same time (namely, the fourth of April) the queen favoured Walter d’Euvreux, or Devereux, with the title of earl of Essex, he being a descendant of the noble family of Bourchier, formerly earls of Essex, by the grand-mother’s side.

The parliament meeting in May, according to its summons, the commons addressed the queen that the duke of Norfolk might be put to death without farther delay, alleging this step was necessary for her own preservation and the peace of the kingdom. Elizabeth had hitherto, from a tenderness which she well knew how to affect, delayed to order the duke’s execution; but now pretending that she could no longer resist the importunities of her people, she signed the fatal warrant, and the duke was brought to execution on Tower-hill, on the second of June. His behaviour was, as it had been all along, calm and decent; he bewailed his having broken his faith with Elizabeth, by renewing his intrigues with Mary; but to the last denied his having consented to deprive Elizabeth of her crown, to invade the kingdom, or to destroy the city of London; and openly declaring that he died in the protestant faith of the church of England, and refusing to have his eyes blinded, as being, he said, fearless of death, he received the stroke that finished his life.

Thus fell Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk, the first nobleman in England. He was grand-son to Thomas Howard, second duke of Norfolk, and lord high-treasurer under Henry VIII. and son to Henry, earl of Surry, who was beheaded by that prince, in the beginning of the year 1547. This Thomas was born in 1536, and succeeded his grand-father in his title: queen Elizabeth honoured him with the order of the Garter, soon after her accession to the throne, and advanced him to the post of lieutenant-general of her forces North of the Humber. We have already shewn, in the course of this reign, how he fell under disgrace with his sovereign, on account of his proposed marriage with the queen of Scots, and that he had promised, under his hand, never more to concern himself in that affair without the queen’s approbation; notwithstanding which, and the danger that attended the breach of his engagements with a princess of Elizabeth's jealous and arbitrary temper, he again countenanced the proposal, which ended in his ruin. All of his family had firmly adhered to the catholic religion except this duke, who embraced protestantism in the beginning of Elizabeth's reign; and as he declared he died in the reformed religion, charity forbids us to dispute the truth of his dying assertion. He had been thrice married: first to Mary, daughter to Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel, by whom he had one son, named Philip; secondly, to Margaret, daughter to Thomas, lord Arundel, by whom he had two sons and two daughters; and lastly, to Elizabeth, daughter to sir Francis Leybourn, knight, by whom he had no issue.

Some few days after the duke's execution, queen Elizabeth sent William, lord Delawar, sir Ralph Sadler, Dr. Wilson, and Thomas Bromley, esq. to the queen of Scots, now overwhelmed with mourning, to expostulate with her by way of accusation, for that she had usurped the title and arms of the crown of England, and had not renounced the same, as was agreed upon in the treaty of Edinburgh: that, for the full possessing herself thereof, she had treated of a marriage with the duke of Norfolk, without acquainting the queen therewith; for the consummation whereof, and the freeing the duke out of the Tower by force of arms, she had used all methods possible by her: that she had raised a rebellion in the North, relieved notorious rebels in Scotland and Flanders, petitioned for a foreign aid from the Spaniard and others, by Rodolfi, an Italian, in order to invade England; and conspired with certain of the English, who should free her out of prison, and declare her queen of England: that she had received letters from the pope, wherein he promised to cherish her as a hen doth her chickens, and esteem them true sons of the church who should stand for her: lastly, that she had procured the pope's bull against the queen, and permitted her party in foreign parts to style her publicly queen of England. To all which Mary answered in general terms, insisting upon her being born of the blood-royal of England; and desiring that, if there were any malpractices laid to her charge, she might be allowed to give in her personal answer at the next session of the English parliament*. However, as there was no design at present to bring her to a trial, the affair rested there; only Elizabeth thought convenient to confine her good sister more closely, and to reduce the number of her domestics.

All this time Scotland was distressed with a more cruel civil war than ever, and for two months no quarter was given on either side. At last the two courts of France and England ordered their ministers, le Croc and Randolph, to mediate a cessation of arms, which they effected, from the first of August to the first of October. The earl of Morton was generally looked upon as the author of those violences, and it was owing to him, that, contrary to the general sense of the Scots, the earl of Northumberland was now delivered up to the lord Hunsdon, and by him conveyed to York, where he was beheaded. The earl of Marr, the new regent of Scotland, though a wise and virtuous man, found himself too weak to withstand Morton, even after he perceived that he was the tool of the English, and that nothing was done but by his direction and advice. Killigrew, who was sent to succeed Randolph in Scotland, confessed privately to sir James Melvill, that the English court depended upon Morton only, as its friend in Scotland; and that, unless Mary's party could bring him over, they were to expect no favour from England. Ledington had been sensible of this some time, and sir James Melvill dealt so earnestly with the regent, that a coalition between him and Mary's friends in the castle was actually formed, and upon the point of being declared, when the regent, after dining at Morton's house, was seized with a sudden illness which carried him off†.

Notwithstanding the great solemnity and protestations of friendship and sincerity on both sides, with which the treaty of Blois had been sworn to and ratified by Elizabeth and Charles IX. of France, the remainder of that monarch's life was constantly employed in some action that proved his intentions to be never to perform any one of the articles, any farther than they, or any of them, might serve to cover some base and dishonourable design; his chief drift being to tie Elizabeth's hands, and to lull the Huguenots in his kingdom into a careless security, till he could effect his bloody purpose of totally exterminating their sect, of which the massacre of several thousands of them, in cold blood, on St. Bartholomew's day this year, under the royal inspection at Paris, and openly approved of by the pope, was a melancholy earnest‡. And at the very time he shewed the greatest desire to live in a good † Melvill's Memoirs, p. 116, 117.

‡ As the particulars of this bloody massacre are not properly introducible into the body of our history, and yet may not be unacceptable to the reader, we have reserved the relation of them for this note.

This inhuman butchery, which was devised by the order, and under the immediate inspection, of Charles IX. and the queen-mother, Catherine de Medicis, evince them to be two monsters of perfidy and dissimulation. This dreadful day had been meditated and planned for above two years. It is hard to say, how a woman like Catherine de Medicis, brought up in the midst of pleasures, and to whom the Huguenot party had given the least umbrage of any, could have been capable of forming so barbarous a resolution. It is still more surprizing in a young king, not quite twenty years of age. This plot was laid with as deep dissimulation as the action itself was horrible.

The queen of Navarre was decoyed to Paris by a proposal of marriage between her son, who was afterwards Henry IV. and the princess Margaret, sister to Charles IX. the reigning king. The same pretence was used for alluring thither Henry, then prince of Bearne, and his uncle the prince of Condé. The admiral Coligni was invited by Charles, with a promise of declaring him general in a war against Spain in the Low Countries, and Coligni was accompanied by other chiefs of the Huguenots, depending upon the peace which had been lately ratified. The queen of Navarre died suddenly, not without suspicion of poison. The admiral going home to his own lodgings, about eleven in the forenoon, and reading a petition which had been presented to him, was wounded by a shot from a window, fired by one Maurevel, hired for that purpose. The king visiting him in the afternoon, expressed the utmost concern for his disaster, and assured him he would take ample vengeance of the assassin and his abettors. This perfidious prince had, with his mother and council, already projected the scheme, which was now put in execution on the eve of St. Bartholomew. The duke of Guise, who was at the head of this shocking enterprize, communicated the king's intention to the president Charron, intendant of Paris, who ordered the captains of the different wards to arm the burghers privately: that at the alarm, which would be rung on the bell of the palace-clock, the citizens should place lights in their windows, then break into the houses of the Huguenots, and put them all to the sword, without distinction. About midnight the duke of Guise, accompanied by the duke d'Aumale, the grand-prior of good understanding with Elizabeth, he was taking private measures to cause her disturbances both in England and Scotland, of which her watchful and faithful ambassador, Walsingham, gave her sufficient notice; yet, though Elizabeth could not longer depend upon such an ally, having a mind to see a little farther into the designs of her enemies, she kept an outward appearance of friendship with Charles, and even carried her political dissimulation so far as to stand god-mother to his newborn daughter, and to countenance a renewed proposal of marriage with his brother, the duke of Alençon, to the great surprize and terror of the Huguenots, who dreaded the most fatal effects from the growing union betwixt England and France.

But though Elizabeth so cautiously avoided the coming to extremities with Charles, whose union with the courts of Spain and Rome for the extermination of the protestants filled her with very disagreeable apprehensions, she gave all the assistance in her power to such of that sect as lived near the frontiers, and, immediately on the first news of the massacre of their brethren, fled into England; and when the French ambassador presumed to make a proposal from his master to have them delivered up as rebellious fugitives, Elizabeth plainly told him, that humanity would not suffer her to shut the door against so many wretches, who were driven by the barbarity of their enemies to seek refuge in her country.

Mean while she prepared herself for that attack which seemed to threaten her from the combined power and violence of the Romanists, as she, not without reason, looked upon the late massacre as the overt-act of the league of Bayonne, which had been formed for the extinction of the protestant religion. She therefore fortified Portsmouth, put her fleet in order, exercised her militia, cultivated popularity with her subjects, not only by restoring several sums of money she had borrowed of them for her own use, but also by freeing England at this time of the debts which her father and brother had contracted with foreign courts, and were increased by yearly interest: she also caused the obligations the city of London had given for those sums to be remitted, to the great joy of the citizens. But we are now to attend the concerns of the Netherlands.

The same principles which had engaged Elizabeth to support the Huguenots in France, would have led her to assist the distressed protestants in the Low Countries, but the mighty power of Philip, the tranquility of all his other dominions, and the great force which he maintained in these mutinous provinces, kept her in awe, and obliged her, notwithstanding all temptations and provocations, to preserve some terms of amity with that monarch; and Philip having remonstrated to her, by a new ambassador, that many of the Flemish exiles, who infested the seas and despoiled his master's subjects, were harboured and entertained in England, contrary to the leagues subsisting between the two courts, Elizabeth thought proper to issue a proclamation, that all the Flemish, suspected of rebellion, should forthwith depart the realm: a proclamation which, in its effect, was so far from answering the views of the Spaniards, that it proved extremely prejudicial to their interests. These desperate exiles, finding no longer any possibility of subsistence, were forced to undertake the most perilous attempts. William Vandermark, lord of Luney, a Netherlander of distinction, with a great number of his countrymen, leaving England in the beginning of April, surprized the Brill* first, and then Flushing; and, before the end of this year, almost the whole provinces of Holland and Zealand had revolted from the Spaniards, and openly declared against the tyranny of the duke of Alva, whom they, by their late successful efforts, excluded from the sea. This neglect of the sea-coasts of the Low Countries was accounted an irreparable oversight in the duke of Alva, who was, in other respects, a great general; and was the first means of enabling the protestants to hold out so long as they did against all the power of Philip; it likewise encouraged Elizabeth, who had now a strong fleet at sea, by which a safe communication could be kept up with the Netherlands, to permit her subjects to go over to serve in Flanders, as in a school of war, either under the prince of Orange†, or the duke of Alva, as their affections should direct them. Some of the popish affected went to the Spaniards, of France, a number of officers, and three hundred choice soldiers, marched to the admiral's hotel, broke open the gates, and entered the house. A colonel and two other desperadoes going up stairs to the admiral's apartment, butchered him without question, and threw his body out of the window. All his domestics met with the same fate, while the trained-bands acted the same tragedy in the Louvre, as well as within the city. Two thousand persons were massacred that night, and a great number perished next day. At the same time the Huguenots were sacrificed in like manner by orders from court, at Meaux, Orleans, Troye, Bourges, Angers, Tholouse, Rouen, and Lyons. The mangled body of the admiral was insulted by the populace, and hung upon the gibbet of Montfaucon. The young king of Navarre and his cousin, the prince of Condé, were closetted by the king, who told them, that if they refused to embrace the Roman catholic religion, they should not be alive in three days. The parliament being assembled, and informed by their sovereign of the steps he had taken, in consequence (as he said) of a conspiracy against the catholics, the president, who was father to the celebrated historian Thuanus, harangued in praise of the king's conduct; and the advocate-general proposed that the admiral and his accomplices might be proceeded against in form of law. Accordingly the murdered Coligni was tried, condemned, and hanged in effigy. In a word, this whole affair was one of the most infamous plans of perfidious cruelty that ever was executed, and leaves an indelible stain on the French nation.

* A fortified town at the mouth of the river Maes, in the isle of Voorn, in Holland, five miles distant from Helvoetsluys.

† William of Nassau, prince of Orange, descended from a sovereign family of great lustre and antiquity in Germany, inheriting the possession of a sovereign family in France, on account of his noble birth and immense riches, as well as his personal virtues, was universally regarded as the greatest subject who lived in those provinces. He had opposed, by all regular and dutiful means, the progress of the Spanish usurpations; and when Philip conducted his army into the Netherlands, and assumed the government, this prince, well acquainted with the violent character of the man, and tyrannical spirit of the court of Madrid, wisely fled from the danger which threatened him, and returned to his paternal estate and dominions in Germany. He was cited to appear before Alva's tribunal; was condemned in his absence, declared a rebel, and his ample possessions in the Low Countries were confiscated. In revenge, he levied an army of protestants in the empire, and made some attempts to restore the Flemings to liberty, but was still repulsed by the vigilance and military conduct of Alva; and by the great bravery as well as discipline of those veteran Spaniards who served under that general. The revolt of Holland and Zealand, provinces which the prince of Orange formerly commanded, and where he was infinitely beloved, called him anew from his retreat, and he added conduct no less than spirit to that obstinate resistance which was here made to the Spanish dominion. By uniting the revolted towns into a league, he laid the foundation of that illustrious commonwealth, the offspring of industry and liberty, whose arms and policy have made so signal a figure in every transaction in Europe. but but far greater numbers pressed to serve under the prince of Orange; the first of whom was Thomas Morgan, who carried three hundred English to Flushing; then followed, by his procurement, nine companies more, under the conduct of Humphrey Gilbert. These volunteers arrived just as the duke of Alva was preparing to recover Flushing and the other sea-port towns, and, it is thought, defeated the duke's design. At the same time Elizabeth, by the advice of her council, sent other relief to the prince of Orange; but it was so secret that the Spaniards had no grounds to reproach her for breach of faith.

The year 1573 opened with the embassy of William Somerset, earl of Worcester, who was sent by Elizabeth into France, with a font of massy gold, to stand at the baptism of the new-born daughter of Charles IX. which was so highly relished by that court, that they began now to be more and more earnest for an alliance with Elizabeth, and the duke of Alençon was ordered to write repeated letters of suitorship to her. At last the queen-mother became very pressing, by the French ambassador here, for the young duke to have leave to come and pay his respects to the queen of England in person, to which Elizabeth, wearied out with their importunities, after some time affected to assent, but upon condition that he should not take it as a disgrace if he returned without obtaining his suit.

But Elizabeth hearing soon after that his brother Henry, duke of Anjou, was elected king of Poland, and that Charles IX. was ill of a dangerous disorder, she gave intimation to Alençon, by Edward Horsey, governor of the Isle of Wight (whom she had appointed her resident at the French court in the room of Walsingham, now recalled at his own request) that he should not for the present think of undertaking a journey to England; but, if he meant to give her real proofs of his affection, that he should first procure a peace for the distressed Huguenots in France, which would render his reception in England much more favourable. The Romanists had for some time closely besieged Rochelle, the bulwark of the protestants in France, who made such a desperate resistance, that the duke of Anjou, who commanded against the place, lost twenty-four thousand men, without making any considerable progress in the siege. When he received tidings of his being elected king of Poland, this event affording him a salvo for his reputation, he concluded a treaty with the inhabitants, in which their allies of Nismes and Montauban, and at last all the protestants of France, were comprehended, and in some places allowed the free exercise of their religion. And now the king of France and the queen-mother pressed the affair of the marriage more closely than ever to Elizabeth, and withal they requested Elizabeth to grant the duke of Anjou a safe-conduct, in case he should take his voyage to Poland by sea. To this last request she not only consented with great alacrity, but also offered a fleet to conduct him thither. In the mean while the duke of Alençon falling very ill of a fever, his mother signified the same to Elizabeth by the count de Retz, and excusing the duke thereupon for not coming to England as he had determined; Elizabeth, who had by this time received a report but little to the duke's advantage, who was represented to her as a very homely figure of a man, and much defaced with the small-pox, cooled in her affection so much, that she gladly accepted the excuse, and even shewed a manifest reluctance to have any connections with him.

All this time, since the death of the earl of Marr, there had been no regent in Scotland; but now, by the procurement of Elizabeth, James Douglas, earl of Morton, was chosen regent; who when his authority, in a parliamentary assembly, was established, enacted many excellent laws for the support of the protestant religion against papists and heretics, in the name of the king. But the protection and keeping of the royal person he confirmed to Alexander, earl of Marr, son of the deceased regent, though that nobleman was himself a minor; the custody of the persons of the Scottish kings, during their minority, belonging, by especial privilege, to that family. In the interim the French king sent his ambassador, Verac, to engage the earls of Athol and Huntley, with large promises, to oppose the regent; while Elizabeth, on the other hand, exerted all her efforts to support her creature. She had already found means, through Killigrew, her ambassador at the Scottish court, to draw the duke of Chatelerault, with the most eminent of that faction, to acknowledge the regent, by a public instrument, dated in March this year; but William Kirkaldy, laird of Grainge, whom Murray (when he was regent, had made governor of Edinburgh castle), the lord Home, Ledington, the bishop of Dunkeld, and some others, could by no means be brought to own Morton, but fortified themselves in the castle; and, trusting to the natural strength of the place, and to the supplies promised them by the French king and the duke of Alva, they resolved to hold it for queen Mary, against all opposition.

Hereupon Morton and his party sent a deputation to the English court, for assistance to reduce the castle, then deemed impregnable. Elizabeth's wonted policy would not suffer her to be a quiet spectator, till the fortune of war should enable France and Spain to pour in troops into Scotland: she therefore readily listened to the request of the deputies, and promised them immediate assistance, upon certain conditions, whereof one was, that ten hostages should be sent into England, to be security for the safe return of the troops and ammunition, unless by the common hazard of war they should be slain or lost. The conditions being agreed on, she ordered sir William Drury, the marshal of Berwick, to march into Scotland, at the head of twelve hundred soldiers, and three hundred pioneers with a strong train of artillery. Killigrew, the English ambassador, served as an officer in this army, together with several gentlemen of the first distinction as volunteers. Upon the English forces entering the Borders, they were joined by one thousand Scots and four pieces of cannon; and on the twenty-fifth of April the whole army appeared before Edinburgh castle.

The place was very ill provided with ammunition, and the number of soldiers in garrison did not exceed one hundred and sixty. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, Kirkaldy, who was a man of exemplary courage, conduct, and experience, made a vigorous defence for three-and-twenty days; but at last, their water failing them, and a sickness getting among the garrison, which raged so as to reduce it to fifteen individuals, Kirkaldy was obliged obliged to capitulate, and obtained from sir William Drury very honourable conditions: but Morton having, during the siege, practised with Elizabeth, she refused to accept of the prisoners taken in the castle as her prisoners, and sent orders to sir William Drury to deliver them all up, to be disposed of as the regent of Scotland should think proper. Accordingly the gallant laird of Grainge, James Kirkaldy, and some others, were ignominiously executed upon a gibbet at the Market-cross of Edinburgh. Camden says, an hundred of the family of Kirkaldy offered to be vassals for ever to the regent, to pay a yearly pension of three thousand marks, and two thousand pounds Scots in hand, if he would spare his life, but that Morton would not hear of it. As to Ledington, Elizabeth had taken care to give orders for his safety; but he died at Leith a few days after the capitulation, having contracted a mortal disease in the castle, a place noted for its unwholesomeness. The lord Home, on paying ten thousand pounds to Morton, was pardoned, and put in the possession of his estates.

The regent, not yet satisfied with blood, sent to demand of Elizabeth, that she would deliver into his hands the bishop of Rois, who had been released from the Tower, at the intercession of the French ambassador in England, and committed in custody to the bishop of Winchester: but the ambassador remonstrating against such an outrage upon good faith and the laws of nations, the queen of England rejected Morton's demand, and allowed the bishop to withdraw himself into the French dominions. And now Scotland began to rest a little from the intestine troubles which had so long desolated it, and every thing being reduced under the authority of the young king, and a regent devoted to England, Elizabeth was freed from great uneasiness: and, as a farther increase of her happiness, she received advice from the Low Countries, that the Zealanders had defeated a fleet under the duke of Medina Celi, which was destined for the assistance of the queen of Scots and her friends; as also that the duke of Alva, finding in the resolute resistance of the oppressed Flemings, the pernicious effects of his violent counsels, had solicited to be recalled from the government, and that don Lewis de Zuniga, commendator of Roquesanto, in Castile, had been sent to replace him. The tyrant Alva departed finally from the Netherlands, the beginning of the following year, leaving his name in execration to the inhabitants, and boasting in his turn, that, during the course of five years government, he had delivered above eighteen thousand of these rebellious heretics into the hands of the executioner*.

This year died William, lord Howard of Effingham, lord privy-seal, son of Thomas Howard the martial duke of Norfolk, by his second wife, Agnes Tilney. He was made lord high-admiral by queen Mary, and afterwards lord-chamberlain, in which post he served queen Elizabeth; and was succeeded by his son Charles, who, a while after, was made lord-chamberlain and lord high-admiral. This year also died Reginald Grey, earl of Kent, whom the queen, the year before, had raised from a private gentleman to that dignity, after the title had been dormant fifty years: his brother Henry succeeded him in his honours.

The succeeding year, 1574, the duke of Alençon grew more and more importunate in his suit to Elizabeth, insomuch that he obtained her consent to come into England any time before the twentieth of May; and to this concession she was the more readily moved, because she knew the young prince to be a great opposer of the family of the Guises, her sworn enemies: but before Elizabeth's answer could be carried to the duke, she received advice from Valentine Dale, doctor of the civil law and her resident in France, that Alençon and the king of Navarre were both put under arrest, through the interest of the Guises, who had persuaded the queen-mother that they held a treasonable correspondence with the chief of the protestant interest in France. It appears that Alençon, who was a weak young man, actually confessed that he had held some consultation with the duke de Bouillon, a protestant chief, about his intended marriage with the queen of England, and of the best measures to be taken for securing to the protestants the safe enjoyment of the privileges granted them by the late treaty of Rochelle, as also for supporting the Flemings against the oppressive power of the court of Spain. Elizabeth was greatly concerned at the news of Alençon's imprisonment and that of the king of Navarre, lest they should be intimidated to confess some practices which she had underhand held with the Huguenots; and accordingly she immediately wrote to Dale, to re-assure those two princes, and to give them the strongest promises of her friendship and protection. As Dale himself durst not be seen in executing this commission, he committed it to Thomas Wiekens, his secretary, who disguised himself to admiration; nor is there, in all the confessions and declarations given by those two princes, the smallest circumstance reflecting on the honour of the engagements of the queen of England. Soon after Elizabeth sent sir Thomas Randolph into France, to the queen-mother, to bring about, if possible, a reconciliation between that princess and her son, the duke of Alençon, and the king of Navarre.

But while this affair was on the carpet, Charles IX. died, on the thirtieth of May, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, after having rendered his name odious to all the world, at a time of life when his own subjects were not reckoned out of their minority. He died of a very extraordinary distemper: his blood oozed from all the pores of his body. This uncommon end, which, however, is not without example (and was probably the effect of a putrid colliquation of the blood, and a general relaxation of the smaller vessels), passed with the people, especially the protestants, for the effect of divine vengeance: an useful notion, did it put a stop to the wickedness of those who are powerful or unfortunate enough not to be subject to the curb of the laws!

The queen-mother took her measures so well, that, causing the dying king to confer on her the regency of the realm, she kept all quiet till the arrival of the duke of Anjou, king of Poland, who succeeded his brother, by the name of Henry III. He arrived in France the fifth of September this year, but came not to Paris till about the middle of February following.

Nothing memorable passed in England during the year 1574. The only thing Camden has remarked in his Annals, is the marriage of Charles, earl of Lenox, uncle to the young king of Scotland, with Elizabeth Cavendish, daughter to the countess of Shrewsbury: as this marriage was made unknown to the queen, she imprisoned the mothers of the new-married couple. It may not be useless to mention, that this year, in order to put a check to the growing luxury of the English, especially in dress, the queen, by proclamation, commanded that every one should, within fourteen days, wear cloaths of such a fashion, of which she herself fixed the pattern. On the third of April the queen granted a commission to lord Burleigh, lord high-treasurer of England, and to sir Walter Mildmay, chancellor and under-treasurer of the Exchequer, to manumise and enfranchise bondmen and bondwomen, or, as they are now called, copyholders, regardant and appertaining to the royal manors and possessions within the counties of Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, and Gloucester*. It is with reluctance that we must observe, the spirit of Christianity in the church could not keep pace with its doctrines, for we find, in Stowe, that some of our reforming bishops, about this time, for a few doubtful points in religion, dragged innocent people to the stake, where they were burned to death, with all the circumstances of popish cruelty.

In the Netherlands, the confederates still continued their progress, taking several towns from the Spaniards. But, on the other hand, Lewis, count of Nassau, who was leading an army to his brother, the prince of Orange, was defeated upon Moker heath, near Nimeguen, and was himself slain, with his brother Henry and Christopher Casimir, count Palatine. Upon this untoward accident the prince of Orange began to entertain thoughts of applying to the French; but Elizabeth sent Daniel Rogers to dissuade him from it; which he not being able to do, she sent Henry, lord Cobham, to Philip of Spain to inform him of the prince of Orange's design.

The paucity of events in England during this inactive year, affords room to introduce a brief account of the affairs of its sister kingdom, Ireland.

There the deprivatory bull, fulminated by the pope against Elizabeth, continued to have dreadful effects. But sir John Perot, president of Munster, kept that turbulent country in so good order, that James Fitz Maurice, the most formidable of all the confederates against the English government, was forced to submit. In Connaught, the sons of the earl of Clanrickard took arms against the severe government of the president sir Edward Fitton, and engaged a thousand mercenary Scots in their service. The earl their father, who was then prisoner in Dublin, offered to suppress his sons, and the government there would have entrusted him with the command; but Elizabeth, more prudently, removed Fitton from his place, and the rebels then returning to their duty, the thousand Scots were left to the mercy of the garrison-soldiers, under captain Collier, by whom they were all cut to pieces. The earl of Kildare was not so successful in Leinster, against the O'Mores, whom he was unable to restrain from joining the O'Connors, and making an irruption into the Pale, where they burned Athlone, and were guilty of dreadful excesses, while their confederate Brien M^c Phelim took and burned Carrickfergus. Fitz Maurice being subdued by sir John Perot, who likewise took the castle of Mayo, wherein was a garrison of French free-booters, the rebels of Leinster were disappointed in their intention of joining those of Munster: but M^c Phelim still continued in arms.

Those repeated commotions in Ireland, the success which the rebels received from abroad, and the small prospect of reducing the island to perfect quiet, put Elizabeth upon very serious considerations. Upon examining her accounts last year, she found that the gross amount of all the revenues of Ireland, since her succession to the throne, came only to one hundred and ninety thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine pounds, seven shillings, and six pence half-penny. This vast disproportion of expence and supply made her lend an ear to a proposal of the earl of Essex, an active young nobleman, full of spirits, and under some disgusts with the courtiers: it was, that the earl should, before Michaelmas, carry over to Ireland, two hundred horse and four hundred foot, and maintain them there, to be employed against the rebels for two years, the queen furnishing the same number during that time; while the earl was to have a commission to be captain-general for seven years. In consideration of this, the queen was to give him half the lordships of Clondeboy, Ferney, and other lands to a great extent, which were to be occupied by him; with an equal number of soldiers, as the queen should think fit to maintain upon the other half of the said lordships. They were to be at equal expence in maintaining necessary fortifications. Every horseman serving as volunteer gratis for two years, was to be recompensed with four hundred acres of land, at two pence an acre at the same rent. Several other articles were inserted in this agreement, which seems to have been founded on the foot of the old feudal tenure; but the above are the chief. Essex was so fond of this command, which set him upon the footing of a prince, that he borrowed ten thousand pounds of Elizabeth, upon a mortgage of his lands in Essex; and, about the latter end of August this year, he landed in Ireland, accompanied by the lords Dacres and Rich, three sons of the lord Norris, and many other gentlemen of distinction, who served under him as volunteers. But Fitz Williams, the lord-deputy, considered this command, given the earl of Essex, as derogating from his own authority, and underhand gave him all the obstruction he could. M^c Phelim, one of the principal chieftains, at first submitted to the earl, but soon after revolted, perceiving the troops he brought with him were but few, and ill disciplined. The lord Rich and sir Henry Knolles in a few weeks became so dispirited, that they returned to England, which threw a damp upon the whole expedition. The lord-deputy, under frivolous pretences, withheld the earl's commission, so that his hands were in a manner tied up; while M^c Phelim, putting himself at the head of the Irish and Hebridian Scots, endeavoured to cut him off. With great difficulty he kept his ground all this summer, and endeavoured to fortify Clondeboy. In the following spring the lord-deputy marched against the earl of Desmond, who had escaped out of prison, and Essex was ordered to guard the borders of

* Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xv. p. 371.

Ulster. The earl of Desmond, through the persuasion of Essex, submitted himself to the government. The rest of the year was spent in reducing Turlogh, Leinigh, Con O'Donald, and the other Irish. But Essex, broken both in body and mind, earnestly applied to Elizabeth for leave to return, or to allow him pay for one hundred horse and six hundred foot, or to grant him the peninsula of Mayo. Elizabeth of herself was inclinable to have recalled him, but Essex had enemies, particularly Leicester, who did all they could to prevent his returning to court, so that he continued in his disagreeable commission, to the almost utter ruin of his fortune. Towards the end of the year 1574, Essex sent over to Elizabeth a plan for civilizing Ulster, by building there three new towns and ten forts. While the project was under deliberation, M^r Phelim, Turlogh, and the Scots, again endeavoured to surprize and cut him off: but the earl discovering the plot, he was beforehand with the conspirators, of whom he killed two hundred, and took M^r Phelim and his wife prisoners. These commotions in Ireland gave Elizabeth great disquiet, she looking upon them as fomented underhand by the French and Spaniards; she therefore redoubled her attention towards settling the affairs of that country. One Chaderton, an English gentleman, offered to people the Fues and the O'Hanlan territory with English; but the inexpressible obstinacy of the native Irish, and the selfishness of the English already settled in Ireland, defeated that design, to the ruin of Chaderton's fortune. A worse fate befel a natural son of sir Thomas Smith, the secretary of state, who was sent over to plant a colony in the peninsula called the Arles, in the east of Ulster: every horseman inhabiting that tract was to have one hundred and forty Irish acres, and every footman one hundred and twenty (almost five hundred English acres); but the design was defeated, and young Smith, after carrying over the colony, was treacherously murdered by Neal Breanarths. His death was soon after revenged by Malbey, the English governor of Lecale, who killed the murderer, and left his body to be devoured by wolves. So many untowardly circumstances determined Elizabeth at last to give the earl of Essex leave to return to England, which he did; and to change the government of the country, which was once more put into the hands of sir Henry Sidney. This gentleman had served in that capacity twice already with great success; and the finances there were now put under a new regulation. He undertook to plant Leih and Offaley with English adventurers, and, if possible, to raise from them sums for discharging the crown debts in Ireland. But Elizabeth, in the mean time, besides the ordinary revenues of Ireland, was to remit him twenty thousand pounds every year out of England, provided that he fortified Carrickfergus, and built some bridges, necessary for the quiet of the country*.

Early in the year 1575, the queen sent Roger, lord North, into France, to congratulate Henry III. on his return and happy inauguration into the kingdom of his ancestors. Henry was no sooner seated in the throne than he resolved to pursue the favourite scheme of his mother, and the late king his brother, to extirpate the protestants, and actually renewed hostilities against the Huguenots, without any provocation given by them since the peace granted by Charles IX. in the year 1573. But, fearing the queen of England should assist them, his first care was to renew the treaty of Blois in its utmost extent, to which Elizabeth consented, and, by Mr. de la Chatre, sent Henry the order of the Garter.

This, however, did not hinder her from furnishing John Casimir, son to the deceased elector Palatine, with a sum of money, to levy and lead into France a body of ten thousand Germans to the assistance of the duke of Alençon and the king of Navarre, who, making their escape from the French court, had put themselves at the head of the male-content party, and made war upon the government jointly with the Huguenots. It was probably to furnish out supplies for this occasion, that the queen, in April this year, issued out privy seals for a loan of sixty thousand pounds sterling, half of which was charged upon the citizens of London, ten thousand pounds on the clergy, and the other twenty thousand pounds on the gentry of the kingdom.

Whilst Elizabeth was thus secure from any attempts on the side of France or Spain, who were both too much embarrassed with their own affairs to have leisure to think of disturbing her peace, it is not easy to conceive how she could have any reason to be jealous of the queen of Scots, who was kept so close a prisoner, that it was scarce possible for her to correspond with any one; yet a great stir was made about letters and packets being conveyed to her, and a negociation being set on foot between her and de Guouza, the Spanish resident. Five persons of quality were committed to the Tower, and divers others examined on the subject; but, after the utmost diligence in enquiry, nothing came to light, all being founded on mere suspicion. The death of the duke of Chatelerault†, in the beginning of this year, and the insane state of mind under which his son, the earl of Arran, now laboured, seemed to overturn all hopes of reviving a party for Mary in Scotland. The regent, Morton, was master of the kingdom, and being a most obedient slave to the queen of England, this last had nothing more to desire in Scotland but to get the young prince delivered into her hands, which, perhaps, was the reason why such large sums were sent at this time to Killigrew, resident in that country. Unluckily this happened to be the only point in which Morton could not gratify her, the prince being in custody of the young earl of Marr's uncle, in the castle of Stirling; and this trusty guardian would not give up his charge without an order from the estates of Scotland, who would not suffer the prince to be carried out of the kingdom. Morton next formed a scheme for getting the king out of the hands of Erskine, by making a match between the late earl of Marr's widow and his own nephew the earl of Angus; but the lady dying in July this year, he was disappointed in this measure also.

* Cox's History of Ireland.

† James Hamilton, duke of Chatelerault, and earl of Arran, was great-grand-son to James II. of Scotland, by his daughter. He was appointed tutor to Mary, queen of Scots, and governor and presumptive heir of the kingdom during her minority.

Upon his delivering her to the French, he was made duke of Chatelerault in France. Camden, p. 454. This year also, on the fifteenth of May, died the learned Matthew Parker, archbishop of Canterbury. Strype. Stowe, p. 679.

Before the end of this year the Huguenots, strengthened by the accession of the German army under the prince of Condé and prince Casimir, but much more by the credit and influence of the king of Navarre, who had assumed the command of them, rendered themselves so formidable that Henry III. was glad to grant them a truce of six months, at the mediation of Elizabeth, who now openly patronized the duke of Alençon. This was the fifth pacification made with the Huguenots; but the terms of it being extremely disgraceful and disadvantageous to the crown of France, it gave the highest offence to the catholics, and furnished Henry, duke of Guise (son to Francis, the deceased duke, slain at the siege of Orleans), with the desired pretext for condemning the measures and maxims of his sovereign. That bold and daring leader embraced the same opportunity of forming his party into a regular and consistent body, and laid the first foundation of the famous league, which, without regarding the royal authority, aimed at the total extirpation of the Huguenots; while Henry endeavoured, but in vain, to adopt a new plan, by acting as an umpire between the two parties, and, by balancing their power, to reduce both to a dependence on himself. But such was the wretched condition of France, from the past severities of its princes, that toleration and indulgence could be no longer practised, and an edict for liberty of conscience, which would probably have satisfied the protestants, inflamed the resentment of the catholics to the highest pitch.

Philip II. in the low ebb of his affairs, had, some time before, solicited an accommodation with Elizabeth, who, with a view to obtain some advantages in trade to her subjects, agreed to adjust the difference subsisting between the two crowns. Commissioners were appointed to settle the accompts of the seizures on both sides; the balance was very honourably paid to the king of Spain; and the commerce between England and his territories renewed by a treaty concluded at Bristol. Upon the faith of this good understanding between the two courts, Lewis Zuniga, the successor of the duke of Alva in the Netherlands, being wholly bent to recover the command of the sea, which his predecessor had so impolitically neglected, sent to Elizabeth, desiring leave to hire ships and mariners in England, and demanded that all the Dutch rebels should be expelled the kingdom. Although the queen refused to comply with those requests, yet, upon his sending away the earl of Westmoreland and other English fugitives out of the Low Countries, she banished all the Dutch who carried arms against the king of Spain, and prohibited her subjects from receiving any such persons into her ports or harbours.

This however did not hinder the prince of Orange and the estates of Holland and Zealand, who found themselves unable to support the war much longer against the wealth and power of Spain, from venturing, in the spring of the year 1576, to send deputies to implore the assistance of Elizabeth, and to offer her the sovereignty of their country, as being descended from Philippa, wife to Edward III. and daughter to William III. of Bavaria, earl of Holland and Zealand. Though this title was ridiculous, yet it served Elizabeth as some pretext to pause upon their offer. The deputation consisted of Philip Marnix, lord of Aldegonde; James Douza, William Nieuville, Paul Buys, advocate for the states of Holland, and Melsen, a lawyer. A deputation of so many illustrious men was what Elizabeth had long wanted, and she neither granted nor rejected their request; but, after having taken some time for consideration, she gave them for answer, that "as yet she conceived not how, with the safety of her honour and an upright conscience, she could receive those provinces into her possession; but promised she would use her best offices with the king of Spain, for obtaining them a suitable peace." Accordingly she actually sent an ambassador to the court of Spain for that purpose; but Philip found means to evade a punctual answer, no accommodation ensued, and the war continued to rage with as much violence as ever.

The Hollanders, who now appeared on the very brink of perdition, were happily delivered from their distresses by a mere accident: Zuniga being carried off this year by a sudden death, the Spanish troops, discontented for want of pay, and licentious for want of a proper commander, broke out into a most terrible mutiny; they sacked and plundered the cities of Antwerp and Maestricht, and massacred near seventeen thousand persons of all ages and sexes, without any possibility of preventing their outrages; and the mutineers menacing all the other cities of the Low Countries with the fate of the two already mentioned, all the provinces, excepting only that of Luxembourg, engaged in an association for their mutual defence, and sent to the prince of Orange, who was then in Holland, imploring his protection, and that he would put himself at their head. Hereupon conferences were held at Ghent, where was formed the union of the Low Countries, called the Union or Pacification of Ghent, which laid the foundation of the present States of the United Provinces. This union, which was signed on the eighth of November this year, 1576, was for the defence of the laws and liberties of the inhabitants of the Low Countries, against the encroachments, oppressions, and cruelties, that had been exercised upon them by Spanish tyranny. Notwithstanding this, they were still willing to own the king of Spain's authority, provided he would govern according to the ancient laws. This union being thus formed, the fortresses raised by the duke of Alva, to keep the Netherlands in subjection, were demolished every where. Some time after the association was sworn to by the clergy and nobility at Brussels. By this Philip II. lost almost all his authority in the Low Countries, having only the bare title of sovereign, unless he would confine himself to the rights enjoyed by his predecessors, which was very far from his thoughts.

France was not at more quiet than the Low Countries. The duke of Alençon had assembled an army against the king, in favour of the Huguenots. On the other hand, the prince of Condé, with the forces levied by prince Casimir, his brother, entered France, and joined the duke of Alençon. Thus the Huguenots, whom the court was determined to extirpate, were in a condition to sell their lives dear, having at their head the king's brother, the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, with an army of thirty thousand men. But the queen-mother had the address to break all their measures: she sent them offers of treating, and, during the negotiation, found means to sow jealousy among them, and win from them the duke of Alençon and prince Casimir: in short, she caused them to agree to a truce, which, for all its seeming advantages, proved fatal to them, as it disunited their forces. The treaty was concluded on the ninth of May, and enrolled six months after by the parliament of Paris. The Huguenots had never obtained so advantageous a peace since the beginning of the troubles. In October the duke of Alençon came to court, where the queen his mother disengaged him entirely from the party of the Huguenots: then it was that he assumed the title of duke of Anjou, borne by the king his brother before he ascended the throne†.

But the peace was no sooner signed, than the catholic party took effectual measures to frustrate its salutary intentions. The condescension of Henry III. in granting such favourable terms to the Huguenots*, emboldened the duke of Guise to form the league, which had been projected by his uncle, the cardinal of Lorraine, now dead, in defence of the catholic religion, with a design to raise himself upon the ruins of a miserable and ill-governed kingdom. The state now teemed with factions, and Henry de Guise was formed for them. He was son to the deceased duke Francis, slain at the siege of Orleans, and is said to have had all the noble qualities of his father, with the most headstrong and designing ambition: like him he captivated all hearts; and it was commonly said of the father and son, that, in comparison with them, all other princes appeared but as common men.

The league, or Holy Union as its establishers thought proper to term it, was set on foot at Paris; papers were dispersed among the citizens, containing a project of association for the defence of religion, the king, and the liberty of the subject; or rather to oppress at once king, religion, and state. The league was afterwards solemnly signed at Peronne, and through the greatest part of Picardy; and soon after the rest of the provinces acceded to it: the king of Spain declared himself its protector, and it afterwards received the sanction of the apostolic see. The king, pressed between the protestants, who demanded additional privileges, and the leaguers, who wanted to deprive him of his own, thought to strike a blow in politics by signing the league, for fear it should crush him, and declaring himself its chief, which inspired the other members with double boldness. He now found himself, much against his will, obliged, in an assembly of the states, to revoke the edict of pacification which he had concluded with the reformed, and to renew the war against them. However, we shall in the end find him not only obliged once more to give peace to that deceived and distressed part of his subjects, but even to owe his safety on the throne to their loyalty.

And now the earl of Essex, who, out of Leicester's enmity, had been recalled from Ireland, was, out of Leicester's fear, sent thither again. It seems Essex had threatened him with vengeance; and the minister, who never durst venture his credit with Elizabeth in glaring acts of injustice, pocketed all his reproaches, and, under pretence of making him amends, he was this year created earl-marshal of Ireland for life, in the room of sir Nicholas Bagnal, and sent back to that kingdom, where every thing was, as usual, in the utmost confusion; but the earl finding, notwithstanding his late conferred dignity, that he was little better than a private officer, took it so to heart, that, about September, he fell ill of a bloody flux, which carried him off in the thirty-sixth year of his age, not without suspicion of having been poisoned by the earl of Leicester's procurement; and what gave this suspicion greater weight, was, that scarcely had the grave received the last remains of Essex, when Leicester, putting away his wife, the lady Douglas Sheffield, married the deceased earl's relict: we leave the reader to draw his own conclusion.

We shall add to the occurrences of this year, that a company of English merchants sent out Martin Forbisher, the famous seaman, with three pinnaces, to discover the north-west passage. Forbisher sailed from Harwich on the eighteenth of June, and on the ninth of August entered in a bay, under the latitude 63°, where he found inhabitants much resembling the ancient Britons, as they have been described: but being frozen up, he was obliged to return without any farther discovery, on the twenty-fourth of September. Two years after, he made the same attempt, and with the like ill success.

This year died the emperor Maximilian, a prince that had deserved well of queen Elizabeth and the English, who thereupon sent sir Philip Sidney to his son Rodolphus, king of the Romans, with compliments of condolence on the death of his father, and to congratulate him on his accession to the Imperial dignity.

But the most memorable event in this period was a session of parliament, summoned on the eighth of February this year, where debates were started, full of that spirit of freedom which was so new and so offensive to the ear of majesty at that time: accordingly it drew on the promoters the indignation of the queen and the courtiers. Some of the members were committed, but soon after released. The curious reader may find the sum of those debates accurately and concisely related by Mr. Hume, in his history of this reign: as they would too much swell this work, were they to be here inserted, we have contented ourselves with this cursory mention of them.

We come now to the year 1577, which was opened by the ambitious projects of don John of Austria, who had been made governor of the Netherlands in the preceding year, and who was a prince famous through Europe for the glorious victory he gained over the Turkish fleet at Lepanto, and for his ambition in attempting to get himself made king of Tunis. Don John was naturally of an aspiring genius, and, encouraged by the successes which had hitherto attended him in all his undertakings, had projected in his mind a scheme far beyond the reduction of the revolted provinces, and had actually entered into a league with the pope and king of Spain, to assist him in obtaining the queen of Scots for a wife, and placing him upon the throne of Britain.

* By this treaty Henry disowned the late bloody massacre, in which, however, he was but too deeply concerned: he exempts from taxes, for six years, the children of all those who were killed on that fatal day: restores the memory of the late attainted admiral Coligni to its honours: and, to complete his own humiliation, submits to pay the German troops of prince Palatine Casimir, those very troops who had forced him to conclude this peace. But not having money enough to satisfy them, he permitted them to live at discretion for three months in the provinces of Champagne and Burgundy. Volt. Gen. Hist. vol. v. p. 67.

On his taking upon him the government of the Netherlands, he chose rather to inflame than allay the quarrel between the Flemings and the Spaniards, and as he found the states resolved to confine his authority within very narrow limits, he took all occasions of mortifying them. But the prince of Orange having gotten notice of his design upon the queen of Scots, imparted the same to Elizabeth; who now seeing, from the ruin of all the provinces, a probable prospect of opposing the Spanish usurpations, she no longer scrupled to undertake the defence of their liberties, which seemed to be intimately connected with her own safety.

In the mean time the breach between don John and the states grew daily wider: the latter thought that don John wanted to strip them of their liberties, and he imagined his life to be in danger from the states. The effect of all this mutual distrust was, that don John, thinking himself no longer safe in Brussels, where he had hitherto resided, surprised the castle of Namur, to the great joy of the prince of Orange's party, who thought, as don John had now thrown off the mask, that the states might throw away the scabbard, which they accordingly did; for they not only openly challenged don John to shew any cause for so violent a proceeding, which set aside the late pacification, but sent the marquis of Hautrec and Adolphus Meetkirck to Elizabeth in the autumn of this year, to vindicate their proceedings, and to solicit from her the loan of one hundred thousand pounds for eight months. Elizabeth readily gave them credit for this, provided certain towns were bound for the repayment: and she also entered into a treaty with them, whereby "she engaged to assist them with five thousand foot and one thousand horse, to be paid by the Flemings, and to be commanded by an English general, who was to have a seat in the council of the states; that no step relating to peace or war should be taken, without previously imparting it either to the queen or him; that they should conclude no league without her consent; that if any difference happened among themselves, it should be submitted to her arbitration; and that if any prince, on any pretext, should presume to make war upon her, they should send to her aid an army equal to that which she employed in their service*.

In the mean time Elizabeth ordered Wilkes to repair to the court of Spain, where he presented a memorial to that king, on the twentieth of December, importing, "that the queen by no means intended to break the ancient alliance between England and the house of Burgundy; that with this view she had refused the principality of Holland and Zealand when offered her; had advised the prince of Orange to return to his allegiance, and had even threatened him with her displeasure, in case of refusal; but withal, if the king of Spain would wish to see this part of his subjects quietly embrace his rule, she counselled him, as a friend, to oblige don John to resign his government, and that some other prince, more popular, might be appointed in his room; that the Spanish forces might be recalled, and the Flemings re-established in the possession of their liberties:" adding, "that if, after these concessions, they should still refuse to return to their duty, she engaged to join her arms with those of the king of Spain, and compel them to submit†." It is likely Philip was not very well pleased with these reasons, but he feigned to be so, yet still continued to furnish don John with money and troops.

The rumour of the correspondence between don John and the queen of Scots had this summer alarmed the court with a report of her having escaped from Chatworth: this produced a very earnest letter, by Elizabeth's orders, from Burleigh to the earl of Shrewsbury, who had the custody of Mary, recommending to him a greater circumspection than ever with regard to his charge, and not without expressing some suspicion that some of his lordship's family were in confederacy with Mary. But though we know not that any such escape was attempted, yet Elizabeth this year held a strict hand over the papists: many suspected of that religion were put out of the commission of peace; some were severely fined; and one Maine, a priest, was put to death, upon the statute prohibiting the importation of popish trinkets into England; while a gentleman of Cornwall, one Trugion, was condemned to lose his estate, and to be imprisoned during life, for harbouring him. These severities occasioned many reflections upon the government: and while one Jenkins, a bookseller, was trying at the Oxford assizes, a sudden pestilential vapour so fatally affected the judge, the sheriff, with some other persons of distinction, and about three hundred common people, that they all died within a fortnight after.

At this time the affairs of France were in a very melancholy situation. Henry III. could not be said to reign: the catholic league and the protestant confederacy (whereof the king of Navarre was declared general, and the prince of Condé appointed his lieutenant) made war upon each other in despite of him, in all the provinces of the kingdom. Epidemic diseases and famine were added to these scourges: and at this time of general calamity, in order to set up his own favourites against the duke of Guise, after having created Joyeuse and d'Espèrnon dukes and peers, and given them precedence over their seniors, Henry expended four millions of livres on the marriage of the duke of Joyeuse with the sister of the queen his consort, and gave him rank as the king's brother-in-law. New taxes were imposed to defray these prodigalities: this excited the indignation of the public afresh. Had the duke of Guise not made a league against the king, his conduct was sufficient to have produced a general defection. In a word, the faction of Sixteen was now formed: this was a kind of particular league for Paris only, consisting of several persons, who were distributed in the sixteen wards of that city, and who shared the administration one among another: they were staunch friends to the duke of Guise, and sworn enemies to the king, to whom nothing of that august rank remained but the name.

England mean while enjoyed peace and plenty under the wise administration of Elizabeth; but Philip of Spain burned with an eager desire to retort upon the queen the ill offices he thought she had done him, by assisting the confederates of the Low Countries. With this view he entered into a consultation with the pope (now Gregory XIII.) to invade at once both England and Ireland. Gregory had formed a project some time before, to gain the latter of these kingdoms for James Buon Campagno, his bastard son, whom he had made marquis of Vincola. As the greatest strength of England consisted in her shipping, it was resolved, under various pretexts, to hire several of the vessels for long voyages, to the end that while they were absent, the English ports might be seized by a superior fleet. At the same time one Thomas Stukeley, an English fugitive, was to be sent over to join the Irish rebels with a strong body of forces. This man, by making a great boast, and pretending that he was able to reduce the kingdom of Ireland for the pope's bastard, had so insinuated himself into the good graces of the ambitious old pontiff, that he invested him with the titles of marquis of Leinster, and earl of Wexford and Catherlough (the principal dignities of Ireland), and appointed him commander of eight hundred Italians, to be employed in the Irish war; with which Stukeley setting sail from Civita Vecchia, in the spring of 1578, landed at Lisbon. Here he suffered himself to be persuaded by don Sebastian, king of Portugal (to whom the chief command of the expedition against England was assigned) to engage in his service against the Moors in Africa, after which they were to proceed together to Ireland: but both Sebastian and himself being slain in the memorable battle of Alcazar, this design was frustrated.

In the Netherlands, don John of Austria being reinforced by the Spanish troops from Italy, and another body of forces from that country, under the command of Alexander Farnese, prince of Parma, obtained a signal victory, at Gemblours, over the confederates, whose affairs began to decline in consequence of religious disputes. The towns of Amsterdam, Haarlem, and Utrecht, expelled their magistrates, and put the government into the hands of the protestants. The catholics, alarmed at these events, which seemed to portend the destruction of the old religion, proposed to confer the government of the state upon the duke of Anjou, who was accordingly declared protector of the Belgic liberty. The protestants demanded, that they should be admitted to the exercise of public employments as well as the catholics; this demand was granted by the states, on condition that the catholics should enjoy the same privileges in Holland and Zealand. These two provinces eluded this article, and hence dissensions arose among the confederates. This division was increased by the inhabitants of Ghent, who expelled the Romish priests from their city, while the people of Artois and Hainault banished the protestants, in their turn. Don John, in hope of profiting by this animosity, attacked the army of the states in their camp at Rymenant, in Brabant, and was repulsed, after a very obstinate engagement, in which sir John Norreys, second son of the lord Norreys of Rycot, and colonel Stuart, at the head of two regiments of English and Scottish volunteers, signalized themselves by remarkable acts of valour. This event miscarrying, don John endeavoured to amuse them with proposals of peace, till his army should be reinforced: they agreed to the negotiation for the same reason, for they expected to be joined by prince Casimir and a considerable body of Germans, and the duke of Anjou had already advanced to the frontiers of Hainault with eight thousand auxiliaries. By these junctions on both sides, don John found himself at the head of fifty thousand men, including infantry and cavalry, and the army of the estates amounted to three-score thousand; but this last was rendered useless by the disputes between the inhabitants of Ghent and the provinces of Hainault and Artois; some of their troops mutinied, and joining the people of Artois, made incursions into Flanders; and the inhabitants of Ghent brought over prince Casimir to their interest, by promising to pay his soldiers, he having squandered away the money which Elizabeth had remitted to him for that purpose. Davison was sent over by the queen to make severe remonstrances on this subject; but he made such an apology as she admitted, for in the winter he visited her court, where he was graciously received, and invested with the order of the Garter. Don John dying suddenly, not without suspicion of poison, was succeeded in command by the prince of Parma, to whom the estates of Artois and Hainault submitted; and the duke of Anjou seeing this defection, dismissed his troops and retired to France. While he resided in the Low Countries, he dispatched Martel de Bacqueville to England, to renew the negotiations of his marriage with Elizabeth; afterwards the king of France sent over Rambouillet for the same purpose; and both these envoys were received in such a manner as seemed to denote her approbation of the proposal. This was thought to be the more sincere, as she had now no cause to dissemble her sentiments.

This year sir Henry Sidney was, at his own request, recalled from Ireland, where the service was full of trouble and danger, and the reward void of profit or reputation: sir William Drury was sworn lord-deputy in his stead. But we are now to attend the affairs of Scotland, the critical situation of which now demanded all Elizabeth's attention.

The earl of Morton had hitherto retained that kingdom in a close alliance with England, and had also re-established domestic tranquility: but it was not likely, that the factitious authority of a regent would be long able to maintain itself in a country unacquainted with law and order, where the natural dominion of hereditary princes was so frequently opposed and controuled.

The nobility began anew to split into factions; the people were offended at some instances of Morton's avarice; and the clergy, who complained of farther encroachments on their narrow revenues, contributed to inflame the discontent of the other orders. The regent foresaw the approaching danger; and having dropt some peevish expression, as if he was willing to resign the government, the noblemen of the opposite party, favourites of the young king, embraced such a favourable opportunity, and demanded that dismissal which he seemed so readily to offer. James was only in the twelfth year of his age; yet Morton having, as he imagined, effectually provided for his own security by a general pardon, on the twelfth of March this year, resigned his authority into the hands of the king, who now pretended to conduct, in his own name, the affairs of the nation, while the late regent withdrew from the government, and seemed to devote himself entirely to his own private concerns; but, either disgusted with this inactivity, which appeared so insipid after the bustle of public life, or thinking it time to pull off the mask, he returned again to court, and obtained an ascendant in the council; and though he resumed not the title of regent, continued to rule with his former authority.

The opposite party, after holding some private meetings, took to arms, under pretence of rescuing the prince from captivity, and re-instating him in the free exercise of his government: queen Elizabeth interposed her good offices, and effected an agreement between the factions: Morton kept possession of the government; but his enemies were numerous and powerful, and his authority seemed every day to be approaching towards its end.

Esme Stuart, count d'Aubigny, of the house of Lenox*, cousin-german to the king's father, had been born and educated in France; and being a young nobleman of a polite and insinuating address, he was judged by the duke of Guise to be a proper instrument for drawing off James from the English alliance, and attaching him to his mother and her relations. He no sooner arrived at Sterling, where James resided, than he engaged the affections of the young monarch; and uniting his influence with James Stuart of the house of Ochiltree, who had acquired the king's confidence, he employed himself, under the appearance of plays and amusement, in infusing into the tender mind of the prince, new sentiments of politics and government. He convinced him of the injustice which had been done to Mary in her deposition, and made him entertain some thoughts, either of resigning the crown in her favour, or of giving her a share in the administration.

Elizabeth was no sooner informed of these intrigues, than she dispatched sir Robert Bowes into Scotland; accused d'Aubigny, now created duke of Lenox, of an attachment to the French; and advised James to beware of engaging in such suspicious and dangerous commotions. The king apologized for his conduct by means of his ambassador; and Lenox, regarding the queen as his enemy, was farther instigated to undermine the English interest, and particularly to ruin Morton, who was considered as the head of that party.

Morton was seized in council, accused as an accomplice in the late king's murder, thrown into prison, brought to trial, and condemned to suffer the death of a traitor. He acknowledged that Bothwell had acquainted him with the design, had pleaded Mary's assent, and had solicited his assistance; but he denied that he had ever given his approbation to that crime; and in excuse for his silence, represented the danger of disclosing it, either to Henry, who had no resolution nor constancy, or to Mary, who seemed to have a capital share in perpetrating the deed. Elizabeth dispatched sir Richard Randolph, to intercede in Morton's favour; and that ambassador, not satisfied with performing this duty of his function, persuaded the earls of Argyll, Montrose, Angus, Marr, and Glencairn, to engage in a confederacy for protecting, even by force of arms, the life of the prisoner. The more to intimidate that nobleman's enemies, Elizabeth caused a body of forces to advance towards the borders of Scotland: but this expedient, instead of producing the defired effect, contributed only to precipitate his fate.

Morton died with that courage and resolution, which he ever discovered in all the various scenes of his life; and, though blameable in some parts of his private conduct, he left behind him the character of an able and accomplished statesman.

In the course of this year, 1578, Egremont Radcliffe, son to Henry, earl of Suffex, by his second wife, who had been a leading man in the rebellion in the North, and afterwards served under don John of Austria, in the Netherlands, was accused by the English fugitives in the Spanish interest, with being accessory to the death of don John, upon which, whether true or false, he was arrested and put to death. The Spaniards have affirmed, that Radcliffe, in his last moments, voluntarily confessed that he had been freed from his confinement in the Tower of London, and sent over by Walsingham with large promises if he would perpetrate this fact; but the English, who were present at his death, deny his having made any such confession, though all means were used to wrest it from him by the English rebels.

The year 1579 opened with the departure from England of prince Casimir, who returned highly pleased with the honours paid him here, and repaired to his army in the Netherlands; and with the death of that great statesman and zealous friend to the protestant cause, sir Nicholas Bacon: he was descended from an ancient family in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, but was himself born at Chislehurst, in Kent, A. D. 1509. Mr. Lloyd sums up his character in this manner: "He understood his mistress well, and the times better: he could raise factions to serve one, and could allay them to suit the other. He had the deepest reach into affairs, of any man at the council-table; the acuteest head to penetrate into difficulties, the most comprehensive judgment to discern the merits of a cause, the strongest memory to recollect all business at one view, the greatest patience to debate and consider, and the clearest reason to urge any thing that came in his way, in council or chancery. His favour was eminent with his mistress, and his alliance strong with her statesmen. His dexterity and dispatch advanced him to the court of wards, his deep experience made him lord-keeper. He was the exactest man to draw up regulations in council, and the most discreet to execute them in court. When others urged the repeal of the act whereby Elizabeth was declared illegitimate, he was for waving that design, thinking the closure of a festered wound more prudent than the opening it; and judging it higher wisdom to satisfy the world with the old law, that the crown takes away all defects, than to perplex it with new disputes. His account of England and all its affairs, was punctual; his use of learned artists, was continual; his correspondence with his fellow statesmen, exact; his apprehension of our laws and government, clear; his model of both, methodical; his faithfulness to the church, eminent; and his industrious invention for the state, indefatigable: he was, in a word, a father to his country, as he was of sir Nicholas Bacon, of Redgrave, the first baronet of England, and of sir

* He had his title from the town of Aubigny, in France; which title Charles IX. of France had formerly conferred on John Stuart, of the family of Lenox, who being constable of the Scottish army in France, vanquished the English in one battle, and was slain by them in another; and from that time this title belonged to the youngest branch of that house.

Francis Bacon, lord viscount Verulam, and lord-chancellor of England.

It was not only the loss of this good and faithful servant, but the growing power and artful contrivance of the papists that gave the queen, at this time, more than ordinary concern. The pope himself, not discouraged by the miscarriage of Stukely, as noted before, sent more forces into Ireland, and renewed the bull of pope Pius V. and granted a bull for founding a new college at Rome for training up the English fugitives in rebellion, of whom, among other things, it was required, before they could be admitted, to take the oath, "that they would at any time, at the command of their superiors, return into their own country, and be ready to," &c.

This year also was remarkable for bringing Robert Parsons and Edmund Campain into England, who were the first two Jesuits that ever appeared in this kingdom. At the same time the nation swarmed with priests and emissaries from the pope, to preach sedition and rebellion, under colour of administering the sacraments to the scrupulous catholics, and under the disguise of gentlemen, merchants, artificers, and even in the garb of soldiers. Which being known at court, was enough to awake the attention of the queen and her council, who had not forgot the effects of bulls and excommunications, where many were bound by oath, and others thought themselves obliged by conscience, to see them executed; and this produced a proclamation, commanding all those that had any children, wards, or kinsmen beyond sea, to give in their names to the ordinary in ten days, and to call them home in four months; and forbidding all persons to entertain or harbour any Jesuit or priest sent forth from the seminaries of Rome or Rheims, on pain of being punished as rebels and seditious persons. However, this did not deter the malecontents from their pernicious designs. Seditious books were dispersed, asserting the king of Spain's right to the crown, and his and the pope's engagements to assist Elizabeth's rebellious subjects, in case they would take up arms to dethrone her. And these declarations being backed immediately by the forces of these two enemies, which landed in Ireland, under San Joseppo, an Italian commander, though without success, they being obliged by the earl of Ormond to surrender at discretion in five days after he had opened the trenches before the fort del Oro, which they had built, the queen issued out another proclamation, that they who would not keep within the bounds of their duty, must expect no favour.

The difficulties and dangers which so threatened the state greatly forwarded the treaty of marriage between Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou; for which purpose ambassadors from the court of France had all last year been passing backwards and forwards between France and England; at last the baron de Simier, the most artful man in France for the management of a love-intrigue, was sent over to put a finishing hand to this negotiation. This man gained such an ascendant over the passions of Elizabeth, that she seemed to have conceived a very warm affection for the person of the duke of Anjou, insomuch that Leicester and others affirmed she was infatuated by the arts of incantation. Simier, in revenge, did Leicester all the ill offices he could with the queen, and was the first that informed her of that nobleman's private marriage with the widow of Essex. She was so incensed at this information, that she ordered the earl to be confined in the castle of Greenwich, and would actually have committed him to the Tower, had not the earl of Sussex, though his enemy, generously interposed in his behalf, and represented the injustice of punishing any subject for contracting a lawful marriage.

In the mean while the duke of Anjou, flattered by the intelligence he received from his agent, came over to England incognito, attended by two domestics only, towards the end of May this year, and paid the queen a visit at Greenwich, who expressed great satisfaction at his unexpected arrival; and, after a short conversation with her, the subject of which has not transpired, he departed.

But Elizabeth was so apprehensive of the hostile intentions of Philip, whose power was greatly augmented by his late acquisitions, that she resolved not to let the affair of the marriage cool; and this winter she ordered Burleigh (now treasurer), Sussex, Leicester, Bedford, Lincoln, Hatton, and secretary Walsingham, to settle with the French ambassador the terms of the intended alliance.

Henry III. of France sent on this occasion a very splendid embassy into England, composed of Francis de Bourbon, dauphin of Auvergne, and many considerable noblemen: and as Elizabeth had, in a manner, the power of choosing what terms she pleased, the articles were soon adjusted with the English commissioners.

It was agreed, "I. that the marriage should be solemnized within six weeks after the ratification of the articles.

"II. That the duke and his attendants should be indulged with the free exercise of their religion.

"III. That, after the marriage, he should enjoy the title of King, but the administration should remain in the hands of Elizabeth.

"IV. That their children, male or female, should succeed to the crown of England.

"V. That if there be two males, the eldest, in case of Henry's death without issue, should be king of France, the younger of England.

"VI. That if there be but one male, and he succeed to the crown of France, he should be obliged to reside in England eight months every two years.

"VII. That the laws and customs of England should be preserved inviolate.

"VIII. And that no foreigner should be advanced by the duke to any office in England."

These articles, however, were not positively concluded, but the discussion of them referred either to a parliament, or a conference between the queen and the duke of Anjou.

The public, who generally judge by appearances, began now to consider the match to be as good as concluded, and the puritans thought popery was already at their gates. The apprehension of this drove one Stubbs to publish a libel against the match, in which he abuses the French king, his brother, and the French ambassador with great virulence. This performance had so remarkable an influence upon the public, that Elizabeth ordered a proclamation to be drawn up, expressly in answer to the facts and reasonings brought by the libeller; and all the clergy in England had orders to set the queen's queen's proceedings, in the matter of her marriage, in a true (that is, favourable) light to their congregations. Stubbs, the author, and Page, the bookseller, were prosecuted as libellers, and condemned to lose their right hands, which were accordingly chopped off by the executioner; and Stubbs afterwards endured a long imprisonment in the Tower.

This year affords little extraordinary besides what we have already related, except the execution of Matthew Harmont for blasphemy, at Norwich; the establishment of the Turkey Company, by virtue of a treaty with Amurath, sultan of the Turks, managed by sir William Harbourn; the appointing sir Thomas Bromley lord high-chancellor of England, upon the decease of sir Nicholas Bacon; and the death of sir Thomas Gresham, who built the Royal Exchange, and dedicated a large house to the purposes of learning, called after him Gresham College, where he founded lectures in divinity, the civil law, medicine, astronomy, geometry, rhetoric, and music.

In the Low Countries, the prince of Parma amused the confederates with a negotiation at Cologne, and in the mean time fomented their dissensions and mutual animosities. The prince of Orange, far from being dispirited by the defection of Hainault, Artois, and some other popish provinces, which submitted to Philip, exerted all his influence and industry in strengthening the confederacy of those provinces which still persisted in the resolution to throw off the Spanish yoke. At length he effected the famous treaty of Utrecht, between Holland, Zealand, Friesland, and Utrecht, to which Ghent and Ypres afterwards acceded, and the prince was elected governor of Flanders. Mean while the prince of Parma reduced Maastricht, and then dismissed great part of his Spanish and Italian troops, according to his agreement with the states who had submitted; an act of honour and good faith which was productive of the voluntary submission of Mechlin, Lisle, and Valenciennes.

The news from Scotland was rather disagreeable than otherwise to Elizabeth. The young king was now wholly governed by two young favourites, minions of the duke of Guise, who wanted to engage the king to marry a daughter of France, and, after marriage, to declare the duke of Guise his lieutenant-general, which must have ended in the worst of consequences to Elizabeth.

The city of London increasing excessively, to the detriment of the rest of the towns of the kingdom, the queen thought it necessary to remedy this inconvenience: she published therefore, in the beginning of the year 1580, a proclamation, prohibiting any new buildings within three miles of the gates of the city, upon pain of imprisonment, and forfeiture of the materials; and ordered that no more than one family should live in a house.

But there was still a more pressing evil which it was no less necessary to remedy, I mean the practices of the papists; for the farther the enquiries of the government reached, the stronger reasons were found for being upon its guard against the pernicious order of Jesuits, which had now got footing in England. It was discovered, that, notwithstanding the late regulations, they still persisted in spreading seditious tenets, and encouraging, not only those of their own religion, but all the lewd, the needy, and the turbulent, to join in attempting a revolution. In short, the zeal and activity of the papists were such as drew upon themselves a storm of persecution; nor can the severities now exercised against them be excused by any other apology but the danger they had brought upon their country. Campian, the Jesuit, who published a treatise, called the Ten Reasons, in favour of the church of Rome, was taken and executed; but Parsons, the other Jesuit, who had come over with him, making his escape to the continent, joined the English refugees in soliciting the king of Spain to invade England.

While the church and state of England were thus threatened on the one hand from the fury of the papists, they were no less disquieted on the other by the fanatical opinions of sectaries, imported from Germany and the Low Countries. A new sect, founded by Nicholai, a Dutchman, and termed the Family of Love, prevailed at this time in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk: they rejected the Lord's Prayer, the sacraments, and the outward admission of ministers; they confined salvation to themselves, holding the rest of the world as reprobates; they were guilty of the most scandalous impurities and libertinism, and published apologies, filled with all the absurdities of fanaticism; till at length, a proclamation being published against them, they were prosecuted and suppressed.

This year, 1580, was remarkable for the return of captain Francis Drake from his voyage, which he had completed round the world. This man was born of mean parents in the county of Devon: having amassed a large fortune by some depredations made on the Spaniards in the Isthmus of Panama, and having there got a view of the Pacific Ocean, or South Sea, was so actuated by ambition and a thirst of gain, that he ventured to employ his whole substance in a new adventure through those seas, so little known at that time to the European nations.

It falls not under a general history to give all the particulars of this famous voyage; but it is proper to mention those of a public concern. He was introduced to court by Hatton, upon proposing to sail to the South Seas through the streights of Magellan, a voyage till that time unattempted by Englishmen. The fleet with which he set sail consisted of the following vessels: the Pelican, commanded by himself, of the burden of one hundred tons; the Elizabeth, vice-admiral, eighty tons, under captain John Winter; the Marygold, a bark of thirty tons, commanded by captain John Thomas; the Swan, a fly boat of fifty tons, under captain John Chester; and the Christopher, a pin-nace of fifteen tons, under captain John Noon. On board those ships, the largest of which would at this time be deemed too small for undertaking a common voyage to any of our own settlements, embarked one hundred and sixty-four men, and on the thirteenth of December, 1577, Drake sailed from Falmouth; on the twentieth of August following, having turned two of his ships adrift, but taking their crews and provisions on board, he entered the streights of Magellan, and passed them with his own ship only. While he was in the South Sea he took a prodigious booty from the Spaniards, whom he treated as enemies: he sacked and plundered the town of St. Aricia; and in one ship he took four hundred pounds weight of Baldivian gold: on land he seized the value of four hundred thousand thousand ducats, in bars of silver; and all along the coast he found such security that he had little to do but to load his ship with gold, silver, and precious stones. At last he had intelligence that the viceroy of Peru had sent Pedro Sarmiento, with two ships, to intercept him on his return through the Straights of Magellan.

This news, with his own adventuring spirit, determined him, if possible, to find a way back to England by the north of America, which he coasted to the latitude of forty-eight degrees; but finding this impracticable, fell back to the latitude of thirty-eight degrees, where he landed in a convenient harbour, amongst an hospitable people, and, in Elizabeth's name, took possession of the country, to which he gave the name of New Albion. It was the twenty ninth of September before he set sail from thence, and the lateness of the season, joined to the danger of the navigation, determined him to sail to the Moluccos, where he arrived in the middle of November. On the fifteenth of June next year, after various adventures and dangers, he doubled the Cape of Good Hope, with but fifty-seven men on board his ship, and three casks of water. On the twenty-fifth of September (Camden says the third of November) he entered again the harbour of Plymouth, finding his countrymen in high admiration of his intrepidity, his constancy and good fortune.

His adventure, however, became matter of very serious consideration to Elizabeth. Drake had left England on pretext of a voyage to the Levant: the treaties between Elizabeth's ancestors and the house of Burgundy were still in full force, and many doubted whether they were not violated by Drake's proceedings. Mendoza, the Spanish resident, presented very warm memorials, accusing him of robbery and piracy, and reclaiming all the treasure he had taken. Elizabeth for some time forbore to declare her opinion either for or against Drake, and he therefore sought to procure friends at court, by making large presents to some of the chief men there. The voice of the public, and her own good sense, which never failed her, soon determined Elizabeth in the part she was to act; she sequestered the treasure, all but what she allowed to Drake, though what that was does not appear.

The Spanish ministry was informed that if Drake had been guilty of any thing irregular, he was ready to answer the law, and that the booty he had made was sequestered to make satisfaction: it was added, by Elizabeth's order, that his catholic majesty had forced her, by supporting her rebels in Ireland, to spend a greater treasure than even that which Drake had brought into England: that no treaty betwixt his catholic majesty and her subsisted, by which her subjects were excluded from trading to the West Indies; that she could not look upon that country to be the sole property of his catholic majesty, as he held it from no better title than the donation from the bishop of Rome, who having no right over those countries himself, could convey none to another, and whose authority, both in spiritual and temporal matters, she disowned; that the insignificant ceremonies which the Spaniards made use of, in taking possession of tracts of land in America, should never preclude her from sending thither colonies of her people, far less from looking upon the ocean as the property of any prince or person.

Though this was the true language which all protestant princes ought to have held during the infancy of the Spanish power in the West Indies, before it was established by prescription, or confirmed by treaties, yet Elizabeth would not venture to push that doctrine so far as to treat the Spaniards as they had treated the natives of America; she ordered a large sum of money to be restored to Seburra, a Spanish agent, who, instead of paying it to the proprietors, remitted it to the prince of Parma, in the Low Countries. But that the whole was not returned, appears from the complaints the Spaniards continued to make concerning Drake's piracy; and the court of England, which, in the manifesto it published when the Spanish ambassador was banished the kingdom, thought proper to give an answer to all the other charges brought by the Spaniards, excepting that against Drake.

Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel, died this year, in whom the surname of a noble family ended, which had been possessed of this title for above three hundred years, from Richard Fitz Allan, who, being descended from the Albineys (ancient earls of Arundel, in Suffex), in the reign of Edward I. obtained the title of earl without any creation, on account of his being possessed of the castle and lordship of Arundel. One of his daughters married Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk, by whom she had a son, named Philip, who, in right of his mother, took the title of earl of Arundel, which thus came to the Howard family.

In Ireland, Arthur, lord Grey, the deputy-governor, was so fortunate as to suppress a dangerous conspiracy raised by the O'Connors, the M'Geoghans, and the other septs, and put several of the heads to death, particularly the lord Nugent, son to the earl of Westmeath. It is said that this lord declared his innocence to the last, and that the queen was extremely offended at the lord-deputy for his precipitate cruelty; but this severity had a good effect, for it brought Turlogh Leynigh to accept conditions of peace, and the O'Briens and Cavenaghs (rebellious families in Leinster) to sue for pardon, and offer hostages for their future good behaviour.

The civil war was renewed in France in the month of February, and ended in November, by a sixth treaty of peace.

It was in the beginning of this year that Philip II. of Spain seized the throne of Portugal, vacant by the death of king Henry: don Antonio, prior of Crato, natural son to don Lewis, brother to the late king, would have disputed the crown with the king of Spain, but the forces of the two competitors being very unequal, all Antonio's endeavours were fruitless.

The great expences Elizabeth had been at, obliged her to re-assemble her parliament, on the sixteenth of January, 1581, which, after some disputes about the chusing a speaker, and filling the vacant seats, applied themselves to the national business. The puritans in the house of commons, not humbled by the checks they had received in the two former sessions, made another attempt in this, to encroach upon what the queen conceived to be her prerogative in ecclesiastical matters, and, on the twenty-first of January, Mr. Paul Wentworth making a motion for a public fast to be appointed on a certain day, it was carried by one hundred hundred and fifteen voices against one hundred. The debate seems to have turned on the power of the house of commons in this point, which was not supported by any precedent; but as there were instances of fasts having been appointed in London by orders of the privy council, it was inferred from thence that the parliament ought in reason to be supposed to have the like power. This seems to have been the chief argument whereon the resolution was founded, which, under pretence of applying to God for his blessing on their consultations and actions, was designed as a check or encroachment upon the royal prerogative; and to make the fast entirely puritanical, it was appointed on the twenty-ninth of January, which was upon a Sunday, a day which hath in all ages and in all parts of the Christian church been constantly observed as a festival.

The queen was so highly incensed at this presumption, that, on the twenty-fourth of January, she sent a message to the house by her vice-chamberlain, Hatton, "declaring her admiration at the rashness of the house in committing so evident a contempt against her express command, very lately delivered to them, in her name, by the chancellor, as to attempt and exercise such an innovation as the appointment of a fast, without her majesty's privy and pleasure first known; but was pleased to construe it as a rash, unadvised, and inconsiderate error of the house, proceeding of zeal and not of the wilful or malicious intent of the house, or of any member thereof, but imputing it to her own lenity towards a brother of the man that now made this motion, who in the last session had been for just causes reprehended and committed by the house, but graciously pardoned, and restored again by her majesty." The house hereupon made their humble submission, and kissed the rod of power Elizabeth now shook over their heads; and when Mr. Carlton rose up to speak for the privileges of the house, his mouth was stopped from the chair, for fear of giving offence to her majesty*.

The parliament then proceeded to enact some statutes for the security of the government, chiefly against the attempts of the catholics: whoever in any way reconciled any one to the church of Rome, or was himself reconciled, was declared to be guilty of treason: to say mass was punished with one year's imprisonment, and a fine of two hundred marks; the hearing it was punishable by a year's imprisonment, and a fine of one hundred marks: a fine of twenty pounds per month was imposed on every one who continued during that time absent from the service of the church of England: to utter slanderous or seditious words against the queen, was punishable, for the first offence, with the pillory and loss of ears; the second offence was declared felony. The session ended, by a prorogation, on the eighteenth of March, the commons having first granted the queen a subsidy, as did the clergy likewise.

The power of Spain was so much aggrandized by the acquisition of Portugal, that Elizabeth found stronger reasons than ever for keeping well with the French: accordingly she, this year, dispatched Walsingham as her ambassador to France, to contract a closer connection with Henry, and to conclude a league offensive and defensive against the formidable power and dangerous usurpations of the Spaniards.

The great success of the duke of Parma last year, had obliged the states of the United Provinces to send deputies to offer the sovereignty thereof to the duke of Anjou, which was to descend to his legitimate male heirs; but if he had several sons, they were to chuse one in whom it was to be vested. The treaty was made at Plessis le Tours; and the duke undertook the defence of those provinces the more willingly, because, having by his mediation procured a peace between his brother, Henry III. king of France, and the king of Navarre, the former was so well pleased with this service, that, forgetting his former enmity, he had promised to assist him in procuring a settlement to his mind, and particularly in his marriage with the queen of England.

The duke of Anjou had himself wrote to Elizabeth for a supply of money, in order to enable him to begin his operations in Flanders, and the queen, notwithstanding her great frugality, was at length persuaded to grant his request: she sent him a present of one hundred thousand crowns, by which, added to his own revenues, and the assistance of the queen-mother, he assembled an army, and took the field against the prince of Parma. He obliged that general to raise the siege of Cambray, and, after being formally elected governor of the Netherlands, he dispersed his troops into winter-quarters, and came over to England, in order to renew his addresses to the queen, in the month of November.

He met with such a gracious and favourable reception, that he began to entertain the most sanguine hopes of success, and fondly concluded that Elizabeth had now overcome all her scruples, and was finally resolved to chuse him for her husband. He was not a little confirmed in these hopes by a very extraordinary mark of affection which she gave him, at a magnificent entertainment she made on the anniversary day of her coronation; for, in sight of all her court, while the duke and she were entertaining each other apart, she pulled a ring from her own finger, and put it upon his. All the spectators imagined that in this ceremony she had given him a promise of marriage, and was even desirous of publishing her intention to all the world. Expresses immediately flew all over the kingdom, and all over Europe, with information that the match between Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou was actually concluded.

But it is more than probable that Elizabeth never had any intention to consummate what was agreed on by the articles of marriage already mentioned: such a treaty was, if ever, most necessary at the time it was set on foot, when she was so powerfully beset with inveterate and powerful enemies, daily plotting against her; and was certain if she rejected the offer, or seemed otherwise than in earnest, that the duke would have immediately accepted the daughter of the king of Spain, by which the number and power of her enemies would be increased: therefore Elizabeth ventured to play this bold stroke, and to make the brother and the son of a king the dupe of her politics, not doubting but time would furnish her with sufficient pretences to delay the consummation of her marriage till a more favourable juncture should warrant her final retractation.

This juncture seemed now to offer, and she saw herself furnished very substantial reasons for acting in this manner by the openness of the papists, who made no scruple every where to boast of the duke of Anjou's protection; and some of their priests were even so impudent as publicly to own that they were empowered to absolve every man in particular from his oath of allegiance, from which Pius V. had, by his bull, absolved the whole nation in general.

Armed with these objections, the dissembling queen knew she could break off her engagement at will; but as she was desirous to cast the blame entirely on the duke, the next care was, by acts of severity, and the rigorous execution of justice against those that hoped to be protected by him, to wean his affections, and to make him discover sufficient tokens of disgust, upon which she might more easily clear herself of any blame in the eye of the world: but finding that the duke never attempted to interpose in favour of the popish delinquents, but still continued to press with unremitting ardour the consummation of his marriage, she was obliged to throw off the mask, and declare herself openly. Besides, all her chief confidants and counsellors, Leicester, Hatton, and Walsingham, exerted their utmost endeavours to dissuade her from the projected alliance: they represented to her, that she was ready to divide her power, by which all England was obedient to her nod, and all Europe in terror of her frown, with a young man of an untried temper, of a foreign education, and of a different religion; she was to bear the discontents, the reproaches, nay the curses of her subjects, who, by this match, dreaded to see a total alteration in the religion, the laws, and the constitution of their country. Elizabeth was deeply affected with these various considerations, and she was observed to pass several nights without any sleep or repose: at length her prudence and ambition got the better of her temporal inclination (for I am apt to believe that Elizabeth, by dissembling so long and so deeply, had fooled her heart into a certain degree of tenderness for her young lover), and having sent for the duke of Anjou, she had a long conversation with him in private, wherein she informed him of the dislike her subjects had to a French prince, and which was unsurmountable: she next represented the little advantage he would reap from her alliance (she being in the forty-ninth year of her age, and not likely to have any children); the great events she apprehended it might produce, and the inconveniences that would arise from their different sentiments in point of religion; and concluded with declaring her final resolution was, "never to marry."

The duke was thunder-struck to find all his hopes dashed in the moment he expected to see the completion of them, and one of the finest crowns in Europe on his head: he flung from the queen's presence with the most visible marks of discontent and rage; he threw from his finger the deceitful ring with which she had so lately presented him; and he taxed the whole sex with levity, not without some particular imputations upon Elizabeth, and her country.

The earl of Sussex and the lord Burleigh, sworn enemies to Leicester, had been very assiduous in bringing about this match, and had been completely duped by Elizabeth's dissimulation, or variableness, by which ever name it may be called. They were struck with surprize at this sudden reverse, and omitted no efforts to give her mind another turn, more favourable to their designs: they represented to her the necessity of the match, for supporting her against the power of Spain, which singly she was not able to encounter; the danger there was, lest the young king of Scotland might be brought over entirely to the interest of France, and thereby put himself at the head of all the papists in Britain; and lastly, the probability that France would resent so much ill treatment, and that the duke of Anjou might sacrifice Elizabeth's interests to the Spanish court. Elizabeth heard all this with great temper, but yielded to the stronger reasons urged by Hatton, Walsingham, and Leicester, against the match. However, to provide against all accidents, she found means to prevent the duke from going back to the Low Countries, though the states pressed his immediate return thither, to oppose the progress of the prince of Parma, and continued to treat him with extraordinary distinctions during the three months stay he made in England.

On his departure, in February following, she accompanied him as far as Canterbury, and, after taking his promise that he would return in a short time, she ordered the earl of Leicester, and some of her chief courtiers, to wait upon him to Antwerp. By this gallant treatment the queen took off the edge of that resentment which otherwise might have been expected to follow from the court of France; or rather, the present distraction of the French monarchy secured her against the effects of that indignation, which she had reason to dread from so wanton an affront put upon that royal family.

The duke made a pompous entry into Antwerp, where he was inaugurated duke of Brabant, and afterwards invested, at Ghent, as count of Flanders. He gave free leave for the exercise of the Romish religion to as many as would swear fealty to him, and abjure the king of Spain's authority. But, after spending great sums of money, with which he was supplied from England, and finding that the titles conferred on him were at best but vain and idle, while the states and the prince of Orange held all the dominion in their own hands, he entertained the mad design of surprizing Antwerp and the chief towns in the Low Countries; in which he was unsuccessful, and thereby lost all confidence with the states, and the prince of Orange, and was shortly after banished that country, and withdrew to France.

Elizabeth, seeing no likelihood of concluding an offensive league with France, thought fit to cultivate a friendship with other potentates, who might be of use to her, in case of a rupture with Spain; and as Frederic II. king of Denmark, was a prince of great wisdom and reputation, and had always shewed himself very affectionate to her, she caused him to be chosen knight of the Garter, and sent Peregrine Bertie, lord Willoughby of Eresby, to invest him with the ensigns of the order. He politely accepted this compliment, but declined the ceremony of investiture, or to take the accustomed oath, alleging that he had already taken one, when admitted by the king of France into the order of St. Michael. The ambassador was likewise charged to remonstrate in behalf of the English merchants, against the exacting the toll or impost laid on ships that passed the Sound, and to procure that the last gelt might be remitted. This last duty owed its original to the wars between Denmark and Sweden, when the Dane began to exact, by way of loan, the thirtieth part of all kinds of merchandize, on promise of repaying the value thereof when the war was ended. No regard, however, was had to this engagement, and it was become a customary exaction. But princes seldom caring to abate any thing of their revenue, however acquired, the lord Willoughby procured no redress of these grievances: it was not adviseable to take rougher measures with a prince, whose friendship might be very serviceable to Elizabeth in forming a league with the protestant princes of the empire to oppose the ambitious designs of the king of Spain.

Though Henry III. had very little reason to be pleased with Elizabeth, yet being jealous of the increasing power of Philip, and hating the duke of Guise; he sent early in the year 1582, to inform Elizabeth, that the duke, under pretext of raising men for the service of the duke of Anjou in the Low Countries, was preparing, with the king of Spain's assistance, to embark a body of men in Normandy to be landed in England. This intelligence obliged Elizabeth to turn her thoughts seriously upon the affairs of Scotland.

There the duke of Lenox and James Stuart of Ochiltree, lately created earl of Arran, had acquired an unlimited influence over their sovereign. Lenox was not destitute of good qualities, but he was giddy and unexperienced, a professed Roman catholic, and a supposed adherent to the duke of Guise, so that he soon became odious to the nation. His colleague, Arran, was a young man, void of principle and religion, who, under the mask of friendship, encouraged Lenox to follow unpopular courses, that he might incur the hatred of the people, and so contribute to his own destruction. As for James, though he had some capacity and inclination for school-learning, he was a weak, silly, irresolute prince, and of a very despicable character, and consequently a fit subject for an ambitious and cunning favourite to work upon: in short, his two counsellors, by their arbitrary and illegal proceedings, exposed not only themselves but their master to the odium of the public. It was not the temper of the Scots to submit patiently to any kind of oppression; they no sooner felt the goad of power, than they instantly began to seek redress; and if they could not obtain it by fair and gentle means, they immediately had recourse to the most violent and desperate expedients.

Elizabeth, whom a long knowledge of that people had made perfectly acquainted with their dispositions, and who feared every thing from the duke of Guise's faction prevailing in Scotland, turned the resentment of the great men to her own advantage, and so artfully managed, that, without appearing to have any concern in the plot, king James was seized by the earls of Marr, Lindsay, and Gowry, partisans of England; the duke of Lenox, his bosom-friend, was obliged to flee into France, and the earl of Arran, his other favourite, was also taken and detained prisoner by the conspirators; by which it was thought the interests of Elizabeth's enemies were entirely destroyed.

In the mean time a new treaty was pretended to be begun by the English council, for the enlargement both of queen Mary and her son; but the articles tendered to the captive queen on this occasion, were couched in such ambiguous terms as, it must be confessed, there does not appear in them any more sincerity or intention to bring that affair to an issue, than in the preceding negotiations. However, this proposal from Elizabeth served her purpose to free herself from the perpetual solicitations in Mary's favour, and to check the continual plots hatched for her deliverance. It was not without reason that this unhappy princess had filled all the courts of Europe with complaints of the hardships she underwent: she had been confined thirteen years, under different keepers, and often treated in the most rigorous manner; she saw herself deprived of her crown and liberty, her youth had pined away in dreary confinement, her reputation had been blasted by the venomous breath of malice and defamation, her life was in the power of a jealous rival, who could brook no competition, her health was impaired by confinement and vexation, yet she was denied almost every comfort that could help to alleviate such distress, nay she was even denied the decent conveniency of having female servants to attend her*.

But James being permitted to meet an assembly of his nobles at St. Andrew's, in the following year, 1583, and by seeming to be contented under the government of his new ministry, having obtained his full liberty, Elizabeth saw all her politics on the point of being overthrown by the restoration of the earl of Arran about the royal person; who regained such an ascendant over his sovereign, that he prevailed with him to declare the noblemen who had surprized him, traitors, unless they would own themselves guilty by making submissions and taking out pardons: this they did not think it safe to do, but retired into foreign countries, all but Gowry who was pardoned, and the earl of Angus, who was confined.

In this state were matters at the Scottish court, when Wallingham, though now sickly and aged, was sent thither by Elizabeth as the most proper person to deal with James, and those in power about him; and this minister executed his commission so well, that he found means to win over Arran, and to secure his interest in his royal master, which proved of no small service to Elizabeth, as that enterprising nobleman would certainly have cut her out more work in that part of the island than she could have been well able to manage, as appeared by several letters which were, about this time, discovered, containing, amongst other treasonable matters, earnest exhortations to several of the ladies immediately about her person, to serve her in the same manner as Judith did Holofernes; and giving certain advice of Philip II's intention to assist the duke of Guise in a descent upon England, in order to revenge the losses the crown of Spain had sustained by the late expedition of sir Francis Drake.

These letters appeared to have been written by one Francis Throgmorton, a young man of a good family and pregnant parts, who, being apprehended and brought before the council, at first absolutely denied the accusation; but being shewn a list of all the ports in England that were convenient to land forces at, and another list of all the gentlemen that professed the Romish religion in England, and were inclinable to countenance the proposed invasion, all which papers had been found in his scrutoire, or desk, he then made the following confession, "That going some few years since to the Spa, he conferred several times with Jeney and sir Francis Inglefield, two English fugitives, how England might be invaded; and that they had for that purpose drawn up the two lists just spoken of: that after his return, Morgan, another fugitive in France, told him, the catholic princes had formed a design to free the queen of Scots, and to employ the duke of Guise for that purpose: that nothing was wanting, but to know what succours might be depended upon from the English catholics: that in order to take their measures the better, Charles Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mope, was sent into Suffex, where the duke of Guise intended to land: that he (Throgmorton) imparted the project to the Spanish ambassador, who had been already informed of it, and shewed him the ports where it would be most proper to land: that he moreover acquainted the same ambassador with the names of the great men to whom he might freely open his mind, because, as he was a public person, he would not be so narrowly watched: finally, that he conferred with him how to raise soldiers privately in England, to have them ready when the foreign troops should arrive."

Throgmorton, after this confession, lay some months in prison, but being at length brought to his trial, he was found guilty by his jury, of holding treasonable correspondence with the queen's enemies, and received sentence of death. We learn however from Camden, that when he was brought to Tyburn, he retracted what he had confessed.

Before we take our leave of this year, we are to mention, that Elizabeth's fame was so great as to induce John, king of Sweden, to send a noble embassy to her, intreating her mediation between him and John Basilowitz, emperor of Muscovy, which she willingly undertook, and sir Jerome Bowes was sent her ambassador to Muscovy, who procured a peace for the king of Sweden upon very reasonable conditions. But the emperor of Muscovy dying soon after, and being succeeded by his son Theodore Iwanowitz, this latter granted liberty of free traffic to merchants of all nations, without distinction. Hereupon Elizabeth pressed him to adhere to the treaty between his late father and the crown of England, by which the English subjects were indulged with the exclusive right of trading to his country; but the new emperor returned for answer, that he would never suffer a small company of men to exercise a monopoly in his dominions, to the restraining of every other free trading nation; however, he promised to exact but one half of the usual customs of the English, on account of their having been the first who opened a way to trade with Russia.

This year proved fatal to divers great men, for there died, first, Thomas Radcliffe, the third earl of Suffex of this family, lord-chamberlain to the queen, on the twenty-ninth of June, and was buried at Newhall, in Essex. Also, on the sixth of July, died Edmund Grindal, archbishop of Canterbury, and was succeeded by Dr. John Whitgift: and, in the month of August, died Henry Wriothesly, earl of Southampton, one exceedingly devoted to the Romish religion, which cost him Elizabeth's displeasure and a long imprisonment. This year was also distinguished by the fate of that brave, but unfortunate seaman, sir Humphrey Gilbert, who was cast away at sea on the ninth of September, in his return from the coast of North America, where he had taken possession, in Elizabeth's name, of the harbour of St. John's, in the island of Newfoundland.

In Ireland the famous rebel Gerald Fitz Gerald, the eleventh earl of Desmond of his family, after having a long time, in lurking places, escaped the English, was now, by a common soldier, found in a poor cottage, and slain: his head was sent into England, and set upon London bridge. Such was the end of this nobleman, who had for many years carried on a rebellion against all the forces that the several English lord-deputies could raise against him: he was descended from Maurice, the son of Gerald de Windleshore, or Windsor, an Englishman, famous amongst those who first accompanied Henry III. in the expedition into Ireland, in the year 1170.

Sir John Perot being sent over lord-deputy of Ireland, held a parliament, in which the estates of these and other rebels were forfeited; and the queen granting the earl of Ormond, (who, being the eldest son of Desmond's sister, was his next heir, and had been the principal means of reducing him) some part of his lands, sold the rest at very easy rates to adventurers, that undertook to plant and improve the country. Sales were made of entire baronies, into which the Irish counceits are divided, as the English are into hundreds, and the purchasers, under colour of their general grants, sweeping all within their districts, turned the innocent Irish as well as the guilty out of their possessions. The queen endeavoured to repress this rapaciousness, by a proclamation, of which the injured proprietors, by an instance of good fortune rare in that country, reaped the benefit; the deputy, a man of rigid justice and inflexible integrity, taking care to see it duly executed. No governor in that realm was ever more diligent, vigorous, and impartial in doing right equally to the Irish and the English, which raised him abundance of enemies among the latter, who could not bear being restrained from oppressing the former; but by this means he soon brought Munster into a state of tranquility; nor was he less successful in rendering the native Irish and Highland Scots in Ulster to obedience, forcing them to swear allegiance, and to hold their lands of her in vassalage, paying yearly a certain number of beeves and hawks, in lieu of rent, and engaging to supply her, in case of an expedition, with their several proportions of horse and foot soldiers, according to the custom of ancient tenures*.

In France, Henry III. behaved in such a manner, that he daily incurred the contempt of his subjects. In public he affected an over-strained devotion, whilst in private he plunged himself into the most criminal pleasures. Philip, taking advantage of Henry's indolence with regard to his most important affairs, strove by all sorts of ways to raise him troubles, which would hinder him from taking upon him the defence of the Netherlands, who shewed a strong inclination to put themselves under the dominion of France. He tried first to persuade the king of Navarre to take up arms, promising to aid and protect the Huguenots. This way failing, he applied to the duke of Guise, who accepted the succours offered by Philip, to revenge the mortification he daily received from the king's minions.

Mendoza, the Spanish minister, was so deeply involved in by the discoveries made by Throgmorton, that Elizabeth considered him as the most dangerous enemy she had in England; nor was there any thing bloody or desperate undertaken against her, which she did not lay at his door, and in particular a conspiracy which had been contrived, and was on the point of taking effect, against the queen's life, by the papists, who were now worked up to such a degree of enthusiasm against Elizabeth, that John Somerville, a gentleman of Warwickshire, undertook a journey to London, on purpose to put the queen to death with his own hand, and actually attacked with his sword some of her attendants. Being secured, he confessed his intention, and named his accomplices, who were all tried and found guilty of high-treason, at Guildhall in London. These, and other the like alarming practices of the popish faction, made Elizabeth think it was high time to order Mendoza to leave England, for which she had a very plausible reason in the conviction of Throgmorton.

Accordingly, towards the latter end of January, 1584, the ambassador was summoned to appear before the English council, who charged him very home with Throgmorton's confession, and the great hand he had in the conspiracy against England. Mendoza boldly stood upon his justification, and even accused Elizabeth of being the aggressor, by committing hostilities against his master by sea, and her ministers of labouring incessantly to sow discord between England and Spain. This behaviour of Mendoza exasperated Elizabeth so much, that he ordered him instantly to leave her dominions, which he did, and retired to France. Upon his departure the government thought proper, for the satisfaction of foreign courts, that a manifesto should be drawn up, containing Mendoza's case, and an answer to the recriminations he had brought *. At the same time sir William Wade, clerk of the council, was dispatched to the court of Spain, to inform Philip of what had passed, and of his mistress's willingness to receive another ambassador from him; but the haughty Spaniard refused Wade an audience, who thereupon returned back, without imparting the contents of his embassy to any one at that court.

New overtures were, in the summer of this year, made by Mary concerning her liberty, and were such as seemingly very well satisfied Elizabeth: poor Mary promised, if she was set at liberty, not only to depend entirely upon Elizabeth, but to deal with her son for restoring the exiled lords of the English faction; to order her ministers abroad to forbear all practices against Elizabeth's person and dignity; and farther, that Elizabeth should have the honour to publish the association of her son with herself in the government. These preliminaries served as the foundation of many conferences, but Mary still declined to discover any particulars of the duke of Guise's purposed invasion before she was restored to liberty: and a fresh discovery of the intrigues of the Jesuits once more defeated these promising appearances.

One Creighton, a Scotchman, of that order, had been employed by Mary to solicit twelve thousand ducats, which had been promised her by the court of Rome. Creighton, on his return, happened to fall into the hands of a Dutch privateer, and attempted to tear his papers and throw them overboard; but the wind driving them back into the ship, they were sent with Creighton to England, and being pinned together, Walsingham discovered some part of his commission, by which it appeared that he had in charge to inform the malecontents of both kingdom, that the pope, Philip of Spain, and the Guises, had confederated to exert their utmost power to dethrone Elizabeth, and utterly to disinherit the king of Scotland from the succession to the crown of England, as an open favourer of the reformed religion: to marry the captive queen to some catholic nobleman of England, and to engage the catholics to chuse him, so married, king of England, to be confirmed by the pope; and to cause the children to be born of that marriage to be declared the rightful successors to the crown and kingdom of England.

These and other discoveries, together with the officiousness of the English papists and the malice of the Scottish puritans, rendered Mary extremely obnoxious to Elizabeth, who could not but think her life in danger so long as Mary lived, or at least lived with any tolerable degree of freedom; and she took a secret umbrage at the earl of Shrewsbury, or his countess, or both, for allowing the captive princess so large a correspondence as they did, and resolved to remove her out of their custody; therefore Mary sent her secretary, Nau, with fresh proposals to Elizabeth, in order to regain her liberty, which, however advantageous, were slighted, and served only to heighten the suspicions entertained against her; and she was taken from under the custody of the earl of Shrewsbury, and committed to the care of sir Amias Pawlet and sir Drue Drury, the first her professed enemy, and the latter a close, watchful, cunning puritan.

At the same time an association was formed by the earl of Leicester, and other courtiers; and as Elizabeth was extremely popular with all her subjects, except the most zealous catholics, men of every rank and condition willingly flocked to the subscription of it.

The associators bound themselves "to defend the queen against all her enemies; to revenge her death, or any injury offered to her majesty; and to exclude from the throne any person, whatever title they possessed, at whose instigation, or for whose behoof, any attempt should be made against the life and authority of Elizabeth." The queen of Scots was sensible, that the association was levelled against her; and, in order to free herself from all suspicion, she likewise begged leave to be one of the subscribers.

On the twenty-third of November Elizabeth summoned a new parliament; and the members discovered the most zealous attachment to her person and government. They ratified and confirmed the association; and they subjoined a clause, empowering the queen to appoint commissioners for the trial of any pretender to the crown, who should attempt or imagine any invasion, insurrection, or assassination against the queen: upon sentence, given by these commissioners, the delinquent was deprived of all right to the succession, and was farther liable to such punishment as her majesty should think proper to inflict. And for the greater security, in case of the queen's violent death, a council of regency was named to punish the authors of that barbarous deed, to conduct the administration of public affairs, and to settle the succession of the crown.

At the same time, in order to strengthen the hands of her majesty, the parliament granted her a supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths. They likewise passed a severe law against Jesuits and popish priests, importing, "that they should leave the kingdom within forty days; that those who should tarry behind that time, or should afterwards return, should be punished as traitors; that those who harboured or assisted them, should be guilty of felony; that those who were educated in foreign seminaries, if they returned not in six months after notice given, and submitted not themselves to the queen, before a bishop or two justices, should be guilty of high-treason: and if any one, so submitting themselves, should, within ten years, approach the queen's person, or come within ten miles of the court, their submission should be void and of no effect.

This law, however rigorous in appearance, was absolutely necessary for the safety of the queen's person, which, even with all these precautions, was constantly exposed to the most imminent danger, from the secret plots or open attempts of the bigotted Romanists.

The state of affairs in Scotland this year continued to be very disagreeable to Elizabeth: she had learned that the earl of Arran, who now had an entire ascendancy over James, had brought him to consent to a marriage with a daughter of France; in order, therefore, to prevent the mischiefs which might happen from that quarter, she sent secretary Davison into Scotland, under colour of excusing her protection of certain Scottish fugitives, though the king had demanded them by virtue of the treaty of alliance concluded between the two kingdoms; but Davison's business was to complete the work which Walsingham had begun, namely, to win the earl of Arran over to the queen's interest. This minister succeeded perfectly well in his commission, and, by means that are easy to be guessed, prevailed with him to act nothing but in concert with Elizabeth.

Before his return to England, it was agreed between the two courts, that the lord Hunsdon for England, and the earl of Arran for Scotland, should meet upon the borders, and make a regulation proper to preserve a good understanding between the two kingdoms. Under this pretence these two lords conferred together, and, before they parted, made a private treaty, whereby the earl of Arran engaged to keep the king unmarried for three years: Elizabeth pretended she designed to give him a princess of the blood royal of England, who was not yet marriageable: this was at least the pretence with which the treaty was coloured.

Whilst these things were transacting, the master of Gray, a young Scottish lord, insinuated himself so far into king James's favour, that the earl of Arran, growing jealous, found means to remove him by causing him to be sent ambassador to Elizabeth. Gray was no sooner in England, but the queen won him by caresses and bounties: from that time the ambassador feigned to be strongly attached to queen Mary's interest, and by that means drew secrets from her, which Elizabeth knew how to improve. The earl of Arran having some intelligence of the intrigue, informed the king of it, in order to ruin his rival; but as in all likelihood he could bring no proof of what he advanced, Gray being returned to Scotland, was very well received by the king, and spared no pains in his turn to ruin the favourite.

As for the unfortunate Mary, she still continued under the most rigorous confinement, and every method was used that was thought most likely to drive her to despair, or, perhaps, provoke her to take some rash measures, which would furnish her enemies with a sufficient handle for her destruction. The earl of Leicester, being baffled in his expectation by her temper and resignation, is said to have hired ruffians to murder this forlorn princess; but Drury was a man of too much honour to admit them into her presence: nevertheless, she endured the most barbarous treatment; she was now deprived of the conveniences she hitherto enjoyed; she was prohibited giving alms to the poor; she was confined to two wretched chambers, in such decay that they could not screen her from the inclemencies of the weather, so that she was seized with rheumatic disorders, by which her life was endangered; and though she appealed to queen Elizabeth for redress, the winter was far advanced before she was removed to Chartley castle.

This year died, in exile and misery, on account of his rebellion in the North in the year 1569, Charles Neville, the last earl of Westmoreland of this family; a house from whence were descended many noble personages, viz. six earls of Westmoreland, two earls of Salisbury and Warwick, an earl of Kent, a marquis of Mountacute, a duke of Bedford, baron Ferrers of Osley, the lord Latimer, the lord Abergavenny, one queen, five duchesses, an archbishop of York, and many others.

It was in this year also that the valiant and learned sir Walter Raleigh discovered that part of North America which he afterwards called Virginia, in honour of his virgin mistress, queen Elizabeth*.

The

* The situation of this colony is remarkably happy and convenient, having the river Potowmack on the north-east, which separates it from Maryland; the Atlantic Ocean on the east; Carolina on the south; and the Apalachian mountains on the west, which divides it from a vast tract of land called Louisiana. Its extent is from latitude $36^{\circ} 30'$, to $39^{\circ} 30'$ north, on the west side of the bay; but on the east side it extends only from cape Charles in latitude $37^{\circ} 13'$, to latitude 38° . Its breadth, so far as it is planted, is about one hundred miles; but it hath no bounds to the westward. The air of this country depends very much upon the winds: the north and north-west are either very sharp and piercing, or boisterous and stormy; and the south-east and south, hazy and sultry. The winter is dry and clear; snow falls in great quantities, but seldom lies above a day or two: and the frosts, though quick and sharp, seldom last as long. The spring is somewhat earlier than ours: May and June are very pleasant months; July and August, sultry hot; September is noted for prodigious showers of rain. The soil is low towards the sea-coasts; and for an hundred miles up into the country hardly a hill or a stone are to be met

The prince of Parma continued to gain ground upon the confederate provinces of the Low Countries, which sustained an irreparable loss by the death of the prince of Orange, who was treacherously shot by one Balthazar Gerard, a Burgundian. His eldest son, Philip, being in the hands of the king of Spain, and bred in the Roman catholic religion, the states conferred the government of Holland and Zealand upon his second son, Maurice, though he was but eighteen years of age; and the prince of Parma, taking notice of their consternation, invested Antwerp. In this distressed condition they offered to acknowledge the sovereignty of the French; but Henry being too much embarrassed in his own affairs to accept an offer that would engage him in farther trouble and expence, they had recourse to the queen of England, who likewise declined their offer, though she promised to assist them in maintaining the war against their oppressors.

In the mean time the duke of Anjou dying, and the king of France having no children, the duke of Guise, taking advantage of the bigotry of the people, and their aversion to the king of Navarre, then apparent heir to the crown, on account of his being a protestant, was contriving and caballing with all his power, under the name of religion, to secure the succession to himself in case of a demise. With this view he entered into a league with Philip II. of Spain, who, covering his real design under the same religious mask, kindled a flame in France which consumed that kingdom, and hindered the French from thinking of the acquisition of the Netherlands. Henry III. having the last year been chosen into the order of the Garter, queen Elizabeth sent this year the earl of Derby to France, to invest him with the robes and ensigns of the order.

In the beginning of the year 1585, Elizabeth discovered a conspiracy to take away her life, of which one Parry was the author. He was a gentleman of Wales, and a member of the house of commons, and one greatly indebted to the queen for giving him his life, after condemnation for breaking into the chamber of Hugh Hare and wounding him: he had also been her sworn servant for several years before that time; but was now so spirited up by the solicitations and traitorous arguments of cardinal Allen, Benedict Palafius Campegius, the pope's nuncio at Venice, and others, confirmed with the encouragement of Ragazonius, the pope's nuncio in France, and letters from the cardinal Cosmo, wherein the attempt was commended, and Parry was absolved in the pope's name, that he was wrought upon, and agreed with one Edward Neville, a discontented relation to the earl of Westmoreland, to kill the queen as she rode abroad to take the air as usual.

Neville discovered this plot and bloody attempt, in hopes, as supposed, to secure an interest in the title of lord Latimer, as next male heir to the earl of Westmoreland, the news of whose death arrived about the beginning of this year: and Parry confessed it fully upon his examination before three privy counsellors, the lord Hunsdon, sir Christopher Hatton, and sir Francis Walsingham; and by letters to the queen herself, the lord-treasurer, and to the earl of Leicester, he acknowledged his crime, and interceded for pardon. A few days after he was brought to judgment in Westminster-hall, where he pleaded guilty, and declared that his confession was free and not extorted; yet denied his having been resolved at any time to kill the queen: and, after some pause, being urged to speak if he had any thing to say why judgment should not pass upon him, he, with great perturbation, as one agitated with a bad conscience, added, "I see I must die, because I was not resolved." At the gallows he boasted much of his having been a faithful keeper of the queen, because he had not killed her; and he was hanged in Palace-yard, Westminster, while both houses of parliament were sitting in the hall, which met by prorogation in March this year, and was their fourth session.

These desperate proceedings against the queen's person were productive of several very severe resolutions of the parliament, for her safety, against popish priests and Jesuits; but not all the vigour or watchfulness of the government was able to restrain the plottings of those zealots, as we shall have occasion to remark hereafter.

On the nineteenth of April this year, the province of Utrecht, and, on the fifteenth of May thereafter, the province of Guelderland, by their deputies, presented formal petitions to Elizabeth, to take them under her protection; and by the sixteenth of June, their example was followed by all the other provinces. Elizabeth's counsellors were greatly divided with regard to the conduct which she ought to observe in this delicate and critical juncture: some of them advised her to accept the proposal of the states; others persuaded her, not only to reject it, but refuse them all assistance; and each party endeavoured to support their opinion by many plausible arguments. Elizabeth foresaw the dangerous consequences attending either extreme, and she therefore resolved to steer a middle course. She was determined not to behold patiently the met with. Here are trees of various kinds, and of an incredible magnitude, with plenty of pasture-grounds. The land in general is as good as in England, producing rice, hemp, and Indian corn; also flax, silk-cotton, silk-grass, and wild grapes: but in Virginia they are so extremely addicted to their staple commodity, tobacco, that they hardly mind any thing else, so they can bring that plant to a tolerable market. This trade is brought to such perfection, that the Virginia tobacco, especially the sweet-scented, which grows on York-river, is reckoned to be the best in the world, and generally vended in England for home consumption. The other sort, called Oranoe, turns to as good an account, being sent to Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Germany. In this province are fifty-four parishes, of which thirty or forty are supplied with ministers. In each parish is a church, and in those of large extent are chapels of ease. The ministers maintenance is settled at sixteen hundred pounds of tobacco yearly, besides perquisites. There are only two presbyterian and three quakers meetings in this colony. At Middle Plantation Row, called Williamsburg, is a college. Though the common way of traffic here is by barter of one commodity for another, or of any for tobacco, yet they have some silver coin, both English and Spanish. In Virginia, when any person is disabled from working, either by age or sickness, he is placed in some planter's house, and supported at the public expence. Such is the hospitality of the Virginian planters, that a stranger will be entertained at any of their houses, so that inns on the road are unnecessary. It is but very lately that they have begun to build forts, their main dependence being on a well regulated militia by land, and the cruizers sent from England by sea. Though they have plenty of excellent timber and naval stores, and the whole country one grand harbour, after entering Chesapeake bay, between cape Charles and cape Henry, yet they build no ships. In Virginia are few towns; the chief are James Town and Williamsburgh above mentioned, the planters residing on their estates or farms, most of which lie contiguous to some great river, so that ships can come up almost to their doors, and take in their tobacco. System of Geogr.

total ruin of the revolted provinces, whose interest she considered as intimately connected with her own; but, sensible that the acceptance of their sovereignty would oblige her to exert her whole force in their defence, and excite the jealousy of her neighbours, and perhaps expose her to the reproach of ambition and usurpation, she prudently declined this offer.

She engaged, however, in a league with the states, on the following terms; that she should assist them with an army of five thousand foot and a thousand horse, at her own expence, during the war; that the general, and two others whom she should name, should have seats in the council of the states; that no peace or treaty should be made but by common consent; that immediately after the conclusion of the war, she should be reimbursed for her charges; and that in the mean time the towns of Flushing and the Brill, with the castle of Rammekins, should be put into her hands, by way of security.

The prince of Condé also, in behalf of the French Huguenots, was favoured with a supply of fifty thousand crowns and ten ships of war, with which he was enabled to raise the blockade of Rochelle, and to take the field with his land forces, which the duke of Guise had shut up in this port.

On the twenty-third of October the earl of Leicester was sent over to Holland at the head of the English auxiliaries. He was attended by a splendid retinue, composed of the young earl of Essex, his son-in-law, the lords Audley and North, sir William Russell, sir Thomas Shirley, sir Arthur Basset, sir Walter Waller, sir Gervase Clifton, and a select troop of five hundred gentlemen. He was met at his arrival at Flushing by his nephew, sir Philip Sidney, the governor: and every town through which he passed, discovered their joy by acclamations and triumphal arches, as if his presence and the queen's assistance had saved them from impending ruin.

The states, desirous of securing the friendship of Elizabeth, and knowing the influence which Leicester had with her, honoured him with the title of Governor and Captain-general of the United Provinces, assigned him a guard to attend his person, and treated him in some measure as their sovereign. But this step produced a contrary effect to what they intended: the queen was equally displeased at the artifice of the states and the vanity of Leicester; she reprimanded both of them very sharply by letters, and it was not without great difficulty that, after many humble submissions, they were able to regain her favour.

As Elizabeth could expect no otherwise than that Philip of Spain would look upon the aid sent to his rebellious subjects in the Low Countries, to be a breach of the alliance between the two crowns, and a declaration of war against him, she very politically determined to strike a blow, that might at once procure her respect and advantage. Accordingly she dispatched a fleet of twenty-one sail, under the command of sir Francis Drake, with two thousand three hundred land forces, under the conduct of Christopher Carlisle, to attack the Spanish settlements in America, which were considered as the chief source of Philip's power, as well as the most defenceless part of his dominions. The appearance of the English being altogether unexpected there, they, without any resistance, made themselves masters of St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verd islands; made a descent upon St. Domingo, or Hispaniola, and took its capital; then ran down along the continent and reduced Carthagena, and burnt the towns of St. Antonio and St. Helena, in Florida; and were meditating other expeditions, had they not been separated by violent storms, which prevented the fleet from joining till they met in England. In this expedition the English lost seven hundred men, but brought home such an immense booty, as sufficiently rewarded the others for their sufferings, and with such accounts of the Spanish weakness in those quarters as greatly contributed to animate the nation to future enterprizes of the like nature. It is commonly supposed that the use of tobacco was first introduced into England by Drake's fleet.

In the course of this year also John Davis finished his third voyage in quest of a north-west passage to the East Indies. He discovered the streight which bears his name, and sailed beyond the eighty-third degree of northern latitude, but was obliged to return without success.

The very rigorous laws which the late parliament had enacted against the papists, made Philip, earl of Arundel, son of the late duke of Norfolk, who was zealously attached to that religion, resolve to retire to another country, where he could enjoy his faith in quiet. This nobleman had been twice examined before the council, and confined to his own house, on suspicion of practising against the government; and his intended departure being now betrayed by a servant, he was sent prisoner to the Tower, which was at this time the scene of a remarkable transaction.

Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland, brother of him who had been beheaded, being accused of having some share in Throgmorton's conspiracy, and of having corresponded with lord Paget and the duke of Guise, was committed to the Tower, where, either conscious of his guilt, or foreseeing that evidence would be suborned for his destruction, he, in order to disappoint Elizabeth of his forfeiture, and to retain his fortune in the family, shot himself in the breast with a pistol.

Pope Gregory dying in April this year, was succeeded by the cardinal de Montalto, who took the name of Sixtus V. He immediately fulminated the censures of the church against the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, not only as relapsed heretics, but as persons of spurious birth: hence it was easy to see how much the court of Rome countenanced the designs of the duke of Guise, and what reasons Elizabeth had to dread that duke's becoming one day king of France, and being supported by the pope and Spain.

Such being the state of affairs in France, and Elizabeth knowing that the party of the Guises were continually stirring up the embers of sedition both in Scotland and England, she thought it highly necessary to strengthen herself by some powerful alliances. With this view she sent sir Thomas Bodley, the great patron of learning, to negociate with the king of Denmark, and other northern states; and Edward Wootton, a fine gentleman, and one who had equally a turn for business, for pleasure, and politeness, was dispatched to the court of Scotland, to assure James how sincerely she was in his interest, and to endeavour by any means to draw him into a league of mutual offence and defence, and withal to recommend to that monarch a match with the daughter of the king of Denmark: but Wootton, under the pretence of entertaining and diverting the young king, endeavoured to remove from his royal presence all who were suspected of being averse to Elizabeth's intentions; to sow factions in his court; and, when opportunity served, to seize his person, and carry him by force into England. But the conspiracy was discovered before it could be carried into execution, and Wootton fled hastily from Scotland, without taking leave of the court. However, James soon after was obliged to submit to Elizabeth's creatures: the Scottish fugitive lords, returning well supported from England, made themselves masters of his person by surprise, in the castle of Stirling, and obliged him to pass an act of indemnity for all offences committed against him by any persons whatever since his being declared king; and soon after to enter into a league offensive and defensive with the queen of England. The earl of Arran, James's favourite and first minister, finding his affairs for the present entirely ruined, and his life itself in jeopardy, fled over to France.

In Ireland, this year, the Burghs raised two successive insurrections, but were reduced by sir John Perot, the lord-deputy, reinforced by the earl of Clanrickard, who not only compelled them to give fresh hostages, but destroyed their allies the Hebridian Scots, three thousand of whom were cut in pieces at Arvadar; so that their countrymen were deterred from prosecuting such adventures, and Ireland for some time remained in tranquility.

The earl of Leicester, notwithstanding the pretended displeasure of Elizabeth at his having accepted the title of Governor and Captain-general of the United Provinces, which vested him with an almost universal power, proceeded in the exercise of his new authority. His first military service in the Low Countries was an attempt to raise the siege of Grave, in Brabant, which had been formed by count Mansfeldt, a general in the prince of Parma's service, in the spring of 1586, in which Leicester miscarried, the town being yielded up by its governor, Peter Van Hement, who, for this act of cowardice, was, by Leicester's orders, punished with death.

After the reduction of Grave, the prince of Parma bent all his force, which consisted of twenty thousand foot and six thousand horse, to take Venlo, which he likewise reduced, after a most gallant defence on the part of the besieged, under the command of colonel Skenke, the governor, who, with sir Robert Williams, a Welsh officer, signalled themselves greatly on this occasion. On the other hand, the lord Willoughby of Eresby, governor of Bergen op Zoom, cut off a large convoy of provisions belonging to the enemy; and sir Philip Sidney, with count Maurice, surprized the town of Axel, in Flanders. The next expedition of the prince of Parma was against Rheinberg: this place was garrisoned by twelve hundred English, under colonel Morgan. Leicester thought this a place of too much importance to be neglected, and therefore, by way of diversion, made dispositions for attacking Zutphen, a town of the greatest consequence to the enemy: this had the proposed effect; the prince of Parma immediately abandoned the siege of Rheinberg, and advanced to give the earl of Leicester battle before Zutphen, when, after a bloody dispute, the English were obliged to retreat.

In this action our country suffered irreparable loss, by the death of sir Philip Sidney, who was mortally wounded in the thigh. This gentleman, though not quite thirty-five years of age when he died, was at once the delight and ornament of the English court; and as all his influence with the queen and the earl of Leicester was wholly employed in the encouragement of genius and literature, his name has been immortalized by the writings as well of cotemporaries as of succeeding authors. Nor was his fame confined to England alone; the king of Scotland, charmed with the virtues of this young hero, celebrated his memory in a copy of Latin verses which he composed on occasion of his death.

Notwithstanding the extraordinary joy the states had discovered on the arrival of Leicester, they soon found that his abilities were by no means equal to the task with which he was entrusted; and his excessive pride and ambition soon bred an universal discontent against him, insomuch that, after an insignificant campaign, he sent his forces into winter-quarters, and coming himself to the Hague, found a very different reception from the states to what they had given him before: the members did not hesitate to charge him with abusing the public money, with the neglect of discipline, and with many other oppressive exercises of his power, inconsistent with the liberties of that country. Upon this the earl thought proper to leave the Low Countries and return to England, where he arrived in the month of December. And thus stood the state of affairs in the Low Countries this year: we are now to attend those of England, where all was in confusion.

Every day brought Elizabeth fresh intelligence of the king of Spain's schemes against her person and crown; one amongst many others was a new-pretended claim to the succession of the kingdom of England, which Camden says the Jesuits about this time forged for the Spaniard in his own right, and to that end sent into England one Chamier, a priest of their own society, to engage the popish noblemen and gentry in their party. If Elizabeth was alarmed at these intelligences, she was still more so by the discovery of a plot which was laid against her life.

The spirit of deposing and murdering princes upon papal bulls and excommunications had arrived to an incredible height in the English seminaries abroad. The brain of one John Savage had been fired to such a degree by that doctrine, that he solemnly devoted himself to murder Elizabeth; and one Ballard, a priest, being sent over from the seminary at Rheims to England, in order to propagate the king-killing principles lately set on foot, and being encouraged by Mendoza, the late Spanish ambassador in England, but now residing in France, he found means to corrupt one Anthony Babington, a young gentleman of good fortune in Derbyshire, with several more, to join Savage in the execution of his vow. In the mean time the papists, in order to carry on their plot with less suspicion, and to lull the watchful council of the English cabinet into fatal security, published several hypocritical writings, in which they professed the highest regard for Elizabeth's person and government, admonishing the people of their persuasion not to engage in any practices against the state, but to confine themselves to such weapons as are alone lawful for Christians to use, such as tears, spiritual spiritual armour, daily prayers, fastings, and the like.

Nevertheless the watchful Walsingham had his spies on all their actions; and one Maud, a man of impenetrable dissimulation, who mingled in all their counsels, by Walsingham's orders, had so insinuated himself into the good opinion of Ballard, that this latter took him in company with him back to France, and made him privy to all his proceedings; and by him and Gilbert Gifford, a priest of the Rheinish seminary, who was intrusted with the conveyance of all the literary correspondence, Walsingham had every part of the conspiracy regularly communicated to him.

Ballard having, as he thought, settled all matters upon a sure footing, for the perpetration of his villainous purpose, returned to England, about Whitsuntide, in a military dress, and with the assumed name of captain Foscue, to assist in the final execution of it, and with him brought his new-made convert, Anthony Babington above-mentioned. This young gentleman was a zealous papist, of a violent spirit, and of parts and knowledge above his years: he had, in his travels through France, some years before, contracted an intimacy with Thomas Morgan, a fugitive rebel and a pensioner of the queen of Scots, who had introduced him to the bishop of Glasgow, Mary's ambassador at that court, upon whose recommendation young Babington gained a confidence with the captive princess, inasmuch that, during her being in the custody of the earl of Shrewsbury, he had managed her correspondence at certain times with her foreign friends. Upon her being removed to the custody of sir Amias Pawlet, the connection dropped, and Babington had therewith dropped all farther thoughts of Mary or her concerns; but the wicked workings of Ballard had quickly rekindled all Babington's zeal for her service, and he not only readily joined as one in the execution of the intended assassination, but also planned out a new scheme of an invasion, and was himself to be one of an hundred gentlemen who were to deliver the queen of Scots from her imprisonment. He then wrote to Mary, giving an account of all that had passed between Ballard and him, and insisting with that queen, that the gentlemen who were engaged in her service, should be assured of a reward suitable to their merits, with other stipulations of no great moment to be inserted here. This letter of Babington's, which was written in the usual cypher which had passed between him and Mary, was so agreeable to the latter, that she failed not to answer it in the same cypher, on the twenty-seventh of July, desiring that the conspirators would be extremely cautious, lest they should precipitate matters before the return of their English friends from abroad, before they were assured of foreign succour, and before some disturbances were raised in Ireland: at the same time she pointed out the most ready methods for her own deliverance, viz. either by overturning a cart in the gate-way of the house where she was kept, setting the stables on fire, or carrying her away as she rode abroad to take an airing in the fields between Chartley and Stafford. These letters were afterwards produced in evidence against Mary upon her trial, and made the very foundation of the judgment passed upon this princess, as we shall see hereafter.

In the mean time Walsingham made use of a new artifice, in order to discover the bottom of the plot; he added to a letter of Mary's, delivered to him by his trusty agent Maud, a postscript in the same cypher, in which he made her desire Babington to send her the names of the conspirators. This scheme succeeded according to the statesman's wish, and he quickly learned that Savage, already mentioned; Charles Tilney, a man of family, one of Elizabeth's band of pensioners; John Charnock, a Lancashireman; Edward Abingdon, whose father had been cofferer to Elizabeth; Chidcock Tichburn, a gentleman of Southampton; and one Barnwell, a person of quality in Ireland, were the six engaged by oath to assassinate the queen. At the same time the ridiculous vanity of Babington furnished Walsingham with still another means of discovery, as well as of defence: that gentleman had caused a picture to be drawn, where he himself was represented standing amidst the six assassins, and a motto added, implying that they were jointly embarked in some hazardous enterprize. A copy of this picture was carried to Walsingham by one Polly, another of his spies, who had wormed himself into Babington's confidence, and by Walsingham shewn to the queen, that she might know the assassins, and be upon her guard if any of them should attempt to approach her person.

Thus the conspirators were, unknown to themselves, within inextricable toils; and indeed it required all Walsingham's sagacity to counter-work Babington's cunning; for, perceiving that the design was likely to stick at the want of foreign force, he betook himself to the common arts of the priests and papists of those days, of tempting Walsingham to place him as a spy abroad upon Mary's friends. Walsingham received him as a gentleman, and promised him the queen's passport for going to France; but, as it were in great confidence, bid him beware of the informers and messengers, who were every where abroad, and were in the king's pay; though it should be absolutely unsafe for them to lay hold on Babington, because releasing him without trial would render him suspected by his own party. This correspondence with Walsingham was by Babington intrusted with Ballard, who was to be embarked in the same design, and go abroad with Babington, who by this time had provided all his agents.

But Walsingham thought his business would be but half done unless he could find means to involve the queen of Scots in the fate of her friends. With this view he laid a deep scheme for entrapping her, through the heedlessness of her secretaries Nau and Curle. The former was a Frenchman, the latter a Scot, both of them, the first through want of honesty, the latter through want of courage, very ill qualified for their employments. Mary continued still at the house of sir Amias Pawlet, and Walsingham wrote to that gentleman for leave for Gifford, the priest, to corrupt one of his servants; Pawlet declined this, because he thought it inconsistent with his own character, as a gentleman, to harbour a known traitor in his house, but he winked at Gifford's corrupting a fellow in the neighbourhood, who, through a hole in the wall, stopped up by a loose stone, brought all the letters from Mary, or her secretaries, to Gifford, by whom they were transmitted to Walsingham, who thus became posessed of all that passed between Mary, or rather her secretaries, and her friends, either at home or abroad.

While Walsingham was thus taking every precaution necessary to detect and prevent all the designs of the conspirators, Elizabeth began to be afraid lest he should spin his thread of politics too fine, and she herself at length fall a victim to the determined revenge of her enemies; she therefore insisted that the whole affair should be laid before her council, and such measures taken as to secure the conspirators. According Ballard, as the most dangerous of all, was seized at Babington's house. This would have alarmed the conspirators the more, if both Ballard and Babington had not been at first persuaded from the cautions given them by Walsingham, that it was unknown to him, and that their arrest was only in consequence of the officiousness of spies and informers. Walsingham himself confirmed them in this notion, and thereby prevented Babington's design of immediately murdering Elizabeth, and risking all consequences: but instead of that he remained in London, and had one Scudamore placed over him as a spy by Walsingham. One evening, while they were both at supper, Scudamore received a note from Walsingham, ordering him to watch Babington more narrowly than ever; and Babington, by Scudamore's inadvertency, reading the note over his shoulder, hastily rose from table, and, leaving his cloak and sword behind him, went out of the room as if upon a sudden occasion, made the best of his way to Westminster, and, after conferring with Charnock, withdrew, with him and some others, into St. John's Wood, where they lurked ten days, but were at last discovered near Harrow on the Hill, hid in barns and dressed like countrymen, and brought prisoners to London.

During their imprisonment, they were examined upon the particulars of the conspiracy, and confessed all they knew, but, indeed, nothing that could affect the queen of Scots as being privy to the design of assassinating Elizabeth, farther than that Babington had received letters from her in cypher, which they believed to have been written by her, or by her order; nor has it been pretended, that even Babington ever saw her, much less ever see her write. On the thirteenth of September, Babington and Ballard, with five of their accomplices, were arraigned, and pleaded guilty; and next day seven others concerned in the same conspiracy were convicted upon their own confessions, or those of their associates. The first seven were executed with all the rigour of the sentence pronounced against traitors; but Elizabeth ordered that the other seven should hang till they were dead. At the place of execution they behaved in general with decency and resignation, and repented that part of the conspiracy, in which they were to murder Elizabeth.

The lesser conspirators being thus punished, measures were taken for the trial and conviction of her, for whose sake, and by whose supposed concurrence this deep and dangerous plot had been formed against the life of the queen and the peace of the kingdom: but the more determined Elizabeth was to cut off the queen of Scots, the more earnestly she applied herself to bring the son to wink at the death of his mother. It was natural to think, that

James would have resented the late traitorous attempt made upon his person, at the instigation and with the countenance of Elizabeth; but the present situation of his affairs obliged him to conceal his indignation, and his mild and peaceable temper soon induced him to forget the injury. Randolph had been sent by the court of England to succeed Wootton as ambassador in Scotland; and, by the temptation of a pension of five thousand pounds sterling per annum, offered to king James to enable him to support the regal dignity with more lustre, he so won on that weak prince, that he persuaded him to put the final hand to the league with Elizabeth, which had been set on foot last year; and James this summer sent commissioners to Berwick, where, on the fifth of July, the treaty was signed by the plenipotentiaries of both kingdoms, the heads of which were as follow:

"It was agreed, "that if Elizabeth was attacked, James should assist her with a body of fifteen thousand foot and two thousand horse; that if James was invaded, Elizabeth should aid him with six thousand foot and three thousand horse; that these auxiliaries should be maintained by the prince who demanded assistance; that if the descent should be made upon England, within sixty miles of the frontiers of Scotland, James should march to the relief of Elizabeth with the whole forces of his kingdom: and that this league should be binding and valid, so far as religion was concerned, notwithstanding any former alliances which either state might have contracted with foreign princes*."

We now approach towards the last act of the queen of Scots tragedy. Her death was by this time irrevocably determined by Elizabeth and her council. Sir Edward Wootton was dispatched with Mary's original intercepted letters to the king of France, to prevent any applications in her favour from that court; and the government having now received all the information they expected or wished, concerning Babington's conspiracy, came to a resolution that Mary should be removed by sir Amias Pawlet to Fotheringay castle in Northamptonshire.

The queen of Scots had been so strictly guarded, that she was still ignorant of the detection of Babington's conspiracy; and it was with equal surprise and concern, that she received intelligence of this event from sir Thomas Gorges, who had been ordered by Elizabeth to execute that office.

He chose the time for giving her this intimation, when she was mounted on horseback to take an airing; and she was not allowed to return to her former place of abode, but led through the country from one gentleman's house to another, until she arrived in Fotheringay-castle, which it was resolved to make the last stage of her mortal pilgrimage.

Her two secretaries, Nau and Curle, were immediately apprehended; all her papers were seized, and transmitted to the council: about sixty different keys to cyphers were discovered: there were likewise found many letters from persons abroad; and several too from English noblemen, expressing their attachment to her person and title.

This last discovery the queen thought proper to overlook; but the persons themselves, conscious of their guilt, and dreading the punishment which their crime deserved, endeavoured to atone for their error, by changing their principles, and declaring themselves thenceforth the most inveterate enemies of the queen of Scots.

It was determined to try Mary, not by the common statutes of treason, but by the law which had been enacted the former year, with a view to this very event; and the queen, in consequence of that act, appointed a commission, composed of forty two noblemen and privy-counsellors, and five judges* of the realm, who were empowered to examine and pronounce sentence against Mary, whom she stiled daughter and heir to James V. late king of Scotland†.

But, in order to procure every possible proof of Mary's abetting the late conspiracy, Gifford having revealed, that he had delivered to the French ambassador several papers of moment concerning the queen of Scots, was banished the realm upon a false action, which no ways related to the conspiracy. He informed the French ambassador of this proceeding against him, and, at the same time, gave him a piece of paper cut after a certain manner, with directions not to deliver the queen of Scots papers to any one, but to him who should produce the counter-part: and, leaving the counter-part with Walsingham, this crafty statesman got every thing this ambassador had, relating to the affair, into his hands.

On the eleventh of October, the commissioners repairing to Fotheringay castle, sir Walter Mildmay, and Edward Barker, notary public, were sent the next day to deliver to the devoted Mary the queen's letters for her trial; which having read with a countenance more becoming her dignity than her situation, she expressed herself in the following manner: "It grieves me much that the queen, my dear sister, is misinformed of me; and that, after so many years close confinement in prison, and being grown lame in my limbs, I have lain wholly neglected, though I have offered so many reasonable conditions for my liberty: though I have given her full and faithful notice of several dangers that threatened her, yet no credit hath been given me, and I have been still slighted, though so nearly allied to her in blood. When the association was entered into, and the act of parliament made thereupon, I foresaw, that whatever danger should happen, either from foreign princes abroad, or from ill disposed people at home, or for the sake of religion, I must bear the blame, having so many mortal enemies in the court. Certainly I might take it ill, and not without just reason, that a league hath been lately made with my son, without my knowlege; but such matters I omit. As for this letter, it seems strange to me, that the queen should command me, as a subject, to submit myself to a trial. I am an absolute queen, and will do nothing which may be prejudicial either to royal majesty, to other princes of my place and rank, or to my son. My mind is not yet so far dejected, neither will I faint or sink under this my calamity. I refer myself to what I have formerly protested to Bromley, now chancellor, and the late lord Delawar. The laws of England are to me altogether unknown: I am destitute of council; and who shall be my peers I cannot tell. My papers and notes are taken from me, and no man dares appear to be my advocate. I am clear from being guilty of any thing against the queen; I have stirred no man against her; and am not to be charged, but upon my own words or writings, which I am sure cannot be produced against me: yet I cannot deny but I have recommended myself and condition to foreign princes." When this speech being put in writing, was sent her the next morning, to see if she allowed it to be right, she owned it, and desired that the following words might be added, "Whereas the queen writes, that I am subject to the laws of England, and to be tried and judged by them, because I have lived under their protection; I answer, that I came into England to crave her assistance, and have been ever since in prison; so that I could not enjoy the protection or benefit of the laws of England; nay, I could never yet understand, from any man, what laws they were."

In fine, this and the following day were taken up with her disputing the authority of her judges; nor could she have been persuaded to plead, had she not been convinced, that an obstinate refusal would injure her innocence; and she was allowed first of all to enter her protest; when she found they were determined to proceed to judgment against her for non-appearance, this wrought upon her so much, that on the fourteenth of October she agreed to appear.

The trial had an appearance of great order and solemnity. At the upper end of the room (according to Camden) was placed a chair of state for the queen of England (had she been present), under a royal canopy: overagainst it, below, at some distance near the beam that ran across the room, stood a chair for the queen of Scots: by the walls, on both sides were placed benches, on which sat the commissioners. The particulars of this trial, together with the several articles of the charge

* They were sir Henry Bromley, knight, chancellor of England, the lord Burleigh, the marquis of Winchester, the earl of Oxford, great-chamberlain, the earl of Sherwbury, the marshal of England, the earl of Kent, the earl Derby, the earl of Worcester, the earl of Rutland, the earl of Warwick, master of the ordnance, the earls of Pembroke, Leicester, and Lincoln, the viscount Montagu, the lord Howard, high-admiral of England, Hunfdon, lord-chamberlain, Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Cobham, lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Stafford, Grey of Wilton, Lumley, Sturton, Sandes, Wentworth, Mordaunt, St. John of Bletso, Buckhurst, Compton, Cheney, sir Francis Knolles, treasurer of the household, sir James Crofts, comptroller, sir Christopher Hatton, vice-chamberlain, sir Francis Walsingham and William Davison, secretaries of state, sir Ralph Sadler, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, sir Walter Mildmay, chancellor of the Exchequer, sir Amias Pawlet, captain of Jersey, John Wolley, esq. secretary for the Latin tongue, sir Christopher Wray, sir Edmund Anderson, sir Roger Marwood, sir Thomas Gawdy, William Periam, judges. Camden, p. 519.

† Very great care was taken in drawing up this commission, as the reader will perceive by the following answer of Popham, the queen's attorney-general, and the other crown lawyers, to a letter sent them by lord Burleigh on this subject: the answer ran to this tenor.

"That that morning they had conference with such judges as were at present there, viz. the lord chief-baron sir Thomas Gawdy, justice Windham, justice Periam, and justice Rodes, and to Mr. serjeant Gawdy, touching the course of the proceeding in the commission.

"That they thought good, among other things, to understand their opinions, by what name the Scottish queen was to be called in the commission and record: and that therein they found them all of opinion, that to give her directly and precisely the name of "regina Scotorum," either in the beginning, or by a copulative, as was set down in his lordship's last letters, could not well be warranted by law; and therefore they held it the surest way to name her "Maria, filia & hæres Jacobi quinti, nuper regis Scotorum, communiter vocat regina Scotorum, & dataria Franciæ." Strype, vol. iii. p. 364.

against Mary, and her defence, and to be met with at large in almost all our historians, and in the Collection of State Trials; but being, on account of their great length, too tedious to be inserted in this history, we hope our readers will be content with a concise account of the most remarkable matters, as they occurred in the course of the proceedings.

The court being opened, the chancellor, turning to Mary, told her, "that she was accused of conspiring the destruction of the queen, the realm of England, and the protestant religion; and they were commissioned to examine the truth of the accusation, and to hear her answer." The chancellor having done speaking, the queen rose up, and said, "that she came into England to crave the aid which had been promised her: that she was a queen, and no subject to Elizabeth; and if she appeared before them, it was only to secure her honour and reputation." The chancellor would not own that any aid had been promised her: as to the protestation, he answered her, "it was in vain, since the law upon which the accusation was grounded, allowed of no distinction in the person of the transgressors; therefore it was not to be admitted." The court ordered, however, that the protestation should be recorded, with the chancellor's answer.

Through the whole of her trial, Mary constantly denied being any way concerned in that part of Babington's plot which tended to the taking away the life of Elizabeth: she even denied having had any correspondence with him by letters. She alleged that it was easy to counterfeit the hand-writing and cypher of another; and as to the confessions of her secretaries, she declared they were entirely false, and complained of being denied the right of seeing her accusers face to face. She did not, indeed, attempt to deny that she had tried all means, both in England and abroad, to procure her own liberty; in which she said she thought herself warranted by the laws of God and man. The lord Burleigh then put her in mind, that Morgan, her servant, had, with her knowledge, put Parry upon his design of taking queen Elizabeth's life: upon which Mary exclaimed, with some warmth, "Ah! are you my adversary!" "Yes (replied Burleigh) I am adversary to all Elizabeth's enemies:" and then, as if she had been a common criminal, asked her, whether she had any more to say? Mary, upon this, rose with great consciousness of majesty, and demanded to be heard before a full parliament, or the queen and her council. No answer was made to this; but the court was adjourned from Fotheringay, to sit in the Star-chamber, at Westminster, on the twenty-fifth of October.

On that day all the commissioners, except the earls of Shrewsbury and Warwick, attended; and though several of them (according to Thuanus) were popish lords, they found her, queen of Scots, guilty of the impeachment; and a formal sentence was pronounced against Mary, under the hands and seals of all the commissioners present.

At the same time the court issued a declaration, importing "that the said sentence in no way derogated from the title and honour of James king of Scotland, but he was in the same place, degree, and right, as if the sentence had never been pronounced." The unprejudiced and discerning reader will naturally form suitable reflections upon this proceeding against Mary, without my troubling him with any comments of my own: I shall only observe, that Elizabeth did not think herself safe in what had been done by her orders, until she was once more assured, that her parliament, which met on the twenty-ninth of October, not only confirmed the sentence pronounced against Mary, but also presented an address to her, humbly beseeching her to consent to its publication and execution. To this petition Elizabeth returned an answer, every word of which breathed the most unparalleled dissimulation: she pretended a mighty aversion to extreme measures; desired the two houses to find out some expedient to save her from the necessity of taking them; though at the same time she took especial care to throw into her speech every circumstance that she knew would make them earnest in pressing her to proceed with the utmost severity: among other things she told them, that, not long since, "she had seen with her own eyes, and read, an oath, wherein some were bound to kill her within a month. Hereby (says she) I see your danger in my person, which I will be very careful to prevent."

This public declaration of the jeopardy their sovereign's life was in, increased the apprehensions and terrors of the parliament so much, that when the commons returned to their house, they were determined more than ever to insist upon the execution of Mary; which they accordingly did in a second address, presented to Elizabeth on the twenty-third of November. This second application revived the pretended doubts and scruples of Elizabeth: she lamented her own unhappy situation, expressed her uneasiness at their earnest importunities, professed the warmest affection for her people, and dismissed the committee who waited on her with the address, in an uncertainty what, after all this irresolution, would be the final result of her deliberation.

Her resolution, however, was not long kept secret; the sentence against the queen of Scots was, by Elizabeth's orders, openly proclaimed throughout England; and on the sixth of December, the lord Buckhurst, with Beal, clerk of the council, were sent to notify it to Mary, and exhort her to prepare for death. The captive queen received the message with great firmness of mind, thanking God that an end was soon to be put to her troublesome pilgrimage: and then, with some emotion, said, "It is no wonder if the English, who have so often put their own sovereigns to death, should treat in the same manner a princess sprung from the blood of their kings." When sir Amias Pawlett took down her canopy of state, and divested her of all the badges of royalty, she bore it with extraordinary patience: she complained, indeed, of this treatment, and of the unfair use made of the letters and papers taken from her, in a letter to queen Elizabeth, wherein, after declaring herself void of all malevolence towards her, she desired "that her corpse might be interred in France; that she might not be put to death in private, but in the sight of the world; and that her servants might enjoy the legacies left them by her will, and be suffered to depart freely and peaceably whither they pleased." This letter was wrote on the nineteenth of December, but whether it was delivered is uncertain. On the second of that month the parliament was adjourned to the fifteenth of February; a resolution being fixed, within that time to take off Mary's head.

While the queen of Scots was preparing herself for her approaching fate, great interest was made by all the princes of Europe, in order to prevent the execution of the sentence pronounced against her. Even Henry III. notwithstanding his known aversion to the house of Guise, was obliged to interpose in her behalf, and to appear in defence of the common rights of royalty. L'Aubespine, the French resident at London, and Bellievre, who was sent over with an extraordinary commission to the same purpose, interceded for Mary with great appearance of warmth. They employed every argument, which could either move the pity, or alarm the fears, of Elizabeth: they pleaded from justice, generosity, and humanity: they intermingled reproaches and threats. But, to all these Elizabeth continued deaf and inexorable; and having received some private intimation of Henry's real indifference about the fate of the Scottish queen, and knowing the implacable hatred to all the family of the Guise, she hoped that these loud remonstrances would be productive of no violent effects.

James of Scotland was no sooner informed of his mother's distress, than he dispatched sir William Keith, gentleman of his bed-chamber, with a letter to Elizabeth, conjuring her to spare the life of his parent, otherwise he should think himself bound, by the laws of God and man, to revenge her death; and beseeching her at any rate to respite the execution of the sentence, until he could send an ambassador with farther propositions, which she might find satisfactory. She was seized with a transport of indignation when she perused this letter, in which James presumed to threaten her with vengeance; but her passion subsiding, she granted the desired respite. At length the master of Gray and sir Robert Melvill arriving in London, proposed that their king should give the chief of his nobility as hostages, to secure Elizabeth from any future practices of his mother, who should resign the right of her succession to her son; and the resignation should be guaranteed by foreign princes. These proposals the queen rejected with disdain: and when sir Robert Melvill begged earnestly that execution might be deferred for a week, the queen answered, with great emotion, "No, not for an hour." We have already observed that Elizabeth's dissimulation failed her whenever Mary was the subject of conversation. James recalled his ambassadors in a passion, which, however, was soon cooled by the master of Gray, who was a pensioner of the queen of England.

Elizabeth proceeded now to act the last part of the tragedy relating to the unhappy queen of Scots; and in the mean time her ministry, in order to pave the way for the bloody deed, took care to alarm the nation with false surmises of new plots and projected invasions; and the French resident, L'Aubespine, was accused of being concerned in hiring two ruffians to make away with Elizabeth; but the heinousness of this charge does not appear to have been supported with any authentic evidence, and so dropped of itself. It had however all the effects that were expected from it, by raising the impatience of the public for Mary's blood; and Elizabeth thinking that as many entreaties had been used, and as much delay interposed as decency required, she was at last resolved to execute the sentence against her sister-queen: but even in this last resolution she could not proceed without exhibiting a new scene of artifice and deceit; for, after much affected perturbation of mind, she sent for Davison, a man of great parts, but easy to be deceived, and who, for that very reason, had been lately made secretary, and commanded him to draw out a warrant for the execution of the queen of Scots, which she afterwards said she designed to have kept by her in case any attempt should be made for the delivery of that princess: she signed the warrant, and then desired Davison to carry it to the chancellor, in order to have the seal affixed to it.

Next day she sent Killigrew to Davison, requiring him to delay, for some time, the execution of her former orders; and when Davison came, and told her that the warrant had already passed the seals, she seemed to be somewhat surprized, and blamed him for his precipitation. Davison, not knowing what course to pursue, communicated the whole transaction to the council; and they advised him to dispatch the warrant by the hands of Beale, clerk to the council: if the queen should be offended, they promised to justify his conduct, and to take on themselves the whole blame of this measure. The secretary, not suspecting their intention, followed the advice; and the warrant was transmitted to the earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby and Cumberland, commanding them to see the sentence carried into immediate execution.

Common reason will not permit us to imagine that the matter could proceed thus far without Elizabeth's knowledge, nor was there even the least proof that she ordered Davison to withhold the warrant: the presumption is very strong to the contrary; because had Elizabeth pleased, even after Beale and the four earls were set out, there was time enough for countermanding the execution. But, indeed, Elizabeth, whose scheme seems to have been to deceive the world into an opinion that the odium of the queen of Scots death was not to be laid to her account, though, if we are to credit the apology of Davison himself, after his trial, and the following abstracts from two letters, inserted in the Life of the unfortunate Queen Mary, by M^r Kenzie, it will remain past a doubt, that she was determined upon her death, and did not stick at the most unjustifiable methods to compass it.

In the first, dated at London, February 1, 1586-7, to sir Amias Pawlet and sir Drue Drury, they thus express themselves: "Her majesty doth note in you both a lack of that care and zeal for her service, which she looketh for at your hands, in that you have not, in all this time (of yourselves, without any other provocation) found out some way to shorten the life of the Scottish queen, considering the great peril she is hourly subject to, so long as the said queen shall live. She taketh it most unkindly, that men professing that love towards her as you do, should, in a kind of sort, for the lack of the discharge of your duties, cast the burden upon her, knowing, as you do, her indisposition to shedding blood." To which sir Amias Pawlet replied next day, "My answer I shall give unto you with great grief and bitterness of mind, in that I am so unhappy, as living to see this unhappy day, in which I am required by direction from my most gracious sovereign, to do an act which God and the law forbiddeth. God forbid I should make so foul a shipwreck of my conscience, or leave so great a blot upon my poor posterity, and shed blood without law or warrant."

However, her artifices answered the main end for which they were designed, to give the young king of Scotland, who is said to have been too consenting to his mother's prosecution and death, a plausible excuse for continuing his correspondence with Elizabeth; and to furnish Elizabeth with an answer to the representations of foreign princes, expected on that occasion.

An awful, but humiliating, scene is now to be disclosed; a daughter, a wife, and a mother of kings, and herself a sovereign queen, after being shut up for eighteen years in dreary prisons by a sister-queen, is, by her orders, to be dragged to the block, and her head struck off by a common executioner.

On the evening of the sixth of February (though our historians say the seventh), 1587, the four lords, with Beale, arrived at Fotheringay; and the earls of Shrewsbury and Kent, together with Mary's two keepers, intimated to her that she must die on the eighth following. The calmness and resignation with which she received this dreadful news were of a piece with all her other conduct: she confessed, indeed, she did not think she was to die so soon; but all her gestures, looks, and words, were full of chearful resignation. She desired of the earls, that she might have a conference with her almoner, confessor, and Andrew Melvill, the master of her household: but they would not allow her confessor to come near her, but recommended to her the bishop or dean of Peterborough; whom she refusing, the earl of Kent, out of his zeal to the reformed religion, insisted that she should have no other. After they were gone, she ordered supper to be hastened, that she might have the more time to dispose of her concerns. She supped temperately, as she used to do: towards the end of supper, she drank to her servants, who pledged her upon their knees, begging pardon for their neglect of duty, as she also did of them. After supper she perused her will, and wrote down the names of those to whom she bequeathed her goods and jewels. At her wonted time she went to bed; slept some hours; and then, awaking, spent the rest of the night in prayer. The fatal day being come, she dressed herself as she was wont to do upon festival days, and, calling her servants together, commanded her will to be read, and then retired into her oratory, where she staid till sir Thomas Andrews, the sheriff, acquainted her that she must now come forth. She appeared with a composed countenance and chearful look; her head was covered with a veil, hanging down to the ground; her beads hanging at her girdle, with a crucifix in her hand. In the porch she was received by the earls and other noblemen, where, speaking a short speech to Melvill, who bewailed his hard hap, that he was to carry into Scotland the woful tidings of the unhappy fate of his lady and mistress, she bade him farewell; and turning to the earls, desired that her servants might stand by her at her death. Then the earls of Kent and Shrewsbury, sir Thomas Andrews, sheriff of Northamptonshire going before her, she came to the scaffold, at the upper end of the hall, on which were placed a chair, a cushion, and a block, covered with black cloth. As soon as she was sat down, Beale read the warrant, to which the queen listened with a careless or rather merry countenance: which done, Dr. Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, began a long speech to her, concerning her life, past, present, and to come. She interrupted him, praying him not to trouble himself, for she was resolved to die in the catholic religion. Then they appointed the dean to pray; after which, the executioner having asked her forgiveness, her women took off her upper garments, and covering her face with a handkerchief, she laid her head upon the block, which was severed from her body at two strokes. She was buried in a royal manner, in the cathedral of Peterborough, on the first of August, where she lay till her son king James's accession to the crown of England; but he ordered her remains to be removed, in 1612, into the south isle of king Henry VII's chapel, at Westminster, where she now lies under a stately monument erected to her memory.

Thus, in the forty-sixth year of her age, and the eighteenth of her captivity, died Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland by birth, and of France by marriage, whose character has been equally injured by the virulence of her enemies, and the intemperate zeal of her friends. The panegyric of the latter has ever been suspected, because unsupported, and has thereby given countenance to the defamation of the former. Upon a strict and impartial review of her life and actions, I think it may be justly said, that she was an amiable woman rather than an illustrious queen; and that she was partly the cause of her own ruin, by certain levities and errors in her conduct, which furnished her restless subjects with a pretext to oppose her authority, and drove her to seek for shelter with that person, who, of all the world, was by nature, inclination, and the situation of her own affairs, her most inveterate enemy.

If we are to believe contemporary authors, her person was so finished a pattern of beauty, that it exceeded all the luxuriancy of description; in short, Mary is, with her countrymen, to this day, but another name for Beauty itself; nor is it easy to contradict them, since they have the French writers on their side; and, notwithstanding their pretences, few if any original pictures of her, in the bloom of life, are remaining to contradict them. Brantome says of her, "that no man ever beheld her person without admiration and love, or will read her story without sorrow."

Elizabeth had hitherto acted a most egregious farce in her conduct to the queen of Scots, and she was now determined to perform the last scene with the same dexterity and address which she had displayed in the former. No sooner was she informed of Mary's death, than she affected a violent transport of grief, and openly declared the execution had been done against her intention, and without her orders. Her first care was to make her apology to James: her kinsman, Cary, son to the lord Hundon, was charged with this commission, and had orders to deliver to James a letter, written all in her own hand, to this effect: "that her mind was infinitely disquieted on account of this lamentable event, done against her meaning and intent; intreating him to believe, that if she had commanded it, she would never have denied it; and withal professing her true affection towards him, and and her assiduous watchfulness for the preservation of him and his states*.”

While Cary was on his journey, Elizabeth, the better to support her dissimulation, caused Davison to be tried at the Star-chamber, “for contempt of the queen’s majesty, violating of his trust, and neglect of his duty;” which charge was aggravated against him with all the chicanery of the bar, by Egerton, the queen’s solicitor, and Gawdy and Pickering, crown-lawyers. Davison behaved with great modesty on his examination; he readily acknowledged his error, and suffered himself to be railed at by those very counsellors, who had promised him their countenance and protection, and had encouraged him to the fact for which he now stood arraigned. The pleadings ended, the commissioners proceeded to pass sentence on this easy dupe of his sovereign’s treachery and dissimulation; and it was decreed, that, for his hasty and inconsiderate conduct, he should be fined ten thousand pounds, and suffer imprisonment during the queen’s pleasure. In this sentence all the court concurred; only the lord Grey excused Davison so far, as to say that he thought him worthy of reward rather than punishment. He continued a long time in custody, and was obliged to pay every shilling of the fine, though it reduced him to absolute beggary: all the favour he could procure from the queen, was a temporary support, just sufficient to keep him from starving, who had served her at the hazard of his own head. We cannot refuse the reader a sight of the apology which Davison afterwards drew up for himself and sent to Walsingham, and which the reader will find in the note† transcribed from Camden, and is at liberty to make his own reflections on it.

Elizabeth’s hypocrisy was so gross, that it could impose on nobody who was not previously resolved to be deceived; but as James’s concern for his mother was heart-felt and sincere, he expressed the highest rage and indignation, and refused to admit Cary into his presence. He recalled his ambassadors from England, and seemed to breathe nothing but war and vengeance: however, the friends of Elizabeth, taking advantage of the caution and timidity of James, gave him such frightful ideas of the power of England, and the treachery of the Roman catholics, of his danger in marrying into a popish family, and of his own inability to avenge his mother’s death, that in a few months he turned his thoughts towards peace; in which he was more easily confirmed by Cary’s producing the sentence passed upon Davison; and another instrument, signed by all the judges of England, in which they declared that the sentence against the queen of Scotland could in no wise prejudice James in his right of succession to the crown of England.

Elizabeth having thus dissipated the clouds which threatened to burst with fury upon her head from this quarter, and being informed that Philip of Spain was meditating a formidable descent upon England, for which purpose a great navy was equipping in his ports, she sent sir Francis Drake, with a fleet, to intercept the supplies of naval and military stores going to Cadiz, to plunder the Spanish coast, and to destroy the enemy’s shipping in their own ports; all which this brave and active commander effected with equal courage and success, burning and destroying above an hundred ships, most of them laden with provisions and military stores; and, after taking the town of St. Vincent, and bombarding Lisbon, he set sail for the Western Islands, in order to intercept a rich carrack, or galleon, called the St. Philip, then on her return from the East Indies, which falling into his hands, he returned to England in July, covered with glory, and master of an immense booty. But the most valuable acquisition accruing to the nation from this expedition, was the finding of certain papers on board the galleon, which served to instruct the English in the nature of the East Indian commerce, and put them on the first thoughts of establishing an East India Company.

The English, during this year, were not equally successful in their land enterprizes in the Low Countries, where two of Leicester’s favourites, Stanley and York, to whom he had, on his return to England, assigned the command of Zutphen and Deventer, two important posts, treacherously delivered the same up to the duke of Parma; and the states of the United Provinces, who thought they had already sufficient reasons to be offended with the conduct of Leicester, now sent an embassy to the English court with their complaints, and a request that the government might be taken from the earl, and given to some other more able and prudent general. Elizabeth, who was greatly chagrined at the dislike the states expressed to her favourite, sent over Thomas Sackville, lord Buckhurst, to use his best endeavours to compromise matters, but

* Spottiswood, p. 357.

† The queen, after the departure of the French and Scottish ambassadors, of her own accord commanded me to deliver her the warrant for the executing the sentence against the queen of Scots. When I had delivered it, she readily signed it with her own hand: when she had so done, she commanded it to be sealed with the great seal of England; and, in a jesting manner, said, “Go, tell this to Walsingham, who is now sick, though I fear he will die for sorrow when he hears it.” She added also her reasons for deferring it so long, namely, lest she might seem to have been violently or maliciously drawn thereto; whereas, in the mean time, she was not ignorant how necessary it was. Moreover, she blamed Pawlet and Drury, that they had not eased her of this care; and wished Walsingham would feel their pulses touching this matter.

The next day after the warrant was under the great-seal, she commanded me, by Killigrew, that it should be done; and when I had informed her that it was done already, she found fault with such great haste, telling me, that, in the judgment of some wise men, another course might be taken. I answered, that the course which was just, was always best and safest. But, fearing lest she should lay the fault on me (as she had laid the putting the duke of Norfolk to death upon the lord Burleigh), I acquainted Hatton with the whole matter, protesting that I would not plunge myself any deeper in so great a business. He presently imparted it to the lord Burleigh, and the lord Burleigh to the rest of the council, who all consented to have the execution hastened; and every one of them vowed to bear an equal part of the blame, and sent Beale away with the warrant and letters. The third day after, when, by a dream which she told of the queen of Scots death, I perceived that she wavered in her resolution, I asked her whether she had changed her mind? She answered, “No; but another course (said she) might have been devised;” and withal she asked me, whether I had received any answer from Pawlet, whose letters when I had shewed her, wherein he flatly refused to undertake that which stood not with her honour and justice; she waxing angry, accused him, and others (who had bound themselves by the association), of perjury and breach of vows, as those that had promised great matters for their prince’s safety, but would perform nothing: “yet there are (said she), who will do it for my sake.” But I shewed her how dishonourable and unjust a thing this would be; and withal into how great danger she would bring Pawlet and Drury by it: for if she approved the fact, she would draw upon herself both danger and dishonour, not without censure of injustice; and if she disavowed it, she would undo men of great descent, and their whole posterity. And afterwards she gave me a light check, the same day that the queen of Scots was executed, because she was not put to death.

without effect; for the Dutch, thinking it no longer safe to trust Leicester, would hearken to no terms of accommodation, but gave the command of their army to count Maurice of Nassau, the late prince of Orange's second son. Elizabeth, who considered the independence of the states as immediately connected with her own safety, shewed no resentment at their excluding Leicester, but, on the contrary, to give them entire satisfaction, she commanded that nobleman to resign his government. But though her good sense so far prevailed, on the present occasion, over her attachment to Leicester, he, by his artful submission, soon regained his former influence; and the lord Buckhurst, who, on his return to England, accused him before the parliament of his conduct in Holland, lost for some time the confidence of his sovereign, and was even committed to custody, while all proceedings against Leicester were quashed by the royal authority, to the secret indignation of all honest men. The lord Willoughby was made general of the English forces in the Low Countries, who had orders to oblige the partizans of England there, to submit to the authority of prince Maurice. During these transactions, the Dutch lost Sluys, which was taken by the prince of Parma, and Gueldres submitted to him through the treachery of its governor.

In regard to domestic affairs in England, we have to observe, that the parliament meeting on the fifteenth of February, a motion was made in the house of commons, to present an address of thanks to her majesty, for having put the queen of Scots to death; but this did not pass, because it would have fixed upon Elizabeth an imputation which she sought eagerly to avoid. A petition, with a Directory or Book of Devotion, from the puritans being presented to the house, seconded by four gentlemen, the queen sent for the book, and committed the four members to the Tower, for having presumed to meddle in church-matters, in contempt of her repeated inhibition: a motion was made to address her for the release of the imprisoned members, but was over-ruled, and they continued in confinement till the parliament was dissolved. This severity did not hinder the commons from granting a subsidy, and afterwards a benevolence for the support of the war in the Netherlands: she met with the like indulgence from the lords, and the clergy assembled in convocation.

This year sir John Perot was called home from Ireland, where he left every thing in great tranquillity, to the government of Fitz Williams, his successor. Hitherto the English had found the Irish an easy conquest, on account of the unskilfulness of these latter in military exercise; eight hundred foot and three hundred horse was held an invincible army, but, after Perot's command, they were trained to arms, and taught to discharge muskets at a mark, and being instructed in the art of fortification, they held the English tighter to it, and were not so easily overcome. But we are now to see the attention of Elizabeth and her people engrossed by objects of the most important and alarming nature.

Philip II. king of Spain, upon the slender title of being descended from John of Ghent, duke of Lancaster, the fourth son of Edward III. and upon the conveyance and will of the queen of Scots, deceased, who had been persuaded to give up her right and title to England in favour of him, as the only means to restore popery in this nation, and being also prepossessed with that maxim of the church of Rome, that a heretic is unworthy and incapable of enjoying a crown, thought he might justly claim that of England; and, supported with the bulls of pope Pius V. and Gregory XIII. absolving Elizabeth's subjects from their oath of allegiance, he had for some time been projecting the conquest of England and its dependencies.

It is true that Philip positively denied his intention to molest Elizabeth, or assist her enemies, with these great naval preparations he was carrying on throughout all his dominions; but that watchful minister Walsingham, having intelligence, from his spies in the Spanish court, that Philip had declared in council that he had dispatched an express to Rome with a letter, wrote with his own hand, to the pope, acquainting him with the true design of his preparations, and asking his blessing upon it, but that, for some reasons, he would not disclose the particulars of the matter to them till the return of the courier; the secretary lost no time to make himself master of this important secret; and, by the help of a Venetian priest, his spy at Rome, he found means to bribe a gentleman of the pope's bed-chamber, who took out of his holiness's pocket, when asleep, the keys of his cabinet, which he opened, and taking a copy of the king of Spain's letter, sent it to Walsingham; who thereupon advised the sending sir Francis Drake upon the coast of Spain in the manner already related: which, with Walsingham's farther contrivance to get the Spanish bills, which were to supply the king of Spain with money to carry on his preparations, protested at Genoa, obliged Philip to defer the execution of his grand project to another year.

In the mean while Elizabeth, who was thoroughly informed of the storm which was raising against her, took all possible care to be in a posture of defence at home, as well as to distress her enemies abroad: but still she could not help being much perplexed to see her crown at stake, and herself alone without any ally to defend it, and therefore sought as much as possible to gain time; Philip himself was in no condition as yet to precipitate matters; and each dissembled so far, that, in December this year, it was agreed that commissioners should meet to draw up preliminaries for a pacification. It was proposed at first that the commissioners should meet at Munster, but at last, after many altercations, Ostend was fixed upon for the place of holding the conferences, which were not opened, however, till the twelfth of April, 1588 (a year that will be ever memorable in the English annals); and then such artful obstacles were thrown in the way of a mutual agreement, that the time was dallied on till the thundering of the Spanish artillery on the coast of England demonstrated how fruitless all farther treating would prove.

Notwithstanding the very great damage that sir Francis Drake had done the Spanish armament last year, yet so universal and prodigious a preparation as had been making for three years could not be easily rendered wholly useless; and, by the month of May this year, Philip had equipped a fleet, which, on account of its strength, he called the Invincible Armada. He procured from the pope (Sixtus V.) a consecrated banner, with fresh bulls for excommunicating Elizabeth as an heretic, publishing lishing a crusade against her, and absolving her subjects from their oath of allegiance.

The gold of Peru was lavished for the purposes of this expedition. This tremendous armament rendezvoused at the Groyne, and consisted of the following particulars: nineteen thousand two hundred and ninety soldiers; eight thousand three hundred and fifty sailors; two thousand and eighty galley-slaves; and two thousand six hundred and thirty pieces of ordnance: in a word, there never was any fleet equal to it in modern times, whether we consider the goodness of the troops, the appointments of the ships, the provision of ammunition, victuals, and arms, or its confidence of success.

The duke of Medina Sidonia was appointed admiral of the whole; and don Juan Martinez de Ricaldo, an experienced sea-officer, served under him; nor was there a noble family in Spain but had a son, brother, or nephew, in this expedition, in hopes of acquiring riches and revenues in England, which they looked upon as an easy conquest. And still more to insure success, Philip ordered the duke of Parma to provide transports, and an army of twenty-five thousand men, to be convoyed into this kingdom as soon as the Spanish fleet should appear on the coast of Flanders. The duke, in pursuance of these orders, caused a great number of flat-bottomed vessels to be built, for the transportation of the cavalry; provided other ships for the foot soldiers; and quartered his troops in the neighbourhood of Gravelines, Dunkirk, and Newport. To the disgrace of human nature, seven hundred English fugitives enlisted under his banner, to assist in the conquest of their own country!

In the mean while Elizabeth had many serious consultations concerning the manner of repelling this danger. Having equipped a considerable fleet, she created Charles lord Howard of Effingham, lord high-admiral of England; and he was sent with a strong squadron to the West, where he was joined by sir Francis Drake, now appointed vice-admiral. She ordered lord Henry Seymour, second son to the duke of Somerset, to cruise along the coast of Flanders, with forty English and Flemish ships, to prevent the prince of Parma from putting to sea with his forces. Twenty thousand men were cantoned along the southern coasts of England; another body of well-disciplined troops encamped at Tilbury, near the mouth of the Thames, under the conduct of the earl of Leicester, whom the queen created general in chief of all her forces; and the lord Hunsdon commanded a third army, amounting to thirty-thousand horse and foot, for the defence of her majesty's person. Arthur, lord Grey, sir Francis Knolles, sir John Norreys, sir Richard Bingham, and sir Roger Williams, men renowned for their valour and experience, were consulted about the management of the war by land: in pursuance of their advice, all the landing-places on the coast were fortified and garrisoned, from Hull to the Land's End and Milford Haven; the militia of the country was armed, and regulated under proper officers, who received instructions for interrupting the disembarkation of the enemy, wasting the country before them with slight skirmishes and continual alarms, until the army could be assembled at the place, in order to give them battle. The queen imprisoned some suspected papists; sent new instructions to sir William Fitz Williams, lord-deputy of Ireland; and, by her friends in Scotland, instigated James against the Roman catholics and the Spanish faction. That prince was more afraid than she of the success of such an invasion, which would have deprived him of his fair succession, and exposed his native kingdom to the arms of a foreign conqueror. The lord Maxwell, returning from Spain, landed at Kirkcudbright, and began to assemble troops as if he expected the Spaniards would have made a descent in Galloway: James, being informed of these practices, marched against him with such expedition, that it was with difficulty he escaped in a bark; but being pursued, was taken and imprisoned.

As I shall, in the future part of this history (which has already insensibly grown upon me, and, much against my will, is likely to exceed the limits I at first proposed), be cautious of enlarging upon matters sufficiently known, I must therefore refer the reader to the journals of this expedition, which are in the hands of almost every one, for the minute particulars of each day's action, after the meeting of the two fleets to the final destruction of the Spaniards, and confine myself to a more succinct narrative.

The Invincible Armada, then, set sail from the port of Lisbon on the third of June, 1588; but being met at sea by a violent tempest, was forced back to the Groyne, where it lay till the twelfth of July, and then set sail for England, and, after a troublesome voyage, the whole fleet was, on the nineteenth, within sight of our western shores. It was impossible for the English ships, which, for the most part, were no more than small barks in comparison with those of the Spaniards, to stand against the force of those floating citadels, whose upper works were above three feet thick, and almost cannon-proof. Nevertheless, this well-concerted scheme failed in almost every part: the English appeared before the enemy with one hundred sail, and, notwithstanding their inferiority in bulk, numbers, and strength, stopped the progress of this formidable fleet. They took several of the Spanish ships, and dispersed the rest by means of fire-ships, on this occasion first used: a storm seconded the efforts of the English; the Spanish admiral's ship, called the Invincible, was very near being lost on the coast of Zealand. The duke of Parma's army, which could not put to sea without the assistance of the Spanish fleet, remained inactive. Philip's navy, unable to resist the courage of the English and adverse winds, retreated round the north part of our island; some were wrecked upon the coast of Zealand; others upon the Orkney islands and the coast of Scotland; and another was cast away upon the Irish shore, where the country-people massacred most of the soldiers and sailors who escaped the fury of the tempest; and the lord-lieutenant, Fitz Williams, caused the rest to be hanged. In short, of the whole Invincible Armada, only fifty ships returned to Spain; and of thirty thousand men who had sailed on this expedition, no more than six thousand escaped shipwreck and the sword and fire fire of the enemy. I have in the note * inserted some curious particulars, as they were transmitted to the court of Spain, concerning its whole loss in this expedition. That of the English was almost too inconsiderable to be mentioned; only one commander (Cox), with his bark, perishing in the midst of the enemy.

The lord high-admiral Effingham having entirely cleared the English coast of the Spaniards, returned in safety back to the Downs, to join in the acclamations and thanksgiving of the whole nation for so great a deliverance. Two medals were struck by the government's order, in memory of this signal victory: one in honour of the queen, which represented fire-ships, and a fleet in a hurry and confusion, with this motto, DVX FÆMINA FACTI; another in honour of the English navy, with the device of a fleet flying under full sail, and the inscription VENIT, VIDIT, FUGIT. The Zealanders, whose very existence depended upon the success of the English arms, struck one, representing the Spanish fleet in great confusion, with this motto, IMPIVS FUGIT NEMINE SEQVENTE.

As for Elizabeth, she ordered a public thanksgiving for the deliverance to be made in all the churches throughout the kingdom; and went herself to St. Paul's, in great solemnity, to perform the sacred duty: at the same time eleven standards and colours, taken from the enemy, were hung up in the body of the church, as trophies of their defeat. The queen's next act was to bestow on the lord high-admiral Howard a yearly pension, or rather gratuity, in recompence of his great service to his country, and likewise bestowed pensions on several of the maimed and wounded officers. For the rest, their rewards consisted more in words than in deeds. To add to the general joy, sir Robert Sidney, who had been sent into Scotland, before the arrival of the Spanish fleet, at the time the queen was afraid king James would think the troubles of her realm afforded him a proper opportunity, by joining with the Spaniards, to revenge the murder of his mother, returned to England, with a letter, under James's own hand, to Elizabeth, wherein that monarch testified his sincere attachment to the interest of England and the protestant religion, and declared that he was so far from wishing well to the cause of Philip, that he looked for no other favour from the Spaniard than what Polyphemus promised Ulysses, namely, that he should be devoured the last.

On the fourth of September, soon after the dispersion of the Armada, died Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester, the queen's great but unworthy favourite. He had discovered no conduct in any of his military enterprizes, and was even suspected of cowardice; yet she entrusted him with the command of her armies during the danger of the Spanish invasion, a partiality which might have proved fatal to her, had the duke of Parma been able to land his troops in England: she had even given orders for drawing a commission, appointing him her lieutenant in the kingdoms of England and Ireland; but Burleigh and Hatton represented the danger of investing any subject with such unlimited authority, and prevented the execution of that design. No wonder, that a conduct so unlike the usual jealousy of Elizabeth, should give ground to surmise that her partiality was founded on some other passion than friendship. But the queen's affection for Leicester seemed to be terminated with his death: she caused his goods to be exposed to public sale, in order to reimburse herself for the money she had lent him, and her usual œconomy was observed to prevail over her regard to the memory of the deceased. Leicester's character may be summed up in a few words: he was a great hypocrite, a pretender to the strictest religion, an encourager of the puritans, and a founder of hospitals.

The duke of Parma, with his fine army of thirty thousand men, had no better success in the Netherlands than the Invincible Armada had in its attempt upon England. The Hollanders, who found a ready defence in their canals and sluices, and who were fond of liberty to a degree of enthusiasm, and who were all become generals under their princes of Orange, were in a condition to have resisted a much stronger force; and the duke, after laying siege to Bergen op Zoom, was, by the bravery of the English governor, sir William Drury, and his garrison of the same nation, obliged to abandon his enterprize with disgrace.

In France, the duke of Guise was become so powerful and popular, that he instigated the Parisians to make barricadoes in the streets, and prepare for attacking the king in his palace of the Louvre. Henry was obliged to quit his capital, and make a dishonourable peace with the chiefs of the league; but before the end of this year he revenged this outrage upon the duke and his uncle, the cardinal, whom he caused to be assassinated at Blois; an act of barbarity which he considered as absolutely necessary to secure his own safety.

About this time Philip, earl of Arundel, who had been three years a prisoner in the Tower, was tried in Westminster-hall, on an accusation of holding private and treasonable correspondence with cardinal Allen and other popish priests, and of having caused mass to be said in his own apartment for the happy success of the Spanish Armada; as also with being privy to the bull of pope Sixtus V. depriving the queen of her dominions, and making them over to the Spaniard. Upon these accusations, unsupported by any legal proofs, this nobleman was by his peers found guilty; but Elizabeth spared his life. This Philip, earl of Arundel, was the fourth immediate heir from father to son, who stood condemned to die, through the jealousy of the crown rather than the justice of the laws, as if the safety of the house of Tudor and the existence of the family of Howard were held incompatible.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, 1589, Elizabeth convoked a new parliament, and she obtained from them a supply of two subsidies and four fifteenths, payable in four years. This is the first time that subsidies were doubled in one supply; and this uncommon concession was probably owing to the joy of the late success and the general sense of the queen's necessities.

Some of the commons made a motion for restraining the tyranny of the ecclesiastical commission, and rectifying the abuses of purveyance*. But Elizabeth, who considered both these as essential parts of her prerogative, of which she was extremely tenacious, strictly prohibited them from touching upon things which did not belong to their cognizance.

The defeat of the Armada had inspired the nation with a kind of enthusiastic passion for enterprizes against Spain; and nothing seemed now impossible to be accomplished by the heroic valour and good fortune of the English.

Don Antonio, prior of Crato, was a natural son of the royal family of Portugal, who, trusting to the irreconcilable hatred which his countrymen bore to the Castilians, had trumped up a claim to the crown, and flying first to France, and then to England, had been encouraged, both by Henry and Elizabeth, to assert his pretensions; and now a resolution was taken by the people, not the court, of England, to conquer the kingdom for don Antonio; sir Francis Drake, and sir John Norris, were the leaders in this romantic enterprize; about twenty thousand volunteers engaged in the service: and ships were hired, as well as arms provided, at the sole charge of the adventurers. The queen's frugality hindered her from contributing more than sixty thousand pounds to the expence; and she only permitted six of her ships to attend the expedition.

This fleet sailed from Plymouth on the fifth of April; and after a short passage arrived at Corunna (commonly called the Groyne), in Galicia; where, after making themselves masters of the harbour, they soon reduced the lower town, which was followed by the giving up of the higher. And from thence sailing to the coast of Portugal, they met the young earl of Essex, whom we shall soon have occasion to mention in a distinguished light during the latter part of this reign. This young nobleman had equipped some ships at his own expence, unknown to Elizabeth, and sailed upon a roving cruise. This junction gave great spirits to the English; and their first exploit was to seize upon Panicha, a town in Portugal, which, with the castle, they surrendered to don Antonio, as lawful sovereign of the country; and from thence bent their march by land to Lisbon, at the distance of sixty miles. The foot companies led by Norris, whom Drake promised to follow with the fleet, being come to St. Catherine's, which is now the western suburb of Lisbon, they found nobody there but a few disarmed Portuguese, who cried out, "God save king Antonio!"

The day following, the Spaniards, in a large body, sallied from the citadel, and cut off several of the English, with some of their best officers; but the earl of Essex behaved so gallantly on this occasion, that he inspired fresh courage into his followers, who turned upon their assailants so warmly, that they beat them back to the very gates of the city. And having now remained at Lisbon two days, and seeing no signs of a revolt in their favour among the natives, which don Antonio had made them believe would be the immediate consequence of his appearance; finding fresh supplies daily thrown into the town, their own army sickly, and provisions and ammunitions growing short; and, what was more discouraging than all, no appearance of Drake's joining them, they left the suburbs of Lisbon, and marched to Cascais, a little town at the mouth of the river Tagus, which town Drake had in the mean time taken; and from him they now learned the reason of his not having joined them, namely, that of two passages for proceeding to

* The right of purveyance was an ancient prerogative, by which the officers of the crown were empowered to take, at pleasure, provisions for the household, from all the neighbouring counties, and the use of carts and carriages; and the price of these were always fixed and stated. The payment of the money was often distant and uncertain; and the rates were always greatly below the market price: so that purveyance, besides the slavery of it, was always considered as an intolerable grievance, and, being arbitrary and casual, was subject to great abuses. Hume's Hist. of the Tudors, vol. ii.

Lisbon, he found, upon a strict examination, both impracticable: the first by the channel of Alcacæva, not having depth enough of water for his vessels, he must have struck upon the shelves and shoals; and the port of St. Julian's, at the mouth of the harbour, was defended by all the Spanish galleys, and a battery of fifty pieces of cannon on shore.

The English land forces, on their arrival at Cascais, seized about sixty hulks belonging to the Hanse Towns, which had sailed round the Orkney islands, contrary to Elizabeth's express prohibition, with naval stores and provisions for the enemy. They next burned Vigo, a sea-port town; and, after blowing up a part of the castle of Cascais, they returned to England in the month of June. In this expedition more than one half of these gallant adventurers perished by sickness, famine, fatigue, and the sword; and England derived much more glory than advantage from this extraordinary enterprize. It is computed, that of eleven hundred gentlemen who embarked on board this fleet, no more than three hundred and fifty returned to their native country.

When these ships were on their voyage homewards, they met with the earl of Cumberland, who was outward-bound, with a fleet of seven sail, all fitted out at his own expence, except one ship of war, which he had obtained from the queen. That nobleman supplied sir Francis Drake with some provisions; an act of generosity which preserved the lives of Drake's men, but which proved fatal to his own troops in the sequel.

Cumberland sailed towards the Terceras, and took several of the enemy's ships; but the richest, valued at an hundred thousand pounds, was lost in her return, with all her cargo, near St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall. Many of these adventurers perished in a rash attempt at the Terceras: the rest were seized with a violent distemper; and it was not without extreme difficulty, that the few hands which remained were able to bring back their ships into harbour.

While the queen was thus distressing the Spaniards, Henry III. of France received a mortal wound, of which he died, by the dagger of an assassin, namely, James Clement, a Jacobine friar, when he was on the point of compelling his rebellious citizens of Paris to return to their duty. This act of regicide was openly avowed by the popish party, who extolled it as a meritorious deed, undertaken to deliver the church from an enemy, and to revenge the deaths of the Guises, those darlings of that bigotted party. The king lived two days after he received the wound, during which time he nominated Henry, king of Navarre, head of the house of Bourbon, his successor, who assumed the name of Henry IV. But he could never have maintained his advancement, had not Elizabeth supported him with both men and money; for the league refused to acknowledge him for their sovereign: and the duke of Mayenne, brother to the duke of Guise, having a more powerful army, drove him out of Paris, proclaimed the old cardinal of Bourbon successor to Henry III. by the name of Charles X. and, being assisted by the duke of Parma, obliged him to raise the blockade of that city. In this state were the affairs of France during the year 1589.

In Scotland, the Spanish party had been so successful as to raise several commotions. In the beginning of this year 1589, the Scottish ministry intercepted letters, by which it appeared that the earls of Huntley, Errol, Craufurd, and Bothwell, son to a bastard of James V. maintained a correspondence with the duke of Parma, who had supplied them with a sum of money to raise disturbances in Scotland. They had dispatched colonel Sempil to solicit Philip for another invasion. Bothwell undertook to seize the king's person; but was disappointed: the other three advanced with a body of forces towards Aberdeen; but the king assembling a greater number of troops, they were obliged to surrender at discretion, and remained in custody till the new queen arrived in Scotland. The king of Denmark had a second daughter unmarried; and James, laying aside his design upon Catherine of Bourbon, sent the earl Mareschal as his ambassador to Copenhagen, to demand this princess, Anne, in marriage. Though her father was by this time dead, the treaty of marriage was concluded with the states of the kingdom, and the princess embarking about Michaelmas for Scotland, was driven by a storm into Norway. James, impatient to see his bride, sailed thither in October, attended by his chancellor, several noblemen, and a numerous retinue; the nuptials were celebrated at Upsal; they passed the winter in Denmark, set sail for Scotland in the spring, and, landing at Leith in the beginning of May, the new queen was crowned in the church of Holyrood abbey.

Towards the close of this year died the famous sir Francis Walsingham, secretary of state, one of the most able and accomplished ministers that ever appeared in this or any other country, and not more distinguished by the abilities of his head, than the virtues of his heart. Though he had passed through many great employments, and had been very frugal in his expences, he yet died so poor, that his family was obliged to give him a private burial. He left only one daughter, who was first married to sir Philip Sidney, then to the earl of Essex, favourite of queen Elizabeth, and lastly to the earl of Clanrickard in Ireland.

This year also died sir Thomas Randolph, who had been employed by the queen in several embassies to Scotland; and also Ambrose Dudley, earl of Warwick, eldest brother to Leicester.

The affairs of England, in the year 1590, were so prosperous, that Elizabeth saw her enemies in no manner of condition to give her fresh disturbances from abroad, and the interior peace of her dominions was so well confirmed, and the hearts of her loyal subjects so well tried and attached to her interests by the late attempts of the king of Spain, that she had nothing to fear: however, she very prudently kept her marine on a respectable footing, and ready for service on the shortest notice; the fortifications of her towns and sea-ports were also properly attended to; and such was her frugality and good management, that, without loading her subjects with new taxes, she gave pensions to several persons in the court of Scotland and other parts, for secret services; and assisted both the Hollanders and the king of France with men and money, to withstand the arms and intrigues of Philip II. who aimed at universal monarchy, and who would have infallibly reduced those two nations, had not England come seasonably to their assistance, by sending troops to Normandy and Brittany, under der the earl of Essex and sir John Norris. But Henry IV. notwithstanding all his obligations to Elizabeth, dealt very deceitfully with her; for he made use of the English auxiliaries only to prevent the progress of the Spaniards, while he himself carried his arms elsewhere, instead of employing them to drive the Spaniards out of Brittany, agreeable to the treaty made between him and Elizabeth in the spring of this year, and in consequence of which these troops were sent over: but Henry's sole intent seems to have been to temporize till he could make peace upon his own terms.

In the course of this year some disturbances happened in Ireland, partly owing to the ferocity of the natives, and partly occasioned by the oppressive conduct of Fitz Williams, lord-deputy. The earl of Tyr Oen having caused Hugh Gavilloch, the natural son of Shan O'Neil, to be strangled, was summoned to England, where he obtained the queen's pardon, upon his solemnly engaging that he would live in peace with Tirlogh Leinigh and all his neighbours, that he would not assume the title of O'Neil, impose taxes, exercise any jurisdiction, intercept any ammunition or provisions intended for the use of the English garrisons, nor admit into his territories monks, friars, or malecontents. This nobleman was very punctual in performing his engagements, and possessed many excellent qualifications, both of mind and body. Hugh Roc M' Mahon, a powerful lord in Monaghan, having exacted the tax called Bonaghty from the people according to the custom of Ireland, was apprehended by the order of the lord-deputy, tried by a jury of common soldiers, condemned, executed, and his estate divided between his own sept and the English settlers. Brian O'Rourk, the chieftain of another powerful sept in the county of Antrim, apprehending the same fate, broke out into open rebellion; but being routed by sir Richard Bingham, governor of Connaught, he fled into Scotland, and, being claimed by Elizabeth, was delivered into the hands of that princess, who caused him to be tried and executed at London.

Elizabeth this year sustained a great loss in the person of sir Christopher Hatton, who, upon the death of sir Thomas Bromley, in 1587, had been made lord-chancellor of England. He was a person of great abilities, unshaken probity, firmly attached to the constitutions of his country, and a munificent patron of learning. He is said to have died of grief and vexation at the severity of the queen, who insulted him with abusive language, and exacted with great rigour a debt which he had contracted in managing the tenths and first-fruits. Immediately before his death, Hacket, Coppinger, and Arthington, three puritanical fanatics, uttered many blasphemous and treasonable expressions against God and the queen: the first was tried, condemned, and executed; Coppinger starved himself to death in prison; but Arthington was pardoned upon his recantation. That her Irish subjects might no longer be tempted to send their children to foreign seminaries for education, the queen founded Trinity college, in Dublin, endowing it with a power of conferring degrees, and other privileges of an university.

Elizabeth and her ministry reflecting that the Indian treasure was the true source of that greatness which rendered Philip so formidable to all his neighbours, resolved to enfeeble him in that part, and the lord Thomas Howard, second son to the late duke of Norfolk, was dispatched, in the spring of the year 1591, to the Azores, or Western Islands, with a squadron of seven ships, to intercept the plate-fleet in its return to Europe; but the king of Spain, apprized of the designs of the English court, equipped a fleet of fifty-five sail, and sent them to convoy the India ships. They came upon the English squadron so unexpectedly, that it was with great difficulty admiral Howard, who was then lying at anchor in the island of Flores, could put out to sea, more than half of his men being sick and unfit for service; and captain Grenville, in the Revenge, was so unfortunate to be pent up between the island and the Spanish fleet: in this desperate situation he attempted to break through the enemy, and, after maintaining a most gallant fight with the whole Spanish fleet for fifteen hours together, having received, upon a moderate computation, eight hundred cannon-shot in his ship, and withstood the fire of near ten thousand soldiers and seamen, and that with one hundred men only, he was compelled by his men to surrender himself prisoner, and, being carried on board the Spanish admiral, died a few days after of the wounds he had received during the engagement. The rest of the squadron returned safely to England, disappointed in their expectations, but pleasing themselves with the reflection, that their attempt to annoy the enemy had not been altogether ineffectual; for the Indian fleet had been so long detained in the Havannah, from the fear of the English, that they were at last obliged to put to sea in an improper season, and most of them were shipwrecked before they could reach the Spanish harbours. I shall omit to recount some other naval adventures of less importance, which happened at this time, after observing that Elizabeth lost no opportunity of encouraging every attempt by sea, which carried with it the smallest prospect either of a new discovery or of profit.

Elizabeth was extremely offended with Henry IV. for having broken his word to her, in neglecting to drive the Spaniards out of Brittany; and not a little displeased with the earl of Essex for his too easy compliance with the measures of the French king, and therefore recalled him from the command of her forces in Normandy, at the same time threatening Henry, that if he continued his prevaricating method of proceeding, she would totally withdraw her assistance from him. Henry, alarmed at this menace, sent most submissive letters to the queen, excusing himself in the best manner he was able; and, by the mediation of Essex and Mornay du Pleffis, whom he had sent his ambassador to England, obtained fresh supplies, and then laid siege to Roan: but the duke of Parma having entered France, and being joined by the duke of Mayenne, and the young duke of Guise, obliged him to abandon his enterprize.

On the twenty-eighth of December this year died pope Sixtus V. This event conduced not a little to the tranquility of Elizabeth and her kingdoms; for had this pontiff lived a little longer, it is very probable that her expence and great endeavours to maintain the protestant interest in France, and to support the house of Bourbon against the Spaniards, had proved ruinous to herself and people; king Henry IV. having a secret understanding with this pope, and, though he pretended to be a serious protestant outwardly, was entirely at his devotion in his heart. This was the spring of those prevarications on the part of that king, from his first accession to the throne, in all the negotiations and treaties with her majesty, and of those misapplications of her generous and powerful aids, sent to him from time to time, to drive the Spaniards out of Brittany. Pope Sixtus was succeeded in the pontifical dignity by Sfondrati, an Italian, who assumed the name of Gregory XIV.

In the beginning of the year 1592, the report continued very hot, that the duke of Parma was again to march into France. This report was not without foundation; and Elizabeth took care most punctually to fulfil all her engagements for the support of Henry. The scene of war lay chiefly in Normandy and Brittany, where the prince de Dombes joined the prince of Condé, with the English troops under Norris, while Elizabeth prevailed with the prince of Anhalt to enter France with a considerable body of German auxiliaries, to assist Henry. The prince of Condé, however, having formed the siege of Craon, was defeated by the duke of Mercœur, and all Brittany was upon the point of falling into the hands of the Spaniards, when the dukes of Mayenne and Mercœur, with other heads of the league, disgusted with the Spanish insolence, and jealous of their power, formed secret resolutions of making their peace with Henry. This slackened the operations of the war on the side of the league, and the duke of Mayenne was obliged to raise the siege of Quillebœuf, with some loss. Epernal was afterwards taken by the marshal Biron, but with the loss of that brave general's life. The farther operations of the French army fall not within my design; it is sufficient to say, that by the secret intrigues of the duke of Mayenne, the leaguers split among themselves, which gave great advantages to Henry's party. But at last the cardinal legate published his master's bull, for assembling the catholics of France, and for proceeding to the election of a popish king. The violent leaguers intended at this assembly to have given their crown to the king of Spain; and the duke of Parma's true intention of marching into France, was that he might over-awe the assembly, which the Spanish party proposed should be held at Rheims, or Soissons. But the duke of Mayenne, sensible of the consequence, ordered the assembly to be held at Paris. This somewhat disconcerted the prince of Parma; and Henry drew all his troops, to Elizabeth's mortification, out of Normandy, Picardy, and Brittany, to fight him before he should advance into the heart of the country. What the consequence would have been, is hard to say; but all Philip's vast designs were at this time defeated by the death of the duke of Parma, in the forty-sixth year of his age. Elizabeth is said to have dropped some generous expressions in favour of this great man's memory; and perhaps, few princes ever excelled him in virtue, in civil, and in military accomplishments. His great merits were quickly seen after his death: no other general had authority enough to keep the Spanish troops together; and the great sums which Philip had raised, being applied towards the corrupting the deputies of France, his soldiers mutinied, and many of them disbanded themselves.

In the month of April this year, sir John Perot, the late lord-deputy of Ireland, was brought to his trial, upon a charge of high-treason during his administration there. He was a man of courage and abilities, but proud, positive, covetous, and overbearing. Hatton had been so much his enemy, that notwithstanding all Burleigh could urge in his favour, Elizabeth was resolved he should be tried before commissioners, who were the lords Hunsdon and Buckhurst, sir Robert Cecil, sir John Fortescue, sir John Wooby, and other judges. Great pains had been taken to rip up all the private behaviour of Perot in Ireland, where he had many enemies; yet nothing was judicially proved against him, but some passionate disrespectful words against Elizabeth's person, for which she resolved to humble him. The grounds of his impeachment were "for having treated the person and character of the queen contumaciously: for relieving popish priests; for holding a secret correspondence with the duke of Parma, and Elizabeth's enemies; and for fostering the civil commotions in Ireland." He made a noble defence, but acknowledged his indiscretion in speaking disrespectfully of his queen. Popham, the attorney-general, who knew that Elizabeth made it a point that he should be convicted, produced a set of scandalous, and some of them infamous, witnesses, to prove the charge, and supported it with all his venal eloquence. At last, after a long time, the jury found him guilty; and Burleigh by his tears testified his opinion of his innocence. It was thought that Elizabeth intended to have pardoned him, but he died in September following, a prisoner in the Tower.

Elizabeth this year continued to pursue her favourite scheme of humbling the Spaniard, by cutting the very nerves of his strength in the West Indies. Sir Walter Raleigh was sent with a squadron of fifteen men of war, either to attack Panama, or to intercept the plate-fleet in its return to Europe. Never man had a head better fitted for this enterprise than sir Walter Raleigh had: his schemes were great, but difficult, if not impracticable, to any capacity but his own; his learning was inferior to his knowledge; his constancy to his courage; and his virtue to his genius, which was equal to the greatest and meanest things. Having at a great expence been detained too long in port by contrary winds, he set sail three months later than he ought to have done; and having passed the Land's End, he learned, that orders had gone from Spain to stop the return of the plate-fleet to Europe that year; this news, with a violent storm which dispersed his squadron, obliged him to alter his plan. He therefore sent one part of his squadron, under sir Martin Forbisher, to cruise off the coast of Spain, and he sent another part of it, under Boroughs, a brave officer, and second son to sir John Boroughs, to the Azores. The earl of Cumberland at the same time was at sea with three of Elizabeth's ships, and had chased a galleon into Flores just at the time when Boroughs had arrived there; while the Spanish fleet, which was then at sea, went after Forbisher. Boroughs would have taken this galleon, had it not been for a dead calm, and then a storm, which gave the Spaniards an opportunity of unloading, and setting it on fire: he had, however, the good fortune to make prize of another ship, called the Mother of God, after a desperate engagement, in which most of the Spanish crew, which consisted of six hundred men, were killed. This victory was equally for the profit and honour of the English; the money that was known to come to the queen and captors amounted to one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, and the embezzlements were thought to amount to the same sum; but, though Elizabeth did all she could to recover them, no discovery was made.

This year the earl of Bothwell made a new attempt in Scotland to seize on the person of king James; but the design being timely discovered, the rebel fled into England. Elizabeth at first promised James to punish such of her subjects as should harbour him; but she having always made it a point in her politics to oblige that prince to regard her, more by keeping him in a state of uneasiness than by real tokens of love and friendship, refused to deliver the traitor up, though the king of Scotland demanded him according to treaty.

The year 1593 began with a new parliament, which met in February, when two of the members of the house of commons, Peter Wentworth, esq. and sir Henry Bromley, were committed, the first to the Tower, and the latter to the Fleet, for preparing a petition to entail the crown.

In this parliament there passed several remarkable acts, one of which obliged all persons to conform, and repair at least once a month, to the established church, under pain of imprisonment, and banishment should they refuse to submit; and suffering as felons, without benefit of the clergy, should they return without her majesty's licence. Another confined popish recusants within five miles of their respective dwellings, on forfeiture of all their goods and chattels, together with their lands during life. Another confirmed all the abbey-lands to the crown and grantees.

By the first of these acts the queen, who hated the puritans as much as the papists, thought to have driven the obstinate quite away, and to have compelled the more moderate to conform to the established church. How far her policy in this particular failed her, I shall leave my readers to judge, only observing, that the severity which at this time began to be exercised in England upon the non-conformists (some of whom were executed on the sixth of April this year), produced terrible effects in the following reigns, and gave rise to troubles and factions which remain to this day, without any prospect of their subsiding. Before this parliament broke up, which was on the tenth of April, they granted the queen an extraordinary aid of money, but at the same time it was inserted in the act, "that so large and unusual a supply, granted to a most excellent queen, who made so good a use of the public money, should not be drawn into precedent."

The papists about this time began again to shew their inclination to rebellion, both in England and Scotland. One Richard Hacket was sent by the English fugitives beyond sea, to persuade Ferdinand, earl of Derby, son to Henry newly deceased, to assume the regal title, by claim of descent from Mary, daughter to Henry VII. and to threaten him, that, unless he undertook this enterprize, and withal concealed the adviser, he should shortly die in a most wretched manner; as an encouragement, he was told that he might assuredly rely on the assistance of the king of Spain. But the earl, fearing this was a trap laid for him, discovered the whole matter to the council, and Hacket was taken and hanged: but the threats of that villain were unhappily fulfilled upon the poor earl, who, in less than four months after, died in the most excruciating torments, supposed to be the effects of an arsenical poison. The suspicion lighted upon his gentleman of the horse, who disappeared the morrow after his lord's death. There was found in the earl's chamber an image of wax, with hairs thrust through the belly of it, of the same colour with his own; which was thought to have been placed there on purpose to take off the suspicion of his having been poisoned, and to throw it upon the effects of necromancy, which was much believed in those days.

In Scotland the Spanish governor of the Netherlands endeavoured to excite fresh troubles, by assuring the popish subjects of a powerful assistance from the king of Spain. Their project, however, was principally levelled against England; for though they resolved and promised to send a Spanish army into Scotland, it was in order to cover their enterprize against Elizabeth, whom they intended to assassinate or poison, and then to invade England with that army from Scotland, supposing that the general consternation at her death would render this invasion less difficult. And to execute this murdering design upon Elizabeth, they had cast an eye on Roderigo Lopez, a Jew physician, retained about the queen's person, and two Portuguese: Lopez agreed to the proposal for fifty thousand crowns; but the plot was discovered, the three conspirators seized, who, upon their trials, confessed the fact, and that they were engaged in it by the king of Spain's governors in the Low Countries, and were executed.

The day following one Patrick Cullen, an Irish fencing-master, sent from the Low Countries to kill the queen, underwent the same fate at the gallows: and about the same time Edward York and Richard Williams, who had been suborned by Diego de Ibarra, the colleague of count Fuentes in the government of the Low Countries, were arrested, and others were discovered, who had engaged to burn the navy. Of these secret and unnatural proceedings against a crowned head, the queen complained loudly at foreign courts; and she lived in continual dread, that at some opportunity this Spanish policy might take effect. But her uneasiness increased upon information that her enemies had prevailed too much with the king of Scotland, and that the Spanish gold had inclined him to favour popery: and she was the rather convinced of the truth of this report by that monarch's reply to her ambassador, sent on that occasion; for when he demanded, as an instance of his sincerity to the protestant faith, to repress the popish party by more severe laws than the present, James replied, with some heat, "that he was not at the queen's command, and that it did not belong to her to prescribe in what manner he should govern his kingdom:" and, by way of recrimination, complained of her breach of treaty, in giving protection to his rebellious subject Bothwell, whom he demanded afresh.

Elizabeth plainly perceived that James was much inclined to break with her, upon the first advantageous circumstance; and therefore ordered it so as to send Bothwell, at the head of a resolute body of men, into Scotland, to surprize Leith, and then published a manifesto, importing, "that persons dangerous dangerous to the church and state, having by some artifice procured admission into the council, gave occasion, by their conduct, to believe they were forming designs against the evangelical religion; that, for some time, the Romish priests had been seen running from village to village, and celebrating mass, in the most public manner; that they endeavoured to animate the people against the English, in order to kindle a war between the two nations, which could not but prove fatal to Scotland; that, to give a check to these dangerous conspiracies, he had, with the concurrence of divers lords and gentlemen, taken arms, to drive these pernicious counsellors out of the kingdom, or to bring them to an account for their actions; that the affair was the more important, as the Spaniards were preparing to invade the kingdom; and therefore he exhorted the Scots to join with him to prevent greater mischiefs, and to induce the king to favour so just a design." All which bears such a connection with the representation made by Elizabeth's ambassador, that she must be suspected of being concerned in this undertaking.

In Ireland this year, several of the great men in Connaught broke out into rebellion, and Tirlagh Leinigh being dead, Tyr Oen assumed the title of O'Neil (which in Ireland was held in higher esteem than that of Emperor); but, upon a sudden dissembling his discontent, he submitted himself to the lord-deputy, and promised all obedience.

The supplies given by parliament, and the prizes taken from the Spaniards, enabled Elizabeth to act up to her spirit, and her notions of the balance of power which England ought to preserve on the continent. Notwithstanding all the causes of complaint which she had against the French king, she would not see his affairs ruined for want of her assistance; and it soon appeared that all her menaces to withdraw it, were only with a view to quicken him to do all he could, if he could not do all that she desired. Elizabeth kept Norris and his army during the winter in Brittany, at the great charge of three thousand two hundred pounds a week for their subsistence: but Henry's affairs in that province were so miserably ruined, that he could assign them no fortified place for their winter-quarters; nor could he send, according to his promise, the marshal d'Aumont, with four thousand men, to join them. The bad quarters which the English were forced to take up with, and the inclemency of the weather, carried off great numbers of them; but Elizabeth's ships were perpetually employed in carrying over recruits to keep the number complete. In the mean while the assembly of the states of France was held at Paris, when the Spanish party proposed that the members should, by a solemn oath, bind themselves never to acknowledge the king of Navarre as king of France, even though he should declare himself a catholic. This proposition would have been infallibly complied with, had not Elizabeth's seasonable assistance, and the auxiliaries which her credit with the princes of Germany had brought to Henry, daunted the more moderate catholics, and even the duke of Mayenne rejected it. That duke was now obliged to meet the duke of Feria, the Spanish ambassador, who was in Picardy; while count Mansfelt, the Spanish general in the Low Countries, had laid siege to Noyon, which he took. In the conferences held between the dukes of Mayenne and Feria, the latter proposed that the Salic law should be abolished by the assembly of the states, that the crown of France might fall more easily upon the infant's head: this proposal was warmly rejected by the duke of Mayenne, who threatened to drive all the Spaniards out of France; but not daring yet absolutely to trust Henry, who was guided by Elizabeth, he was mollified; while Henry, on the other hand, shewed great inclination to be converted to popery, and conferences for that purpose were actually held.

But this did not retard the operations of the war in Brittany, where, in April, the English were joined by St. Luc, with some French troops, and beat the army of the league at Laval, but with the loss of some of their best men and officers. They then besieged la Guerche, in which were four thousand men, whom the duke of Mercœur had sent to fortify that place, and obliged them to surrender it by capitulation, leaving behind them their arms and baggage. In the mean while Elizabeth received certain intelligence that Henry had changed his religion.

Du Pleffis Mornay, who was then Henry's resident at the English court, laid before Elizabeth his master's motives for his conversion; but they were so far from giving her satisfaction, that she wrote that king a letter with her own hand, to this effect:

"Alas! what grief, what anxiety of mind, hath befallen me, since I heard this news! Was it possible, that worldly respects should make you lay aside God's fear? Could you think that he, that had hitherto upheld and kept you, would leave you at the last? It is a dangerous thing to do evil that good may come thereof: but I hope your mind may alter. In the mean time I will pray for you, and beg of God that the hands of Esau may not hinder the blessing of Jacob." She concludes, "Your sister, after the old-fashioned way; as for the new, I have nothing to do with it."

ELIZABETH."

But, however sincere and zealous Elizabeth appears to be by this letter, she never lost sight of her interests. She at first ordered Wilks to lay before Henry her firm resolution to recall her troops out of Brittany, where Henry had been so negligent of them: but being convinced by him, that his conversion was not only prudent, but necessary, and he making great offers, and greater promises, she ordered Norris to remain there till her farther pleasure should be known. She then signified to Henry, that, upon proper terms, she was willing to continue her assistance, and to enter into a league offensive and defensive against Spain, as long as either of them should be at war with that crown. One of the conditions required by Elizabeth, who sent sir Robert Sidney upon this negotiation, was, that Brest should be put into her hands, as a place of retreat for her troops, and security of her money: but Henry neither would nor durst agree to this demand; and Elizabeth, after commending the protestants to his protection, and laying before him the danger of his sea-coasts, signed the treaty with him in August, and at the same time fortified the isles of Scilly, Guernsey, and Jersey.

Some of the above transactions, especially those in Scotland, exceeded the bounds of the year 1593, but as the succeeding one, 1594, affords very few events events of an interesting nature, I thought proper to throw the two years together, and shall only observe, that though Bothwell's undertaking in Scotland miscarried, it however produced a very good effect, by inducing James to alter his conduct, lest his vain projects should lose him the English crown. He therefore assembled the states, and prevailed to have the catholic lords, who had appeared too zealous for the Spaniards, to be banished the kingdom. They made some efforts to resist, but James marched in person to subdue them, and drove them to such extremity, that Bothwell fled to France, and the other lords were obliged to give security for departing the kingdom. This vigorous proceeding gave Elizabeth great satisfaction, as it took from the Spaniards all hopes of attacking her on the side of Scotland; and commissioners for both nations were named, about the latter end of this year, 1594, for putting an end to all disputes upon the Borders: and the queen, to give James a farther proof of her good-will, sent the earl of Suffex, in her name, to assist at the baptism of the new-born son of the king of Scotland.

The sweets of the Spanish plunder lately made in America, encouraged sir Richard Hawkins, son to the famous admiral of that name, to take out a commission under the broad-seal, for annoying the Spaniards there. He accordingly put to sea with three ships, and about two hundred men; but in a few days one of his ships was burnt, and another forced back to England: however he pursued his voyage with the ship that was left, so undauntedly that, in January this year, he entered the streights of Magellan, and from thence proceed to the South Sea, all along the coast of Chili, where he made several valuable prizes: but being attacked by two Spanish ships, under Bertrand de Castro, he fought them several days, till all his men being killed or wounded, he was obliged to surrender upon promise of life and liberty. But some doubts arising about de Castro's power to make such a promise, and the Spaniards being extremely solicitous to deter Englishmen from entering those seas, Hawkins was sent prisoner to Spain, where he was honourably discharged by the conde de Miranda, president of the council.

James Lancaster was another bold adventurer of those days; and about this time some English merchants, who had been plundered by the Spaniards, gave him the command of three privateers and a long pinnace, for cruizing upon the Spaniards. Being at sea, he had intelligence of a large Spanish East India ship that had been wrecked near Fernambuco, in Brazil, where the Spaniards were then busied in saving her cargo. Thither Lancaster, with Venner, another English commander, actually sailed; and, though they found the enemy prepared to receive them, they landed their men, and made themselves masters of the lower town and port, together with the wreck. The Spaniards, however, endeavoured to dislodge them, and for thirty days employed both force and stratagem to retake the place; but all was to no purpose, and the English made so much booty as loaded fifteen ships, with which they returned home.

The year 1595 was distinguished by many other glorious exploits of the English at sea, and in particular by sir Walter Raleigh's expedition to Guiana, the noblest that had been meditated yet by any Englishman. This was a large rich tract of land, rather possessed than inhabited by the Spaniards, and sir Walter had, at his own expence, sent one captain Whiddon to view that coast as much as he could. Upon Whiddon's report, Raleigh was confirmed in his resolution, and having publicly imparted it, it met with so much applause that the lord high-treasurer and the lord high-admiral of England contributed to his expences in fitting out a squadron for carrying the war into the very vitals of the Spanish empire in America. On the sixth of February, 1595, he sailed from Plymouth, and about the twenty-second of March he took the little city of St. Joseph, in the island of Trinidad, and made Boreo, its Spanish governor, prisoner. Upon the strength of the information he received from Boreo, he left his ship at Trinidad, and, putting about an hundred men in long-boats, he went about four hundred miles up the river Oronoque, but met with such insurmountable difficulties in the navigation, and from the climate, that he did not reap all the advantages due to such a brave and hazardous undertaking. It is certain, however, that he made great discoveries; but, notwithstanding all the pains he took, neither the public of that or this age, could ever be brought to believe the scheme of the English making themselves masters of Guiana to be so practicable as sir Walter Raleigh imagined. In short, at last he was obliged to return to the island of Trinidad, after firing the town of Cumana, which refused to pay him contributions, and threatening to do the same to St. Mary's and Rio de la Hacha, till they paid him large sums. The particulars of sir Walter's profits in this expedition are not very clearly set down; but, from the vast estate he amassed, and the many enterprizes he was enabled to carry on upon his own bottom, we may fairly presume, that in this and all other expeditions, the riches he acquired were much greater than he chose to own. Upon his return to England he was received with vast applause, and printed a pompous account of his voyage; though he could make but few proselytes to his opinion, he was however himself so firmly convinced of the facts he advanced, that at his own expence he fitted out two ships, and sent them, under Kemys, to Guiana, to make farther discoveries, and to assist the Indians, whom Raleigh had found very friendly, in throwing off the Spanish yoke.

And now, upon the general report throughout Europe, that the Spaniards were fitting out a more formidable fleet than that of 1588, to invade England and Ireland, Elizabeth reinforced her troops in this latter kingdom, to defeat the intentions of the enemy there, where the earl of Tyr Oen (or Tyrone) had already taken up arms in favour of the Spaniards: and at the same time she ordered two squadrons to be fitted out, on the public account; one to cruise in the British seas, to guard the coasts at all events; the other, consisting of twenty-six ships, under the command of sir Francis Drake and the famous admiral sir John Hawkins, to make a diversion in the Spanish settlements in the West Indies: on board of this last fleet was a body of land forces, commanded by sir Thomas Baskerville.

Notwithstanding the vigilance of the earl of Cumberland, who commanded the Channel fleet, don Diego Brocha, with four Spanish men of war, made a descent in Mount's Bay, in Cornwall, in the month of June this year, and burnt three small villages, the inhabitants of which, upon the first appearance of the enemy, fled up the country, and thus preserved their lives and effects. These were the only Spaniards that ever landed in England as enemies. This attempt, however alarmed Elizabeth so much, that they gained their ends by her detaining the ships designed for the West Indian expedition too long, for it was the twenty-eighth of August before they set sail from Plymouth.

Their first design was to attempt Porto Rico, where they knew a rich carrack was at that time stationed; but as they had not preserved the requisite secrecy, a pinnace, having strayed from the fleet, was taken by the Spaniards, and betrayed the intention of the English. Preparations were made in that island to receive them; and the English fleet, notwithstanding the brave assault which they made on the enemy, was repulsed with loss. Hawkins soon after died, and Drake pursued his course to Nombre di Dios, on the isthmus of Darien; where having landed his men, he attempted to pass forward to Panama, with a view of plundering that place: or, if he found such a scheme practicable, of keeping and fortifying it. But he met not with the same facility which had attended his first enterprises in the same parts: the Spaniards, taught by experience, had every where fortified the passes, and had stationed troops in the woods, which so infested the English with continual alarms and skirmishes, that they were obliged to return without being able to effectuate any thing. Drake himself, from the intemperance of the climates, from the fatigue of his journey, and the vexation of his disappointment, was seized with a distemper, of which he soon after died: sir Thomas Baskerville took command of the fleet, which was in a very weak condition; and, after having fought a battle near Cuba with a Spanish fleet, of which the event was not decisive, he returned to England. The Spaniards suffered some loss from this enterprise, and the English reaped very little profit.

Elizabeth, piqued at the behaviour of Henry IV. of France, who, by his submission to terms unbecoming a king, and tending to the ruin of the protestant interest, only to obtain the pope's absolution, shewed that he no longer considered the protestants as his friends; and by misapplying the English aids of men and money, convinced her that he regarded not her interest, recalled her troops from Brittany, and left him to manage his affairs as he pleased, without giving herself any farther concern. And, upon information that the states of the United Provinces had supplied him with a large sum of money, a considerable quantity of corn, and two regiments of soldiers, her majesty shewed her resentment at such an ill-timed proceeding, by ordering sir Thomas Bodley to demand a reimbursement of the money she had lent them, since they were able to make such large presents to the king of France, and to declare to them in her name, that, unless they forthwith discharged part of the moneys they were indebted to her, and gave her assurance of the remainder, within a certain time, she would take proper measures to do herself justice.

This unexpected demand threw the Hollanders into great perplexity, and in the end they were glad to submit to such conditions as her majesty thought proper to accept, which was the payment of forty thousand pounds per annum, towards defraying the expence of the English forces in their service; twenty thousand pounds per annum more till a peace should be made, and one hundred thousand pounds per annum for four years after its conclusion; and, on a farther condition, that they should join the queen's fleet with a certain number of ships, in case she should be attacked by the Spaniards*.

The late unsuccessful expedition of Drake and Hawkins against the Spanish West Indies, had given Philip II. so much encouragement, who had also this year gained many great advantages in France, and taken Calais and several other important towns in that kingdom, that he now openly declared his intention of invading England anew, and was actually busied in making vast preparations for that purpose. These considerations, with the rebellion Philip had fomented in Ireland, determined Elizabeth and her council to carry the war into the very heart of Spain, as the only means left for frustrating the ambitious projects of that monarch.

A powerful fleet was equipped at Plymouth, consisting of an hundred and seventy vessels, seventeen of which were capital ships of war, the rest tenders and small vessels: twenty ships were added by the Hollanders. In this fleet there was computed to be six thousand three hundred and sixty soldiers, a thousand volunteers, and six thousand seven hundred and seventy-two seamen; besides the Dutch. The land forces were commanded by the earl of Essex; the navy by the lord Effingham, high-admiral: both these commanders had expended great sums of their own in this armament; for such was the spirit of Elizabeth's reign. The lord Thomas Howard, sir Walter Raleigh, sir Francis Vere, sir George Carew, and sir Coniers Clifford, had commands in the expedition, and were named as a council to the general and admiral.

The fleet set sail on the first of June, 1596, and, meeting with a fair wind, bent their course to Cadiz, at which place, by sealed orders delivered to all the captains, the general rendezvous was appointed. They sent before them some armed tenders, which intercepted every ship that could carry any intelligence to the enemy, and they themselves were so fortunate, when they came near Cadiz, as to take an Irish vessel, by which they learned that that port was full of merchant ships of great value, and that the Spaniards lived in perfect security, without any apprehensions of an enemy. This intelligence much encouraged the English fleet, and gave them the prospect of a fortunate issue to the enterprise.

After a fruitless attempt to land at St. Sebastian's, on the western side of the island of Cadiz, it was, upon deliberation, resolved by the council of war to attack the ships and galleys in the bay. This was a plan of sir Walter Raleigh's, and was strongly seconded by the young earl of Essex, who burnt with an eager desire to signalize his courage on this occasion, and the point being carried, it was agreed that the attack should be formed the very next day, being the twenty-second of June. Raleigh, in the Warspite, was to lead the attack, and to be seconded by sir George Carew, in the Mary Rose, sir Robert Southwell, in the Lion, sir Francis Vere, in the Rainbow, vice-admiral Cross, in the Swiftsure, sir Coniers Clifford, in the Dreadnought, and by Dudley, in the Nonpareil, on board of which went the lord Thomas Howard.

The Spaniards were no less provident in their dispositions: they ranged their galleys under the walls of the city so as to flank the English ships as they passed; some culverins were planted to secure the channel of the harbour; and the artillery of both fort Philip and of the curtain of the fortification were brought to bear upon the English fleet. Besides the ships here mentioned, the Spaniards had put guns on board all their large galleons; and the whole reached from shore to shore, being covered by fort Puntal, which lay in the entrance of the harbour. All night there was an incessant cannonading on both sides, and at break of day, the twenty-second of June, the action began.

Sir Walter, as he advanced at the head of the English van, received the cannon of fort Philip, from the curtain, and from all the seventeen galleys, to which he answered with only a flourish of his trumpets, and intrepidly kept driving forward, to encourage those that followed him, to haste into play, and to engage those he passed by, while he attacked the body of the enemy. He, during the whole action, kept close to the enemy, and stood for the most part a-head of all; and at last, after a long and desperate fight, in which his ship was almost sunk, he, by the consent of the two commanders, who promised to second him, prepared to board the Spanish admiral the St. Philip, of fifteen hundred tons; but his intention being discovered, the admiral ran his ship ashore, and was followed by the other capital ships, two of which, the St. Matthew and St. Andrew, were saved by the English boats, but the St. Philip and St. Thomas were burnt, either by accident, or designedly to prevent their being taken.

During the engagement at sea, the earl of Essex, with eight hundred men, landed at the Puntals, and marched directly to Cadiz. Three or four hundred paces from the city he met with five hundred Spaniards, who, when they saw him, retired into the town, and were so closely pursued, that the English had like to have entered with them. The consternation was so great that before any measures could be taken for its defence, the English had time to force the gate, and throw themselves into the town; though they found some resistance in the streets, yet in half an hour they made themselves masters of the market-place. Then the garrison and inhabitants retired into the castle and town-house, but the same, or the following day, were forced to surrender. By the capitulation they were to have their lives, on payment of seventy thousand ducats, for which four principal citizens were given in hostage. The town being thus in the power of the English, the earl of Essex turned out the inhabitants, and then ordered to be carried on board a great quantity of silver, ammunition, and other valuable things, beside what the soldiers had plundered.

On the other hand, admiral Howard sent sir Walter Raleigh to burn the merchant-ships at Port Real. The admiral was offered two millions of ducats for their ransom, but rejected the offer, saying, he came to burn, and not to ransom the ships. Mean while the duke of Modena found means to unload some of these ships and fire others, to deprive the English of their riches. Besides the merchant-men, the king of Spain lost two galleons taken by the English, with above a hundred brass guns, thirteen men of war, eleven ships freighted for the Indies, and thirteen others; without reckoning the stores prepared for the intended expedition against England. The English estimated his loss at twenty millions of ducats.

Thus ended this memorable conquest, gloriously for the English, fatally for the Spaniard. No Englishman of note perished in it, excepting sir John Wingfield, who was killed in the town: in other respects the victory cost them but two hundred men. Besides the vast booty the Spaniards lost, and the ruin of their trade to the West Indies for this year, that proud and ambitious people were obliged to submit to the indignity of seeing one of their chief cities taken, and a noble fleet of men of war and merchant-ships, richly laden, destroyed in their own harbour, and that by an enemy, for whom they were, in full confidence of victory, at that very time publicly forging chains.

It is hard to account for the reasons which determined the English sea-officers to abandon this conquest, where the enemy's known loss was so very great: Essex, all on fire for glory, regarded this great success only as a step to future achievements; he insisted on keeping possession of Cadiz, and even offered to stay there and defend it in the name of the queen of England, provided he might have four hundred men and three months provisions: but neither this, nor his scheme for intercepting the carracks at the Azores, assaulting the Groyne, for taking St. Andero and St. Sebastian, were hearkened to, every one being impatient to return with their plunder to England. Soon after the return of this armament to England, which was on the eighth of August, the admiral, lord Howard of Effingham, was created earl of Nottingham; and this promotion gave great disquiet to Essex. In the preamble of the patent, it was said, "that the new dignity was conferred on him on account of his good services, in taking Cadiz, and destroying the Spanish ships;" a merit which Essex pretended to belong solely to himself (though in fact that success was principally owing to the courage and conduct of sir Walter Raleigh); and the earl offered to maintain his plea by single combat, against Nottingham, or his son, or any of his kindred.

The earl had also the additional mortification to find, on his return to court, so great a change in the ministry, by the advancement of his enemy, sir Robert Cecil, to the office of secretary of state, instead of sir Thomas Bodley, whom he had recommended at his departure; besides other slights cast upon his friends, that they convinced him that his credit was declining; and his uneasiness at it engaged him in such extravagant projects as cost him his life.

Notwithstanding the disgust which Elizabeth had conceived against the French king, and that prince's resentment of her refusing to succour Calais, their mutual interest was so inseparably connected in the war with Spain, that they agreed to open conferences for a treaty, which had been proposed before the Spaniards had reduced the towns in Picardy. The duke of Bouillon was sent over to assist Sancy in the negotiation; and English commissioners being appointed to treat with them, the league was soon after concluded, on condition that Elizabeth should furnish four thousand men for the defence of Picardy and Normandy, that the king of France should supply her with the same number in case her kingdom should be invaded; and that neither party should make peace without the other's consent. The States General acceded to this treaty, though their admission was retarded by the jealousy of Elizabeth, who pretended that they had no right to accede as a sovereign power, but merely as associated towns, under her protection; at length the French king prevailed upon her to wave this distinction.

Before we leave this year we must just mention the deaths of some great personages, which happened in the course of it, namely, Philip, earl of Arundel, who was condemned in the year 1589, but though his sovereign spared his forfeited life, death at last claimed his due; he had spent the time of his confinement in the utmost austerities of his religion, and left behind him only one son, named Thomas: Henry Carey, lord Hunsdon; sir Francis Knolles; and sir John Pickering, lord-keeper of the great-seal (so made upon the death of the lord-chancellor Hatton); he was succeeded by sir Thomas Egerton, master of the Rolls.

Philip of Spain, exasperated by the conduct of Elizabeth, and the losses he had sustained from the arms of her people, resolved to make another effort for the conquest of England. With this view, early in the spring of the year 1597, he assembled a formidable fleet, when the queen thought him utterly disabled from executing any scheme of revenge; and this navy having taken land-forces on board, at Ferrol, steered its course for England, but was dispersed by a violent storm, which rendered it altogether unserviceable for that season. The king of Spain had begun to treat privately of a separate peace with Henry; but the negotiation was altogether interrupted by the success of Porto Carrero, governor of Dourlens, who found means to surprise Amiens, though this advantage did not recompence Philip for the defeat of his troops at Turnhaut, by prince Maurice: nevertheless, depending upon a separate peace with France, he determined to make a descent upon Ireland, where he still fomented the discontent of the natives; but his fleet was again dispersed, and disabled. Almost all the native Irish in Ulster and Connaught being encouraged by his emissaries with hopes of assistance, had risen in arms, and Thomas lord Bourrough, was sent over with the commission of lord-deputy. Tyrone endeavoured to amuse him with excuses, professions, and proposals; but, instead of suffering himself to be cajoled by that crafty rebel, he marched against him, and took the fort of Blackwater: then he returned to Dublin, where he died; and Thomas, earl of Ormond, was constituted lieutenant-general of the army. This nobleman advanced against Tyrone, but his troops being in a miserable condition, he agreed to a truce for a few months, during which he expected to receive a reinforcement from England.

Elizabeth, in return, resolved to make an attempt upon Tercera, the principal island of the Azores, and, if possible, intercept the Spanish flota, in their passage from the West Indies. With this view she caused to be fitted out a large armament, consisting of one hundred and twenty-two ships, with six thousand land-forces (of whom one thousand were veterans) on board. The management of the whole expedition was committed to Essex, with a command of one of the divisions of the fleet; the second division was committed to the lord Thomas Howard; the third and last to sir Walter Raleigh: Charles Blount, lord Montjoy, was appointed lieutenant-general under Essex; sir Francis Vere, marshal of the camp; sir George Carew, lieutenant of the ordnance; and sir Christopher Blunt, first colonel, or what we may now call brigadier. The chief volunteers were the earls of Rutland and Southampton, two noblemen who were very dear to Essex, the lords Grey, Cromwell, and Rich, besides many other persons of distinction; and on the ninth of July the whole fleet set sail together, and two days after sealed instructions were sent on board every ship, to be opened in a certain latitude.

The true destination of this fleet was first to Ferrol and the Groyne, where it was hoped to surprize the Spanish fleet in these harbours, and then to the Azores; but contrary winds, storms, and a fatal quarrel betwixt the earl of Essex and sir Walter Raleigh, broke these measures, and the fleet returning to England about the end of October, without performing any memorable action, and Essex not being able to justify his conduct in the expedition, he was highly blamed by the nation for his ill treatment of Raleigh; but Elizabeth, who saw in him only the valiant defender of her honour and authority, and not conceiving there was any danger in a mere compliment to console him for the public reproach, made him marshal of England, a post vacant by the death of George Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury; by which Essex, to his no small satisfaction, obtained precedency over his hated rival, the earl of Nottingham, lord high-admiral.

Towards the end of this year Elizabeth received certain intelligence that Henry of France and Philip of Spain, equally tired out with a bloody and expensive war between them, were desirous of peace, and that a private negotiation was actually on foot for that purpose. The queen could not, for some time, bring herself to believe a crowned head capable of so much falshood and perjury, after a treaty so recently made with herself, and solemnly sworn to upon the Evangelists by Henry, in the presence of the English ambassador; yet, fearing the worst, she called a parliament to meet on the twenty-fourth of October, this year, which she opened with a speech, acquainting them, "that she had reason to suspect that she was on the point of being abandoned by her ally, though he still pretended not to treat without her;" and concluded with giving them to understand, that she had expended in the wars of France, Flanders, Spain, and Ireland, above three times the amount of the subsidies she had received: whereupon the commons and convocation indulged her with a considerable supply; and this with so much unanimity and alacrity as shewed the nation ready to sacrifice their all in defence of their beloved queen.

In this parliament, which, after enacting several excellent laws, was dissolved in February following, the commons ventured to engage in two controversies, about forms, with the house of peers; a prelude to those encroachments, which, as they assumed assumed more courage, they afterwards made upon the prerogatives of the crown. They complained, that the lords failed in civility to them, by receiving their messages sitting with their hats on, and that the keeper returned an answer in the same negligent posture: but the upper house proved, to their full satisfaction, that they were not intitled, by custom and the use of parliament, to any more respect. Some amendments had been made by the lords on a bill sent up by the commons, and these amendments were wrote on parchment, and returned with the bill to the commons: the lower house took umbrage at the novelty; they pretended, that these amendments ought to have been wrote on paper, and not on parchment; and they complained of this innovation to the peers. The peers replied, that they expected not such a frivolous objection from the gravity of the house; and that it was not material whether the amendments were wrote on parchment or on paper, nor whether the paper was white, black, or brown. The commons were offended at this reply, which seemed to contain a mockery of them; and they complained of it, though without obtaining any satisfaction*.

An application was made, by way of petition to the queen, from the lower house, against monopolies, an abuse which had risen to an enormous height: and they received a gracious, though a general answer, for which they returned their thankful acknowledgements. But not to give them too great encouragement in such applications, she told them in the speech which she delivered at their dissolution, "That, with regard to these patents, she hoped that her dutiful and loving subjects would not take away her prerogative, which is the chief flower in her garden, and the principal and head pearl in her crown and diadem: but that they would rather leave the matter to her disposal." The commons also took notice, this session, of some transactions in the court of high-commission, but not till they had previously received permission from her majesty for that purpose.

Elizabeth having had her hands strengthened by the bounty of her subjects at home, deputed Thomas Wilks, sir Robert Cecil, the new secretary, and sir John Herbert, master of requests, as her ambassadors to Henry, to demand of that prince upon what terms the negociation stood with Spain; to which Henry answered in very general terms, "That he wanted peace, and that the welfare of his subjects, which he preferred to all other considerations, absolutely required it; and that, as the king of Spain offered to restore all places taken by him in France, he could not reject the offer without exposing his kingdom to utter ruin." This answer convinced the ambassadors that the peace between France and Spain was as good as concluded, without Henry having taken any care of his allies; and this drew from them, especially Cecil, some very severe reproaches on the ingratitude of that king: he produced the treaty he had signed in England; he mentioned the oaths by which Henry had solemnly bound that treaty; he cajoled, he promised, he menaced; in fine, he tried every expedient to divert Henry from the thoughts of a separate peace with Spain; wherefore, to avoid such disagreeable and mortifying conferences, the French king, instead of granting any farther audiences as they demanded, appointed commissioners to treat with the ambassadors in the beginning of the following year: but, after some time spent in warm altercations on both sides the French king, consulting only the good of his own people, concluded a peace with Philip of Spain, on the second of May, 1598.

This conduct of Henry exasperated Elizabeth beyond all sufferance, who was no sooner informed of the treaty being signed, than she wrote him a letter, in which, after several other severe expressions, she told him, "that if in temperal concerns there was any such thing as a sin against the Holy Ghost, it was doubtless ingratitude." Henry was stung with these reproaches, but excused himself upon the urgent necessity which forced him to make peace; and concluded with observing, that as he had hitherto been only a burden to the queen of England, he would, for the future, give her marks of his acknowledgement in procuring her a safe and honourable peace, and in never forsaking her interests. But these were only words, and as such were regarded by Elizabeth.

In this situation of public affairs, especially as the peace of Ireland was disturbed about the same time with a formidable insurrection under O'Neil, earl of Tyrone; and James of Scotland not only almost openly demanded to be declared the queen's presumptive heir, but seemed to be making his peace with the court of Rome, as appeared from an intercepted letter, subscribed with his own hand, and addressed to the pope; Elizabeth resolved at all events to support the Dutch, and never to accept of peace with Spain, till she could procure the states such a peace as should secure their liberty, lest she should oblige them to put themselves again under the Spanish yoke. The Hollanders, on their side, seeing themselves deserted by the king of France, were glad to preserve the queen's alliance by submitting to any terms which she pleased to require of them. The debt which they owed the queen was now fixed at eight hundred thousand pounds; of this sum they agreed to pay, during the war, thirty thousand pounds a year, and these payments were to continue till four hundred thousand pounds of the debt should be extinguished. They engaged also, during the time that England should continue the war with Spain, to pay the garrisons of the cautionary towns: they stipulated, that if Spain should invade England, or the Isle of Wight, or Jersey, or Scilly, they should assist her with a body of five thousand foot and five hundred horse; and that in case she undertook any naval armament against Spain, they should join an equal number of ships to her's. By this treaty the queen was eased of an annual charge of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds.

This treaty was ratified on the eighth of August, and shortly after Elizabeth saw herself delivered from her greatest fears by the death of Philip II. king of Spain, her most powerful enemy, who, at the age of seventy-two, and in the forty-third year of his reign, died a most dreadful death, being devoured by lice, which swarmed from innumerable ulcers in all parts of his body. This haughty prince, desirous of an accommodation with his revolted subjects in the Netherlands, but disdainng to make in his own name the concessions requisite for that purpose, he transferred to his daughter, who had married the archduke Albert, the property of the Low Country provinces; but as it was not expected that that princess could have any posterity, and as the reversion, in failure of her issue, was still reserved to the crown of Spain, the states considered this deed only as the change of a name, and persisted with equal obstinacy in their resistance to the Spanish arms; the other states of Europe also made no distinction between the courts of Brussels and Madrid; and the secret opposition of France, as well as the avowed force of England, continued to operate against the progress of Albert, as it had done against that of Philip.

Elizabeth's satisfaction at this event was, however, considerably damped by the loss of Burleigh, her most zealous and faithful counsellor. This great man had long and earnestly, but in vain, begged from his mistress some moments of interval between business and the grave, but death, on the fourteenth of August, gave him that repose which Elizabeth would not afford him: lord Burleigh was now on the verge of eighty, and though many ministers have lived with less envy, none ever died with greater reputation. If the reader is desirous to know more particulars of this great man, let him consult Camden; but the nature of a general history will not admit them here.

The loss of this able minister was sensibly perceived by a scene of distractions and divisions which succeeded in Elizabeth's councils, especially in respect to the affairs of Ireland, which seemed now to be in a desperate situation, and gave rise, about this time, to a troublesome affair at court. The earl of Essex had gained a great ascendancy in Elizabeth's councils, which was not a little increased by the death of lord Burleigh, who had been a constant bar in the way of his ambition, and who being now removed, Essex lorded it at court without controul. A cabinet council being called to consider of a fit person to be sent over to quiet the rebellious Irish, it was proposed to dispatch sir William Knolles, the earl's nephew, with a commission for that purpose; but Essex, jealous of sir George Carew, who seemed to be a growing favourite with the queen, and thinking this would be a proper opportunity to remove him from court, strenuously opposed his nephew's advancement, and urged sir George's with great warmth. Upon this a very serious debate followed in the cabinet, in the presence of the lord high-admiral, secretary sir Robert Cecil, and Windebank, clerk of the seal. Essex, in the course of the argument, shewed such a contempt for Elizabeth, that she could not restrain her indignation, and his arrogant behaviour, in disdainfully turning his back upon her, made her forget herself so far, that she struck him a blow on the side of the face: Essex, in a whirlwind of passion, raised by this gross insult, lost all his reason, and, clapping his hand to his sword, swore that he would not have taken such an affront from her father Henry. The lord-admiral, upon this, threw himself between the sovereign and her subject, and matters proceeded no farther at that time, only Essex withdrew from court, with a seeming resolution never to return. Egerton, at this time lord-keeper, wrote to Essex (probably by Elizabeth's orders), advising him to ask the queen's pardon for so disrespectful and daring a behaviour to her royal person; but the earl, deeply stung with the dishonour which he had received, wrote a very spirited letter to Egerton, in which he vented several warm reproaches against the queen: yet, notwithstanding this additional provocation, Elizabeth's partiality was so great, that she reinstated him, before the end of the year, in his former favour; and her kindness towards him appeared rather to have acquired new force from that short interruption of anger and resentment; and nothing, indeed, but his own indiscretion, could henceforth have shaken his well-established credit.

About the latter end of this summer, Walpole, an English Jesuit, and one Squire, both of them foolish ignorant fellows, consulted about killing Elizabeth; and Squire was sent over to England for that purpose, after receiving from Walpole a phial, which both of them believed contained a poison, that, if rubbed upon the pommel of Elizabeth's saddle, would kill her if she touched it. Squire, who first acted as an agent for redeeming some Spanish prisoners in England, and then as a helper about Elizabeth's stables, and lastly as a marine under the earl of Essex, not only besmeared the pommel of Elizabeth's saddle, but also a chair in which Essex used to sit, with this pretended poison, but all to no effect. In the mean while Walpole had advanced large sums of money to Squire, and was mighty uneasy about the success of his undertaking: at last, being persuaded that Squire had only made a property of him, he managed so that Squire was discovered, and arrested. Upon examination he confessed all he knew, and was then tried and hanged; but, to his last breath, he blamed the Jesuit, who, he said, had drawn him in, contrary to his own conviction; while Walpole, in print, as confidently denied the charge.

Before the close of this year, we must take notice of the return of that noble adventurer, the earl of Cumberland, from an expedition to the West Indies, in which he had taken Porto Rico, and sent away the inhabitants that he might convert it into an English settlement; but having lost a great number of men by the bloody flux, he reimbarbed his people for England, having reaped very little fruit from his expedition: in which he had plundered Lancerota, one of the Canary islands.

The fire of rebellion which Philip of Spain had kindled in Ireland, continued to rage violently even after his decease, insomuch that the English council were now sensible that nothing was left but to push matters with the utmost severity: it was therefore resolved, early in the beginning of the year 1599, to adopt the most vigorous measures against the rebels; and the queen cast her eyes on Charles Blount, lord Montjoy, as a man who, though hitherto less accustomed to arms than literature, was endowed with talents equal to that undertaking. But Essex, who had now recovered all his wonted influence with the queen, and was desirous of obtaining this government for himself, opposed the nomination of this lord, and drew a picture of the qualities required in a lord-deputy of Ireland in such colours, that it was plain he himself was the original he described; and such was the great credit and quality of Essex, that it bore down all opposition, and Elizabeth gave him the commission of lord-deputy, and thereby put him at the head of an army of twenty thousand men, all devoted to his service: nor was this all; his commission was more ample than any that had been granted to former lord-deputies, for he was empowered to continue, or end the war, as he pleased; even to pardon the earl earl of Tyrone, and other rebels; which was an authority never granted to any of his predecessors. But it was inserted in his commission, that, laying aside all other affairs, he should apply himself wholly to pursue and ruin the earl of Tyrone, the chief of the rebels: a clause founded on his own speech in council.

The earl was not long in setting out for his new government, and arrived at Dublin on the seventeenth of April. His first step there, was, in express contradiction to Elizabeth's orders, to make the earl of Southampton his lieutenant-general; the queen being displeased with that nobleman for having married without her permission, which men of quality in those times were accustomed to ask. On the other hand, instead of advancing directly against Tyrone, he wasted his army in pursuing the rebels of Munster, whom he drove into woods and mountains; and when, at the latter end of the summer, he was prevailed upon to march into Ulster, against the arch-rebel, he managed so badly that his vanguard, of fifteen hundred men, fell into an ambuscade, and were entirely defeated. This obliged him to demand a reinforcement; but though it was granted him, he fell into the same error he had complained of in council, against others, and granted Tyrone a truce to continue from six weeks to six weeks, till May of the ensuing year; with this condition, that either party should be at liberty to break it, upon giving fourteen days notice.

The queen, on receiving a letter from Essex with the news of this inglorious truce, was so highly provoked, that she could not help suspecting the earl of ill designs, and began to give some credit to those reports which charged him with aspiring to the crown, on a pretended right of succession from Edward III. by his great-grand-mother, who numbered among her ancestors Edmund de Langley, duke of York, and Thomas of Woodstock, both sons of that monarch.

Essex, understanding how greatly the queen was incensed against him, resolved to return to England, even without leave, to counterwork the efforts of his enemies at court; and his departure is said to have been hastened by a false report of the queen's being dangerously ill, and despaired of by her physicians. The friends of Essex advised him to land in Wales with the Irish army, which was at his devotion; but he rejected this counsel, and, leaving the administration of Ireland in the hands of the lord-chancellor Loftus and sir George Carew, he set sail for England on the fourth of September, with a few followers only; and on the twenty-eighth of the same month, he threw himself at the queen's feet, at Nonsuch, ten miles from London, where the court had resided for some days. Elizabeth was informed time enough of his arrival, to prevent any surprize to betray her intentions, and, according to her usual art, received him without any emotion, and with some marks of favour; but after some upbraidings for his irregular conduct, she commanded him to his own apartment till farther orders: he was afterwards committed to the custody of the lord-keeper, from whence some of his friends proposed to rescue him, would he have giving his consent.

However, this did not hinder them from exciting the people to an insurrection in his favour, representing him as the most accomplished lord

England ever saw since the foundation of monarchy, and in inveighing against the ministry, not without malicious reflections on the queen's conduct, as if she took no care of the Irish affairs, where the rebels, upon the news of Essex's disgrace, and the receipt of supplies of ammunition, provisions, and money, from Spain and the pope, had broke the truce, and committed great outrages on the English inhabitants.

Such proceedings extremely injured the earl, and increased the queen's suspicions of him; and therefore, to satisfy the populace that his confinement was just and necessary for the public peace and safety, she ordered his conduct to be examined in the Star-chamber, where it was unanimously condemned by all the privy counsellors; but no sentence passed upon him, only he was more narrowly watched in his confinement at the lord-keeper's house.

The earl of Tyrone in the mean time, having nothing to intercept his progress, reduced the whole province of Ulster to his obedience; and, being encouraged by a bull sent from pope Clement VIII. granting him and his adherents the same indulgences as those who fought against the Turks for the recovery of the Holy Land, he hoped to be soon master of the whole kingdom, had not the seasonable appointment of the lord Montjoy to the place of lieutenant of Ireland, and his wise conduct, put a stop to his rebellious designs, and checked the insolence of his adherents.

It was now the year 1600, and the forty-second of Elizabeth's reign, when she was agreeably surprized with overtures for a peace on the part of Philip III. king of Spain, who had succeeded his father Philip II. on that throne: these overtures were backed by the intercession of Henry IV. of France, and Albert, archduke of Austria, then in the Low Countries. The queen, willing to bless her subjects with peace, lent a ready ear to this proposal, and left it to the French king to nominate both the time and the place for the meeting of plenipotentiaries, which was settled for the month of May, at Boulogne.

On the day appointed, the commissioners met to open the conferences: those on the part of England were sir Henry Neville, sir John Herbert, Robert Beale, and Thomas Edmonds. The English had instructions, first, to demand the precedency, agreeable to the decrees of the councils of Basil, Constance, and others, and in no wise to give way in this respect to the crown of Spain; nevertheless, if any dispute should arise thereupon, the queen of England agreed that the same should be determined by the casting of lots, rather than break off the treaty; and for the rest, they were to propose the renewing the ancient Burgundian league, freedom of commerce, &c. The Spaniards could not be brought to quit their pretensions to the precedency, which they insisted on in so peremptory a manner, that without it they would not enter upon treaty. Hereupon the English made a proposition to wave the question of precedency, and to transact the business by writing and messages between them; or that the treaty might be intermitted only for two months, without being entirely broke off: but all was to no purpose; the Spanish ambassadors finding they could not carry their point, broke off the negotiation entirely.

The states of the United Provinces in the mean time were so far from having thoughts of a peace, that, that, even during the negotiations, they planned a design to reduce the sea-coast of Flanders to their subjection; and accordingly landing an army there, of fourteen thousand foot and three thousand horse, under the command of prince Maurice of Nassau, assisted by fifteen hundred English, headed by sir Francis Vere and his brother Horatio; these forces, on the second of July, gained the famous battle of Nieuport, where nine thousand of the Spaniards were slain, and the victory, by the valour of the English, fell to the Dutch; for so nobly did our countrymen acquit themselves on this occasion, that out of the fifteen hundred, eight hundred were left dead on the field, and of the remaining number, most part were deadly wounded.

During these transactions, pope Clement VIII. who had succeeded Gregory XIV. not content with taking part with Elizabeth's subjects in Ireland, resolved to try what mischief he could do her at home. Accordingly he dispatched two bulls or briefs into England; one addressed to the Romish clergy, the other to the people, in which both clergy and laity were forbid to acknowledge, after Elizabeth's death, any prince for their sovereign, who would not swear not only to tolerate the Roman catholic religion, but even to support it with all his power. This was in order to pave the way for the king of Spain's claim to the English crown, and the exclusion of James, whom the court of Rome hated as a protestant himself, and a friend to protestants.

While the popish faction were thus busy in England, they were no less industrious in carrying on their hellish plots in her sister-kingdom, Scotland. There the Ruthvens, sons of earl Gowry, beheaded in 1584, who was descended from Margaret, daughter of king Henry VII. and consequently stood next to king James in succession to the crown of England, conspired to murder that prince in their own house at Perth, where, on some pretence, they had engaged the favour of his royal presence as their guest. But the king escaped their deep-laid plot by a sort of miracle, even in the instant of its execution, by the timely assistance of sir Thomas Erskine and John Ramsey; the two Ruthvens were killed upon the spot, and such of their accomplices as were taken, suffered the punishment due to their atrocious villany. But it is now time to return to the domestic affairs of England.

The earl of Essex, who had been a prisoner six months in the house of the lord-keeper, began to repent in good earnest of his follies; and the queen at last suffered herself to be so far wrought upon by the earl's submissive letters, that she permitted him to retire to his own house, under the free custody of sir Richard Berkeley, who had orders to watch him; the same time protesting, that all that she did, or designed, against him, was for his reformation, not ruin; and there is no doubt but that he might have found means to be restored to her royal presence and favour; but his friends and domestics raised such cabals among the people by asserting his innocence, and insinuating that his life was attempted on false suggestions, that her majesty, who always endeavoured to remove the prejudices of the people against her, was obliged to bring the earl to an open trial before her privy council, to whom she added two earls, four barons, and four judges; not to condemn him to any infamous punishment, as guilty of treason or treachery, but only to convince him of having failed in his allegiance, and slighted her orders and instructions, through excess of vanity; in order to shew the prejudiced people, that she in this case had acted with moderation, and not rigour; and that the earl of Essex deserved a severer punishment than a few months confinement in a nobleman's house.

The accusations laid against him in this court were, "I. A contempt of the queen's orders in making the earl of Southampton general of the horse. II. His making knights, contrary to the express words of his patent. III. A neglect to pursue the rebel of Tyrone, though that was the principal end of his commission. IV. A secret conference with that rebel. V. The grant of a truce, very prejudicial to the queen's affairs. VI. The abandoning his government without vouchsafing to ask the queen's permission." Some inferences were likewise drawn from his disrespectful expressions in his apology, and from certain dangerous principles contained in a book dedicated to him, concerning the deposing of king Richard II.

Essex, when his turn came to plead in his own behalf, renounced, with great submission and humility, all pretensions to an apology, and declared his resolution, "never, on this or any other occasion, to have any contest with his sovereign; he said, that, having severed himself from the world, and abjured all sentiments of ambition, he had no scruple to confess every failing or error into which his youth, folly, or manifold infirmities might have betrayed him; that his inward sorrows for his offences against her majesty, was so profound, that it exceeded all his outward crosses and afflictions; nor did he retain any scruple of submitting to a public confession of whatever she had been pleased to impute to him; that in his acknowledgements he retained only one reserve, which he would never relinquish but with his life, the assertion of a loyal and unpolluted heart, of an unfeigned affection, of an earnest desire ever to perform to her majesty the best service which his poor abilities would permit; and that if his sentiment was recognized by the council, he willingly acquiesced in any condemnation or sentence which they could pronounce against him." This submission was uttered with so much eloquence, and in so pathetic a manner, that it drew tears from many of the spectators. All the privy counsellors, in giving their judgment, made no scruple of doing the earl justice with regard to the loyalty of his intentions; even Cecil, whom he believed his capital enemy, treated him with regard and humanity: and the sentence given by the lord-keeper (to which the council assented) was in these words, "If this cause (said he) had been heard in the Star-chamber, my sentence must have been for as great a fine as ever was set upon any man's head in that court, together with perpetual confinement in that prison which belongeth to a man of his quality, the Tower: but since we are now in another place, and in course of favour, my sentence is, that the earl of Essex is not to execute the office of a counsellor, nor that of earl marshal of England, nor of master of the ordnance; and to return to his own house, there to continue a prisoner till it shall please her majesty to release this, and all the rest of his sentence."

The earl received his chastisement with so much humility, that the queen, persuaded that his repentance was sincere, in order to convince him that she had not entirely withdrawn her countenance from from him, ordered his sentence should not be recorded, and was even pleased to remove Berkeley from him and leave him at his full liberty; but she advised him to be cautious of giving farther offence, and forbid him the court. Hereupon he immediately prepared to set out for the country, and, before his departure, sent a most abject message to the queen, by the lord Henry Howard, filled with all that fullsome flattery to which Elizabeth's ears were so accustomed, and with which they were never to be fated. On this occasion she expressed a most visible satisfaction, both in looks and words; however, she thought fit to return the earl this answer, "that she was not to be amused with empty words; but as he had so long abused her patience she would take some time to try his sincerity;" thereby plainly insinuating, that, with a little perseverance, he might appease her entirely; and in some measure directing him how to frame his conduct: but the impetuous temper of Essex hindered him from improving the advantage his sovereign's manifest partiality in his favour seemed to give him; on the contrary, he was so imprudent as to follow the interested and fatal counsels of his domestics and dependents, which ended in his final ruin.

In the course of this year Elizabeth treated with the kings of France and Denmark about the regulation of traffic; and some disputes subsisting between the English and Danes, touching the fishery on the coast of Norway, commissioners being appointed on both sides, met at Bremen, but they could not agree, and the matters were left undetermined. But though the trade of England thus received some check in the North, it was carried on with great glory and success in the most southern and eastern parts of the globe: and Elizabeth, for the increase of trade, the glory of England, and the improvement of navigation, was pleased to erect the East India Company, towards the close of this year, and endowed them with great privileges, as will appear by a perusal of their charter of institution, dated December 31, 1600, for the heads of which I refer the reader to the article Commerce, at the end of this reign.

The year 1601 began with the machinations of that restless spirit, Essex. It has been already intimated that the queen, by her behaviour on his submissive letters, had given him great reason to expect a revival of the royal favour, and he was now grown so confident, that he became a suitor to her for a renewal of the farm on sweet-wines, in which the chief part of his fortune consisted; and Elizabeth, whom age and infirmities had now rendered very touchy, immediately imagined that all his pretended humility was only to smooth his way to this grant, she therefore gave him a denial, attended with some slighting reflections; and Essex, who was always in extremes, flew from that of resignation to that of resentment; and he was so imprudent as to follow the interested counsels of several needy persons, who lived upon his bounty and in his house, and who, on the refusal of his petition by the queen, inspired him with a design to restore himself to favour by force, and to destroy all his enemies about the royal person. That unhappy nobleman came but too readily into such designs; and now kept open house for all anti-courtiers and malecontents: the chief of these were the earl of Southampton, sir Christopher Blount, sir Giles Merrick, captain Henry Lea, and Henry Cuff. They fomented his anger, and instigated him to violent measures. By this time the ministry began to mistrust that Essex entertained very dangerous designs; convinced the queen of the justness of their suspicions; and found means to have spies placed about him, who informed the court of all the earl's transactions.

Those who speak most favourably of the earl of Essex's project, say it was to seize the queen's person, and to drive his enemies from court, as had been practised in Scotland with regard to king James: but he seems to have had greater designs, since he sent Henry Lea secretly into Scotland, to solicit that king's assistance; probably to place him on the throne before the queen's death: thus much is certain, that, by his letters, he put James upon the only course that could ruin him with Elizabeth.

He acquainted him, "that whatever appearances the English court affected, there was a fixed design to introduce the infanta of Spain to the succession; that for this purpose all places of power, all posts of importance, were in the hands of those who were enemies to the Stuart family; that the lord high-admiral had the command of the army and navy: that Buckhurst had the power of the purse; Cobham was warden of the Cinque Ports; Burleigh lord-lieutenant of the North; Raleigh was governor of the islands of Guernsey and Jersey; and Carew president of Munster; all of them the most proper places in Elizabeth's dominions for favouring the landing of the infanta. He added, that the queen was so impaired in her understanding that she was incapable to act of herself, and was entirely guided by her ministers; that he was therefore necessarily obliged to proceed openly to defeat this conspiracy, and to send ambassadors immediately to England, to demand a public declaration of his title to the succession, and the removal of his enemies, creatures and pensioners of Spain, from the court and council: at the same time he furnished the Scottish king with proofs to be used by the ambassadors, to shew the truth of the plot: and he concluded, that it would be necessary to support his ambassadors effectually."

But this was not the only dependence of the ill-advised Essex, for he had now formed a select council of malecontents, consisting of Southampton, sir Charles Danvers, sir Fernando Gorges, sir John Davis, and John Littleton of Frankel. These were men who, by their quality or accomplishments, were well fitted to second Essex in his views. The rest of his friends, according to a list which he produced at Drury-house, the usual place of his council's rendezvous, consisted of one hundred and twenty of the first noblemen and gentlemen in England. Among other criminal projects debated in this assembly, one was, in what manner to take up arms; whether they should seize the palace, and force the queen to give up the enemies of Essex; or to seize the Tower of London, and bring the city to their devotion; or, finally, whether they should pursue all those measures at once? At last it was determined to drop the design of surprizing the court, and to make trial of his interest in the city. He was the more encouraged to this by being informed that sir Francis Smith, one of the sheriffs, was ready, with one thousand men of the trained bands, to espouse his quarrel.

While these treasonable consultations were carrying on, the government, who had private information of all that passed, ordered the guards to be doubled, and the lord-mayor received a message from Elizabeth, commanding him to take care of the peace of the city; at the same time sir Robert Sackville, son to Buckhurst, the lord-treasurer, was sent to Essex-house, under pretence of a visit, but in reality with a view of observing how matters stood there. Soon after Essex received a summons to attend the council, which met at the treasurer's house: by this circumstance, with the late unexpected visit from Sackville, he was sufficiently convinced that matters were now come to extremities; he therefore excused himself to the council, on pretence of an indisposition, and he immediately dispatched messages to his more intimate confederates, requesting their advice and assistance in the present critical situation of his affairs.

The conspirators having assembled at the earl's house, on the seventh of February, after many confused counsels, the wild project of raising the city was resolved on by the majority, and Essex determined next day, being Sunday, to appear in the church of St. Paul, while the people were at sermon, and, with two hundred gentlemen at his back, to demand the assistance and protection of the city of London against his enemies. The earls of Southampton and Rutland, the lords Parker and Monteagle, with three hundred of their friends and dependents, next morning approved of this resolution, which probably was betrayed by sir Fernando Gorges to Raleigh, who had a meeting together on the water. All the night between the seventh and eighth of February was passed at Essex-house in great consternation and confusion, and Elizabeth was punctually informed of every thing; for, early on Sunday morning, she sent the lord-keeper, the earl of Worcester, sir William Knolles, and the lord chief-justice Popham, to demand of Essex the meaning of his conduct. It was with difficulty they got admittance into the court-yard of the house, which was filled with a confused multitude of Essex's desperate dependents, who surrounded their idol. In this state he gave audience to the queen's messengers, who, on the part of the queen, offered him all reasonable satisfaction, if he was unjustly aggrieved. Essex, in answer, repeated all his complaints, not forgetting that his life had been sought by his enemies, who endeavoured to murder him in his bed, and that letters had been counterfeited under his hand and seal; and that all he did was only in self-defence. While they were thus arguing, they were interrupted by a disrespectful clamour of the multitude, who, after grossly reviling them, even threatened them with death; and Essex turning from them into another room, the apartment in which they were was immediately locked, and a guard set upon their persons.

Such an act of violence upon the queen's messengers was drawing the sword of rebellion and throwing away the scabbard: Essex was now strangely disconcerted; he was at once lost to all resolution, and to all conduct; and putting himself at the head of about two hundred ill-armed followers, rushed into the streets, crying out "For the queen! for the queen! my life is in danger!" and perceiving that the people only crowded to see him pass, without joining in his attempt, he cried,

"Arm, my friends, or you can do me no good." But all was in vain; and even the sheriff, of whose aid he conceived such expectations, no sooner saw him advancing towards his house, in Fenchurch-street, but he withdrew himself by a back-door to the lord-mayor: which disappointment convinced the earl that his affairs were desperate. During the time he continued at the sheriff's house, in a state of uncertainty how to act, word was brought him, that an herald and Thomas, lord Burleigh, had proclaimed him a traitor in one of the wards of the city, and that the earl of Cumberland had done the same in another. He then quitted the sheriff's house, and proclaimed in the streets, as he strolled with his little army, "that England was going to be delivered to the infanta of Spain;" and conjured the inhabitants to take arms for the prevention of so great a misfortune. But seeing no body preparing to assist him, and hearing withal that the lord-admiral was marching against him with a strong party, he resolved to return to his own house, had he not been intercepted by sir John Leveson, and his company of soldiers, who had secured the post at Ludgate. Here the earl gave orders to Gorges to go and release the three counselors from their confinement in Drury-house, and retired back to St. Paul's: however, finding no way to retreat in safety through the streets, which, by the care of the bishop of London, were by this time chained and guarded by soldiers, he ordered Blount to begin the attack, and to force a passage, and seconded him with great resolution, sword in hand; in which skirmish Blount was taken prisoner, and the earl was repulsed and shot through the hat, which obliged him to take boat at Queenhithe, and retire to his own house near Temple Bar, where Devereux-court and Essex-street now stand.

He was now reduced to despair, and the lord-admiral, who surrounded his house with a large body of the guards, summoning him to surrender, he appeared determined, by the advice of the lord Sandys, to defend himself to the last extremity, and rather perish like a brave man, sword in hand, than by the stroke of a base-born executioner. But, after some parly, and after demanding in vain first hostages, then conditions from those without, he surrendered at discretion, requesting only civil treatment and a fair and impartial hearing. He and Southampton were immediately conveyed over the water to the archbishop of Canterbury's palace, at Lambeth, from whence they were next day sent to the Tower, and his friends were confined in other prisons.

The queen, who, during all this commotion, had behaved with admirable tranquility and presence of mind, soon gave orders for the trial of the most considerable of the criminals. The earls of Essex and Southampton were arraigned on the nineteenth of February, before a jury of twenty-five peers, the lord-treasurer Buckhurst acting as lord high-steward. The guilt of the prisoners was too apparent to admit of any doubt; and, besides the insurrection known to every body, the treasonable conferences at Drury-house were proved by undoubted evidence: sir Fernando Gorges was produced in court; the confessions of the earl of Rutland, of the lords Cromwell, Sandys, and Monteagle, of Danvers, Blount, and Davis, were only read to the peers, according to the practice of that age: Essex's best friends were scandalized at his assurance in insisting so positively on his innocence, and the goodness of his intentions, and still more at his vindictive disposition in accusing, without appearance of reason, secretary Cecil as a partizan of the infant's title. The secretary, who had expected this charge, stepped into the court, and challenged Essex to produce his authority, which, on examination, was found extremely weak and frivolous. When sentence was pronounced, Essex spoke like a man who laid his account to die; but he added, he should be sorry if he was represented to the queen as a person that despised her clemency, though he would not be believed to make any cringing submissions to attain it. Southampton's behaviour was more mild and submissive; he intreated the good offices of the peers in so modest and becoming a manner, as excited compassion in every one.

Essex, after condemnation, was visited by that superstitious devotion which always possessed his mind in all his disgraces. He was terrified almost into despair by the ghostly remonstrances of his own chaplain, Ashton, a fanatic preacher: he was reconciled to Cecil and the rest of his adversaries, and made a full confession of his conspiracy; he even gave the particulars of all his friendships and correspondences, in writing under his own hand: and upon his discoveries sir Henry Neville, Elizabeth's resident in France, was sent for over, and committed; as the lord Montjoy, whom he likewise accused, would have been, had not the greatness of his services in Ireland, and perhaps the fear of rendering him desperate, prevailed with Elizabeth to sacrifice her resentment to the public good.

It was natural for Elizabeth to have some remorse about taking off the head of a nobleman like Essex, who had done her signal services, who had been so lately the pride of her court, and the ornament of her kingdom; but, after all the ridiculous and romantic stories of her passion for him, it does not appear that she had ever considered Essex in any other light than as being a man of great birth and greater merit: but as he had now forfeited all he could claim from his former services, the sense of her own dignity, and the danger in which she thought herself, should he live, at last got the better of all considerations, and she sent, by the lord Darcy, a warrant, that he should die on the twenty-fifth of February, according to his own request, in the Tower court-yard, attended by Ashton a dissenting minister, and two divines of the church of England. Several noblemen, by Elizabeth's order, were present on the scaffold at the execution, with some of the aldermen of London, and chief gentlemen about court; among others Raleigh, the avowed enemy and rival of Essex, appeared; but this was thought so indecent, that he was prevailed upon to withdraw to some distance, whence he saw the only head in Europe better than his own, struck off. The behaviour of Essex in his last moments was full of penitence and contrition; but he had the misfortune to have a bungling executioner. He died before he was full thirty-six years of age.

Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, was a nobleman possessed of excellent and amiable qualities; brave, liberal, and humane; a patron of learning, in which he himself held a considerable rank: he was a warm friend, and an open enemy. His foibles were vanity, ambition, and an impetuosity of temper, to which he fell a sacrifice. His accomplices, Meyrick, and Cuffe, were executed, on the fifteenth of March, at Tyburn: sir Charles Danvers, and sir Christopher Blount were beheaded; Littleton, Orel, and sir Edward Baintoun were tried and condemned; but the first dying in prison, the others were pardoned. The earl of Southampton was detained in the Tower till the accession of king James, by whom he was set at liberty, and restored in blood by act of parliament.

The king of Scotland, when he heard of the earl's being apprehended, had dispatched the earl of Marr, and the abbot of Kinlochs, as his ambassadors to the court of England; and, by the notes with which they were furnished, we may conclude that he was interested in some project which did not take effect: but the earl being executed before their arrival, they pretended that their errand was to congratulate her majesty upon her happy success in quelling the late audacious attempt. Elizabeth affected to take the compliment in good part, and was even prevailed upon to add two thousand pounds a year to their master's pension. During their residence in England they managed his affairs so dexterously, that the majority of the council was won over to his interest, and among the rest secretary Cecil, who from this period corresponded with James by means of the lord Henry Howard. About this time Ostend was invested by the archduke Albert, and defended with incredible valour by sir Francis Vere, at the head of the English garrison. Henry IV. of France repairing to Calais, Elizabeth sent sir Thomas Edmonds, with a compliment to that prince; who returned it by the hands of the marshals de Biron, de Lavardin, and the duke d'Aumont. These noblemen were received at the court of England with great magnificence; and, though no part of their negotiation transpired, are said to have conferred with her majesty upon a scheme which Henry had formed against the house of Austria.

Upon Elizabeth's return from a progress which she had made during the summer, she convoked a parliament, which met on the twenty-seventh of October; and Egerton, lord-keeper of the great-seal, having given them to understand, that the wars in Flanders and Ireland had drained her majesty's Exchequer, notwithstanding every frugal method had been adopted, the commons indulged her with a more considerable supply than had ever been granted since her accession. In consideration of this supply, she issued a proclamation for repealing certain monopolies of salt, oil, starch, and other commodities, which were a grievous burden upon the people: the commons thereupon deputed eighty of their body, to present their humble thanks for this instance of her parental regard, which was delivered by Crook, the recorder of London, who had been chosen speaker, in a fulsome speech, which, in its flattery, approached near to blasphemy. The commons then passed an act for the relief of the poor; and, having made some other laws of public utility, were dissolved in the month of December.

In the mean time the queen was not without her troubles in Ireland. The Spaniards continuing their aid to the Irish rebels, sent them fresh succours under don Juan d'Aquila, who landed at Kinsale, with a manifesto, setting forth, "that queen Elizabeth had been deposed by the pope; that her subjects were, by the same power, absolved from their oath of allegiance; and that he was come to deliver them from the jaws of the devil." The Spaniards took the town; but, after a short siege by the lord-deputy, and having the mortification of seeing the rebel earl of Tyrone utterly routed in attempting to raise the siege, the Spanish general was glad to surrender, on condition that he might re-embark with the remainder of his men for Spain, which he did with all expedition, the capitulation being signed, and the place given up to the English, on the second of January, 1602. From this time the earl of Tyrone's affairs daily declined, which was chiefly owing to the lord-deputy's close pursuit of him, without giving him the least opportunity to recruit or breathe.

Spaniards

The remaining events of this reign are neither very numerous nor important. The queen, finding that the Spaniards had involved her in so much trouble, by fomenting and assisting the Irish rebellion, resolved to give them employment at home; and, in the spring of the year 1602, she fitted out a squadron of nine ships, under sir Richard Levesson, admiral, and sir William Monson, vice-admiral, whom she sent on an expedition to the coast of Spain. The admiral, with part of the squadron, met the galleons, loaded with treasure, but was not strong enough to attack them; the vice-admiral also fell in with some very rich ships, but they escaped for a like reason: and these two brave officers, that their expedition might not be entirely fruitless, hereupon resolved to attack the harbour of Coimbra, in Portugal, where they received intelligence that a very rich carrack had taken shelter. The harbour was defended by a castle; there were eleven galleys stationed in it, and the militia of the country, to the number, as was believed, of twenty thousand men, appeared in arms on shore: yet, notwithstanding these obstacles, and others derived from the winds and tides, the English squadron broke into the harbour, dismounted the guns of the castle, sunk, burned, or put to flight the galleys, and obliged the carrack to surrender. They brought her home to England, and she was valued at a million of ducats: a sensible loss to the Spaniards, and a supply still more considerable to Elizabeth.

In the beginning of this year, an ambassador extraordinary arriving from France, in order to regulate the navigation, which had been interrupted on both sides by depredations, the queen appointed commissioners to treat upon the subject, and all difficulties were compromised. The English minister at Paris had, in the name of his mistress, made a proposal to Henry of a league offensive and defensive, in order to drive the Spaniards entirely out of the Low Countries; but the finances of the French king were so disordered, and his kingdom so filled with malecontents, that he could not engage in an enterprize of such importance. The arch-duke Albert had made some advances towards a peace with Elizabeth, but she rejected them, lest the states of the United Provinces should be tempted to throw themselves into the arms of France: that they might be encouraged to maintain the war, she suspended their annual payment for two years, and allowed them to raise seven thousand men in England.

About this time a rancorous quarrel broke out between the Jesuits and the popish secular clergy in England, the original of which was as follows: one Blackwell, a man wholly at the devotion of the Jesuits, had by them been set over the seculars as their superior, who oppressed them in the most cruel manner; and when they appealed for redress to the pope, caused them to be represented as schismatics and heretics. Bitter pamphlets were published on both sides: whether this contention was serious, or a scheme to lull the government into security, while some great blow was preparing, is hard to say; it is however certain that the bishop of London politicly fomented this division, which at length rose to such an height, that the queen and her council finding them dangerous to the commonwealth, both parties were, by public proclamation, commanded to depart the kingdom forthwith. It was at this juncture that Henry IV. of France ordered the marshal de Biron to be beheaded, for having conspired, with other noblemen, to dismember the French monarchy. The marshal de Bouillon, who was likewise concerned in the conspiracy, retired to Germany, where he solicited Elizabeth's intercession with his master; and she, by her ambassador, hinted that this might be a Spanish stratagem, to infect him with suspicions of his best subjects. But that prince told the English ambassador, his mistress had a better opinion of Bouillon than he deserved, inasmuch as he had actually engaged in the conspiracy of Essex, against her own person and dignity.

Towards the close of this year the affairs of Ireland, in consequence of Tyrone's defeat, and the expulsion of the Spaniards, hastened to a settlement, and by the vigilance and activity of Montjoy, the lord-lieutenant, that arch-rebel and his friends were driven to the utmost extremity; and many of them, after skulking like wild beasts in woods and morasses, submitted to mercy, and received such conditions as the lord-deputy was pleased to impose on them, which were so mild and generous, that Tyrone himself, seeing all hopes, either of succeeding or escaping, vanish, applied in the most abject strain both to Elizabeth and the deputy for pardon. The queen was for a long time obstinately bent not to shew him the least favour; but being continually teized by her council, who represented the immense expence she was at in keeping troops in Ireland to follow the rebels, and this clemency would be an infallible means of making every thing quiet, she was at last prevailed upon to sign his pardon, and send it to the lord Montjoy, with power to grant it upon certain conditions, mentioned in his instructions: but this she did with so much reluctance, that it was deemed by many to be the occasion of that illness whereof she died. The terms to which the lord-deputy was restrained, were such as the council apprehended Tyrone would not accept; but his necessities were so extreme, that, on the thirteenth of March, 1603, he came to Mellefont, where he presented himself upon his knees before the lord-deputy, who received him with great pomp, surrounded by his principal officers, and seated in a chair of state. Tyrone then addressed himself in a submissive speech to the lord-deputy, who thinking that he stood too much upon his justification, ordered him to be silent, and brought him with him under confinement to Dublin. O'Rourk, another active chief in the late insurrections, surrendered about a month after; and thus this dreadful rebellion, which had raged in Ireland for eight years together, and had cost the queen near four hundred thousand pounds a year, was entirely suppressed, and the whole kingdom reduced to a state of subjection jection and tranquility. As for Tyrone, the lord-deputy kept him under a strict guard in the castle of Dublin, with an intention of presenting him to Elizabeth; but in this he was disappointed by the death of that glorious princess, whose eyes we are now to close.

She had, in general, been blessed with a very good state of health, and notwithstanding her age (near seventy) was continually hunting, or on horseback, without minding the wind, weather, or other inconveniences, though she always expressed a great fondness for life. It was about the middle of November, 1602, that she began to feel herself decay, though she affected not to let it appear, and would have her inauguration-day (the seventeenth of November) kept as usual, with feasting and great pomp. A slight cold confined her for a few days in the following months, but otherwise she seemed to be in good health.

On the thirty-first of January, 1603, she removed, in a very stormy day, from Westminster to Richmond. Here she began to grow worse, and was observed to be continually in tears, and labouring with some extraordinary affliction. She had used to be particularly careful of her health, but now she would take nothing, and obstinately refused all the remedies prescribed by her physicians. When the archbishop of Canterbury, Cecil, and others of her council, begged on their knees, that she would take what was necessary for her sustenance and relief, she desired them, in an angry tone, to let her die in quiet, as she had resolved.

All about her agreed that a deep melancholy, too strong to be either asswaged or diverted, was the cause of her illness; but they differed much in their opinions about the occasion of that melancholy: some ascribed it to the assiduity which she had remarked in certain of her counsellors, whom she had loaded with favours, in making their court to the king of Scotland, her presumptive heir, and some bitter expressions were heard to burst from her lips, as if she had thought herself helpless, abandoned, and betrayed by all: many imputed it to her grief for having put the earl of Essex to death. There is no doubt but she had felt a sensible regret for the loss of that great man; but it is not so easy to account how her grief came to break out so violently at this time: and though this may be reasonably thought owing to the weakness of her body disabling her mind to act with its former vigour, yet it is remarkable that it broke out on a sudden, after the death of the countess of Nottingham (which happened about Christmas last year), and her signing the pardon of Tyrone. These were coinciding events, and, without having recourse to the anecdote related by Osborne*, it may very well be supposed, that when Elizabeth found the suggestions of Essex's enemies, as if he had engaged in a traitorous combination with Tyrone, which was the chief reason of her putting the former to death, for what might else have been rather termed a riot than a rebellion, to be mere slanders; and that those very men had, after an infinite profusion of the blood and treasures of her subjects, obliged her to grant that rebel pardon, it could not but inflame her resentment at being deceived, and enhance her grief for the loss of a man so highly esteemed as she did Essex†.

Be that as it might, her anxiety of mind at last had so long preyed upon her frail body, that her end was visibly approaching, and the council had many serious deliberations concerning the succession. Though all the counsellors in general were firmly attached to James, yet they knew not what the secret intrigues of the popish and puritan factions might produce, and therefore reasonably thought, that Elizabeth's own declaration in favour of James would give vast strength to his title; but, lest she had been too weak to express herself, the lord-admiral declared, that before she left Westminster, she had, as it were foreseeing her own death, in private said to him, "My throne hath always been filled by a succession of princes, and ought only to go to my next heir." It was then thought proper, that the lord-admiral, the lord-keeper, and secretary Cecil should, in the name of the council, intreat her to signify her last will on that head. They found her almost speechless, but she had strength enough to repeat the meaning of her former orders to the lord-admiral, "that she had filled a royal throne, and desired to have a royal successor." Cecil thought that this declaration was not explicit enough, and urged her to a farther explanation: "I desire (said she) that a king should succeed me, and who should that king be, but my nearest kinsman, the king of Scotland?" And when these noblemen, on the day before her death, when her speech had failed, put her in mind of what she had told them, and desiring her, in presence of other lords of the council, to shew some sign of confirming what she had said to them, she accordingly put her hand to her head, in token of her approbation.

Although there was no great danger of any opposition being made to the Scottish succession, nevertheless the council thought expedient to take

* This fact, which has long been rejected by historians as romantic, but which late discoveries seem to have confirmed, was as follows.

The earl of Essex, after his return from the fortunate expedition against Cadiz, observing the increase of the queen's fond attachment to him, took occasion to regret, that the necessity of her service required him often to be absent from her person, and exposed him to all those ill offices which his enemies, more assiduous in their attendance, could practise against him; she was moved with his tender jealousy, and, making him the present of a ring, desired him to keep that pledge of her affection; assured him, that in whatever disgrace he should fall, whatever prejudices she might be induced to entertain against him, yet if he sent her that ring, she would, immediately upon sight of it recollect her former tenderness, would afford him again a hearing, and would lend a favourable ear to his apology. Essex, notwithstanding all his misfortunes, reserved this precious gift to the last extremity; but, after his trial and condemnation, he resolved to try the experiment, and he committed the ring to the countess of Nottingham, whom he desired to deliver it to the queen. The countess was prevailed on by her husband, who was Essex's capital enemy, not to execute the commission; and Elizabeth, who still expected that her favourite would make the last appeal to her tenderness, and who ascribed the neglect of it to his obstinacy, was, after much delay, and after many internal combats, pushed by resentment and policy to sign the warrant for his execution. The countess of Nottingham falling into sickness, and finding herself approaching towards her end, was seized with remorse for her conduct, and having obtained a visit from the queen, she craved her pardon, and revealed to her the fatal secret: the queen, astonished with this incident, burst into a furious passion; she shook the dying countess in her bed, and crying to her "that God might forgive her, but she never could," broke from her, and thenceforth resigned herself over to the deepest and most incurable melancholy.

every precaution for securing the peace and safety of the kingdom: great numbers of idle and suspected persons, who swarmed about the metropolis were seized, and sent to Holland for the Dutch service; the fleet, which lay ready equipped, was ordered to guard the mouth of the Thames; the sea-ports were all shut; and the lady Arabella Stuart was put into custody. It was resolved likewise to summon all the peers to town, and, if any commotion happened on the queen's death, to make the earl of Northumberland general of the forces. The queen in the mean time was in a deplorable condition, sitting dressed and pensive ten days, on cushions, without an hour's rest all the time, till, on the twenty-first of March, she was put into bed by force, and, though she then seemed to be better, she lay on her side without speaking to or regarding any body, only she caused some meditations to be read to her, particularly those of M. du Pleffis. The archbishop of Canterbury attending her on this occasion, she heard his exhortations, and joined him in prayer, with great humility and devotion. On the twenty-third of that month she was speechless all the day; and having in the night got a continued sleep of five hours, waked only to die in the calmest manner and almost insensibly, about two o'clock the next morning, in the seventieth year of her age, and the forty-fifth of her reign. Her corpse, without being opened or embalmed, was removed, on the twenty-eighth of March, from Richmond to Whitehall; but, on the pretence of her having given orders that it should not be cut up, or seen, after her decease, no body was suffered to see it, which occasioned some rumours among the people that hated her ministers, as if her death had been caused by violence. It was interred on Thursday the twenty-eighth of April, in the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster abbey, with great magnificence, king James having given orders that no expence should be spared in her funeral.

The best character that can be drawn of this princess is to be learned from the story of her life; and to add a multiplicity of general reflections upon her political conduct, after having already explained it in the preceding pages, would be tiresome and uninstrucive to the reader: let it suffice then to observe, that there are few great personages in history who have been more exposed to the calumnies of enemies, and more bedaubed by the adulation of friends than queen Elizabeth; and yet, there is scarce any whose reputation has been more certainly determined by posterity. Her vigour, her constancy, her magnanimity, her penetration, vigilance, and address, are allowed to merit the highest praises, and appear not to have been surpassed by any person who ever filled a throne; at the same time that we acknowledge she was often too rigorous, too imperious towards her dependents, and too little regardful of the constitution, or concerned for the liberties and privileges of her subjects: her prerogative, like the rod of Aaron, swallowed up whatever came in competition with it; and she thought that her people were entitled to no more liberty than their ancestors enjoyed. She was remarkably happy in the choice of her statesmen and generals, whom she directed by her good sense, and animated by her high spirit. Her abilities for government were never questioned by any one; her application to public business was extraordinary;

but her prudence was in many cases the effect of low cunning, and of the diffidence or jealousy of her nature; and her measures were often such as morality could not approve, however politics might represent them as necessary.

Elizabeth is described by those who knew her, to have been as to her person handsome, well-made, strongly limbed, rather tall than middle-sized, her forehead high and round, her eyes brown and lively, her complexion fair, her hair of a lightish yellow, her fingers long and taper, her voice clear and shrill: she had a fine set of teeth, and her outward form was much set off by an air that was very agreeable. She was fond of being thought learned: she spoke with great fluency the Greek, Latin, Italian, and French languages, understood the Spanish, and translated several of the ancient writers with judgment and fidelity. Whether she died a virgin was a problem much handled in those days; but, upon the whole, there appears to be very good grounds for the vulgar report, that she had about her person some imperfections, that rendered her very unfit for marriage. She was a great encourager of learning and learned men, as we shall have occasion to shew in its place. She was the great bulwark of the protestant religion. Her predominant passions were jealousy and avarice, the former of which hurried her, in some cases, into acts of tyrannic cruelty. Her vanity appeared in her love of flattery, which she greedily swallowed even when it was fulsome and absurd; and in the variety and richness of her apparel, which she continued to wear long after her declining years seemed to require more gravity and decency.

Her cruelty and jealousy were too conspicuous in the fate of the duke of Norfolk, and Mary, queen of Scots. Of avarice and parsimony she exhibited numberless proofs, in extorting presents from noblemen, on pretence of visiting them at their own houses; in allowing her ambassadors in foreign countries to live at their own expence, until some of them were ruined; and in carrying on the war against Spain at the charge of private adventurers. When she died, besides a vast quantity of plate and jewels, she left three thousand robes, none of which she had the liberality to distribute amongst her servants. She raised an hundred thousand crowns yearly, by granting licences to Roman catholics and non-conformists, exempting them from the penalty inflicted by the law upon those who did not regularly attend divine worship. She exacted every New-year's day above sixty thousand crowns, in gifts from her dependents. She entertained spies in all the houses of the nobility; encouraged informers; introduced the use of torture; enacted a great number of penal laws; and, by the terror of her suspicion, which was generally fatal to the object, drove many gentlemen into exile, that she might prosecute them to confiscation, and enjoy their estates. Her choleric disposition prompted her often to revile foreign ambassadors in the grossest terms; to insult her ministers and subjects in the most abusive language; and even to chastize her female attendants with her own hand. On such occasions she used to utter oaths and imprecations in the most vulgar style: and the ladies of her court did not scruple to follow her example. Her great art consisted in cajoling her parliament and people with flattering caresses; the sincerity of which they could not doubt, when they found themselves rich and and happy under her administration. But, as Mr. Hume very justly observes, in his history of this great princess, the true method of estimating her merit, is to consider her merely as a rational being, placed in authority, and entrusted with the government of mankind; and then, however difficult we may find it to reconcile our fancy to her in other respects, her qualities as a sovereign, though with some considerable exceptions, are the object of undisputed applause and approbation.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES.

In her third year, on the fifteenth of June, the spire of St. Paul's cathedral in London, the timber part of which was two hundred and sixty feet high, and the roof seven hundred and twenty feet long and one hundred and thirty broad, were burnt by lightening, as it was then thought; but a plumber confessed, on his death-bed, that it was set on fire by his carelessness, in leaving a pan of coals in the steeple when he went to dinner.

In her seventh year, on the twenty-first of December, began a frost, so extreme, that on New-year's day people passed over the Thames on foot; yet this great frost began to thaw on the third of January at night, and by the fifth there was no ice to be seen at all.

In her thirteenth year a prodigious earthquake happened in the east parts of Herefordshire; and on the seventeenth of February, at six o'clock in the evening, Marcle-hill, in the neighbourhood of Hereford city, was moved from the place where it stood, and continued in motion from Saturday till Monday following, when it rested. It carried along the trees, hedges, and sheep, that grew and fed upon its surface, overturned Kynaston chapel, which stood in its way, left an opening where it stood, forty feet in depth and eight ells in length, and formed a large hill twelve fathoms high, in the place where it rested.

In her sixteenth year was a great dearth, so that wheat sold for five and six shillings a bushel, and other things in proportion: and in her seventeenth year the Thames ebbed and flowed twice in an hour.

In her twenty-sixth year, being 1588, the like prodigy happened in Dorsetshire, as in the year 1571 had happened in Herefordshire; a field of three acres, in Blackmore, with the trees and fences, moved from its place, and passed over another field, travelling in the highway to Hearn, where it rested.

In her thirty-sixth year was a great plague in London and its suburbs, which swept off seventeen thousand eight hundred and ninety souls.

Of the State of Religion, Learning, Laws, Arts and Sciences, Commerce, Public Revenues, &c. in ENGLAND, from the Accession of HENRY VIII. to the Death of Queen ELIZABETH. Including a Period of Ninety-four Years, viz. from A. D. 1509 to A. D. 1603.

OF RELIGION, and of the CHURCH.

WE have upon many occasions, in the course of this history, shewn what dreadful blows the kings and parliaments of England had given to the papal power in this country, and how greatly the doctrines of Wickliff, and of other reformers, even before a general reformation was thought of, had disposed the minds of the people to what followed. The kings of England, however, by the tameness of those whose titles were disputed, and who were therefore obliged to keep well with the see of Rome, were stripped of many of their prerogatives over churchmen by the papal encroachments; but still a door was open for resuming them, and for reinforcing all the acts of parliament on that head: but even at the time of Henry VIII's accession he had some superiorities over the clergy, which no other prince in Europe besides himself enjoyed: Amongst others, in the case of a vacancy of a bishopric, the crown seized all the temporalities, and recommend to the see of Rome the person who was to succeed; upon the necessary instruments for this succession being expedited at Rome, the bishop elect was obliged, before the king, or his commissioners, to renounce every clause in those instruments that was inconsistent with the prerogative of the crown or the laws of the land, and to take an oath of fidelity and allegiance to the sovereign.

Had not Henry VIII. immediately after his accession, been intoxicated with the flattery of the popes and clergy, he might have made an excellent use of this part of his prerogative, by filling the sees of England with men of sense and virtue, who might in time have restored to the crown its prerogatives, and to the church its purity. But Henry was so far from this, that, during the first eighteen years of his reign, he acted in spiritual matters as an humble dependent on the Roman pontiff. He drew his pen in defence of the church of Rome, and sent deputies to the Lateran council, which had been convoked in opposition to that of Pisa: the pope, delighted with this instance of the English monarch's attachment to his cause, rewarded him with the pompous title of Defender of the Faith.

This, and other compliments, induced Henry to order all Luther's books to be called in; and a commission for that purpose was issued by Wolsey, by virtue of his legatine power, in the year 1521. In the same commission forty-two articles were excerpted from Luther's doctrine, and condemned: and in the year 1523 Henry granted a privilege for printing bishop Fisher's book against Luther; and he every day gave fresh proofs of his great zeal for the see of Rome. The pope imputed all this to the good offices of Wolsey, whose character the reader has already seen in the civil part of this history. No honour which the court of Rome could devise were thought too great for that ambitious cardinal, who cunningly made a property of each court, and indeed of all the courts of Europe. With his master he pleaded his vast influence with the pope; and the pope was lavish of honours upon him for his influence with his master; and the king of France with the Imperial court by turns courted and paid him for his influence with both. But the truth is, that Wolsey had great things in view, even from the commencement of his administration, for encreasing the power of the crown at the expence of the church's possessions. This scheme could not be effected but under the pretext of the vast dissolution of morals which had crept in among the clergy, of which Wolsey made most dreadful representations at the court of Rome: this drew from the pope a bull, empowering Wolsey to visit all monasteries, and all the clergy of England, and to dispense with all laws of the church for one whole year after the date of the bull. This bull in effect cancelled all the other powers of the clergy in England, and raised Wolsey to be pope in his own country.

Being then seated, as he thought, firmly in his power, he began to shew an extraordinary zeal against the doctrines of Luther, or the Reformation. In the year 1519, six men and one woman were burned at Coventry, for teaching their children the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and the Apostles Creed, in the vulgar tongue. Severities of the same nature were practised in several parts of the kingdom where the Reformation began to gain ground: this, however, was the only practice in which the cardinal and the clergy could agree. He assumed a power of calling convocations, and laying them under contribution; and when they complained of these encroachments, he threatened them with a general visitation. He was supported in these arbitrary proceedings by the king, who reaped the fruits of his exaction, and began to hold the persons of the clergy in contempt, on account of their ignorance and profligacy. Nevertheless, he still retained his attachment to the old religion: when Luther, at the desire of his patron, the elector of Saxony, wrote a letter to the king of England, excusing the acrimony and abuse with which he had treated him in his writings, Henry, in his answer, retorted the other's virulence in sarcasms upon his doctrine; and refused to forgive him upon any other terms than those of retracting his errors, renouncing his wife, and retiring from the world to pass the remainder of his days in penance and mortification. It appears, by a letter from cardinal Wolsey to the bishop of Winchester, that the first had formed a plan for the reformation of the clergy; and pope Adrian was so well disposed in this particular, that the German princes were encouraged to present him with the grievances of the church, digested into one hundred articles, containing the luxury, prophaneness, avarice, superstition, and pride of the ecclesiastics; but the good effects of the pope's moderation were prevented by the cabals and intrigues of his clergy; and in England Henry still continued to prosecute the Lutherans.

After Wolsey had been disappointed in his repeated attempts to be elected pope, he found it his best course to keep fair with pope Clement VII.

to whom he had been very instrumental in his election; and he obtained from the pope the prolongation of his legatine power during life. This gave him some notion of proceeding by his own authority, supported by that of the king, to dissolve some monasteries. At first, he pretended to pursue the plausible method of applying the revenues to the endowment of his colleges, one at Ipswich and the other at Oxford, which he had himself erected; but, upon recollection and consulting with his friends, he thought it would be dangerous for him to proceed to this by his own authority, and therefore applied to the pope, who granted him bulls for the dissolution of forty lesser monasteries, provided the king and other founders gave their consent, for an endowment of his two colleges. The cardinal made a noble use of this bounty, nor indeed is he indefensible in the measure, but by the precedent which it set. His scheme was to erect a college at Ipswich, as a kind of seminary where youth was to be fitted for his college in Oxford, which he designed to be a great and noble foundation: his plan was to have it built in the most magnificent manner, and furnished with all the most costly rarities of art and learning that Europe could afford, and its clear rent was to consist of two thousand pounds a year, besides a revenue for the entertainment of strangers, the relief of the poor, and other extraordinary charges of the university. After the patent for this establishment was obtained from Henry, Wolsey sent to Oxford, under his hand and seal a draught of the statutes by which it was to be governed; and, according to them it was to consist of the following members:

"The dean, subdean, sixty superior canons, and forty petty-canons; all to reside at their studies; thirteen chaplains, twelve singing-men, for the chapel-service. Public professors of the college and university; of canon-law, civil-law, physic, liberal arts, critical learning, private lecturers and tutors, to read philosophy, logic, sophistry, critical learning. Four censors, to enquire into the students manners and studies. Three bursers. Four rent-gatherers. Twenty inferior officers, and college servants. In all, one hundred and eighty-six."

The college itself was to have been built upon the site of St. Frideswell's priory, which was one of the houses dissolved to endow it. But on Wolsey's fall, all his grand design was dropped, and the foundation itself, with all its revenues, were forfeited to the king: who in part, however, pursued the cardinal's scheme, and the foundation is now called Christ-church College, and is provided with a dean, eight canons, three public professors of divinity, Hebrew, and Greek, sixty students, eight chaplains, eight singing-men, an organist, a school-master, an usher, forty boys, and twenty-four almsmen.

The reader will find in the civil parts of this history, such full accounts of the progress of Henry's divorce, and of those steps which induced and enabled him to shake off his obedience to the papal power, that I shall resume no part of those matters here, but content myself with opening to the reader the co-operative means which Providence furnished to second the great work of reformation. The displeasure which Wolsey saw he had incurred from queen Anne Boleyn, for his proceedings in the affair of Henry's divorce, made him very jealous of the Lutheran party, who he knew would omit no opportunity opportunity of contributing to his ruin, and he ordered Sampson, dean of the king's chapel, to have a strict eye over all Lutheran books brought into the court, lest Henry, by reading them, should get a relish of their doctrine. A book happened to be published at this time by Tindal, an eminent reformer of those days, entitled, The Obedience of a Christian Man, and was privately lent by the queen to Mrs. Guynsford, one of her maids of honour, who lent it to a young gentleman who courted her, one Mr. Zouch, in whose hands Sampson seized the book, and delivered it to the cardinal. This discovery alarmed the queen and all concerned; it being a matter which touched their lives; and the queen, to prevent any bad impressions upon Henry, threw herself at his feet, and with tears and entreaties obtained from him an order that the book should be restored to her: after this she threw herself again at his feet, intreating him to read it, which Henry consenting to, he is said from that time to have taken the resolution of disclaiming many doctrines, as well as throwing off the supremacy of the Romish church. Till then he had entertained a notion, that the doctrines of the Lutherans tended to rebellion as well as heresy; but this book, which is written in a more dutiful strain towards the civil power, than any published by the papists of that reign, convinced him of his mistake.

Upon the fall of Wolsey we have, in the civil history, seen the demands of Henry upon his clergy, and in what manner they subscribed the articles in which they owned his supremacy. Cranmer being appointed archbishop of Canterbury, the king deliberated with him about the suppression of the monasteries; and it was resolved that this should be preceded by a visitation, which, in all probability, would reconcile the people to the scheme, by bringing to light the vices and impostures practised in religious houses. Cromwell was created vicar-general, with such powers as suspended all episcopal jurisdiction; and the power he delegated to his deputies enabling them to confirm or annul the election of prelates, to suspend or deprive them, to convene synods, try ecclesiastical causes, pass censures, or grant pensions to such monks as might be willing to quit a monastic life; their instructions were extremely minute, touching their enquiry into the doctrines, morals, and behaviour of abbots and abbesses, nuns and friars; and they followed them with the utmost rigour, disclosing such scenes of vice, obscenity, and imposture, as exposed them to the detestation of all those who retained the least regard for decency and good order. After three hundred and seventy-six abbeyes had been suppressed, when a motion was made in convocation for translating the Bible into the English language, Gardiner and the popish bishops opposed it with all their power, till Henry himself ordered that the translation should be begun; and it was afterwards printed at Paris. In the mean time an English book, called The King's Primer, was published, containing the doctrines of Christianity, set forth in a plain familiar manner, and exposing the superstitions of the Romish clergy.

A convocation being held in the year 1536, to confirm the sentence against the king's marriage, the lower house presented the upper with fifty-nine opinions meriting reformation, extracted from the writings of Cranmer and the protestant party. After a long debate, they established a set of articles, called the Six Articles, concerning religion, some of which we have already mentioned under the reign of Henry, and the rest may be found at large in bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, but are too long to be inserted here. These articles were published, with a preface, by Henry himself.

The pope having summoned Henry to his council at Mantua, the king protested against the legality and proceedings of this assembly, and was seconded by the convocation of Canterbury. Hitherto he had acted under the sanction of this authority; but now Cromwell, as his vicar-general, independent of all restriction, published a set of instructions to the clergy, enforcing the late articles, and recommending order and discipline among the people. These were followed by a visitation and dissolution of the lesser monasteries (i. e. such as had estates not exceeding two hundred pounds per annum.) Bishop Burnet observes, that the full report of the visitation of those houses (previous to their suppression) is lost; yet he saw an extract of a part of it, concerning one hundred and forty-four houses, which contained abominations in it equal to any that were in Sodom. In some they found tools for coining; and, briefly, in almost all of them the greatest lewdness and wickedness. The lord Herbert says, that the yearly amount of all these lesser monasteries was thirty-two thousand pounds; but the king sold them at easy rates to enable them to keep up the hospitality which the monks had done, when they were possessed of them, adding thereto a penalty of six pounds thirteen shillings and four pence per month on the farmers and possessors of the monasteries and lands belonging to them, on failure of keeping up hospitality and husbandry therein: "but (adds his lordship) the penalty being not ordinarily required, due hospitality was for the most part neglected; for the forfeitures, being great, were, at the supplication of the parliament (21 Jac. I. cap. xxviii.) wholly abolished at length, by the indulgence of that king." Somewhat surely ought to have been done in time for preventing the poor from becoming so heavy a weight on the landed and trading interests, as it was easy to foresee they would become, on the suppression of those monasteries, whose kitchens were ever open to the poor of the neighbourhood. Had the purchasers of those church-lands, in every parish, been obliged by their tenures to support the poor thereof, or at least to contribute thereto in a much greater and fixed proportion than others, it would have been extremely reasonable, as they purchased them at very low prices: this would have been more conducive to the benefit of a free and trading people, than the lord Herbert's scheme, of annexing them all to the crown for ever, for enabling our kings to keep a good army and navy, without being obliged to have recourse to the people's purses from time to time: a dangerous scheme for a free people.

It is said that there were ten thousand monks and nuns dismissed by the said suppression of lesser monasteries, to seek their living where they could: to the men, if in orders, was given a priest's habit, and forty shillings in money; but to the nuns, only a gown, such as secular women wore. Some however, says lord Herbert, for surrendering their houses, got a small yearly pension. Now if the said ten thousand persons could not, whilst in their monasteries, spend less annually than seven pounds each on a medium, then the said estates were at least seventy thousand pounds per annum; which sum, by the increased value of lands, and other improvements in our days, equal to three hundred and fifty thousand pounds (at the rate of five to one) would be probably less than their yearly value at this day.

In the year 1538 was begun, and in 1539 was completed, the dissolution of all the remaining abbeyes, called the greater ones, and soon after those of Ireland.

Lord Herbert computes the total yearly value of them all (both greater and lesser ones) to be one hundred and sixty one thousand pounds; but this is far from being an exact account of their annual value, for the abbots and priors, foreseeing the impending dissolution, had raised the fines for leases very high, which brought the rents very low in consequence, that they might thereby have where-withal to support themselves when they should be expelled. Indeed the heads of these convents had, in part at least, long before fallen into that practice, that they might not be bound to entertain too great a number in their houses, whereby they must have enriched themselves.

The nameless author of a small folio printed anno 1689, with the title of The happy future State of England (said by many to be the earl of Anglesey), thinks there were in all about fifty thousand persons maintained in all the convents of England and Wales. Now if they were then maintained at seven pounds each person, their annual expence would be three hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which probably was about the then yearly value of their lands; and living being at that time five times cheaper than in our times, the total yearly value of their lands in our money would be one million seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds. And if, on an average, those lands be worth twenty years purchase (as being since greatly improved), then the now total value or purchase of all the said abbey-lands may be about thirty-five millions sterling. That anonymous author farther observes, that as Camden, in his Britannia (anno 1607), makes all the parishes of England amount to nine thousand two hundred and eighty-four; thereto may be added twenty-six bishoprics, twenty-six deaneries, sixty archdeaconries, and five hundred and forty-four prebends; these, joined to several rural deaneries, may make about one thousand more (though here our author seems to have forgot that the deans and archdeacons, as well as the prebendaries, have, almost without exception, at least one parish living, in some of which he may officiate (though but few) without entertaining a curate.) And (continues he) there being then (i. e. at the dissolution of the monasteries) in Oxford and Cambridge about sixty thousand students, who, in expectation of church-preferments, either as regulars or seculars, abstained from marriage, there were then in all about one hundred and twenty thousand persons restrained by their function from increasing and multiplying. As at present, double (he should, at least, surely have said treble) that number is in France; which consideration alone gives a considerable advantage to protestant countries in point of commerce as well as popularity. And reckoning that every marriage one with another produces four children (viz. two of each sex) those would more than double that number in the same age. This, we doubt, is not strictly true.

According to Camden's Britannia, the number of monasteries suppressed in England and Wales, first and last, was six hundred and forty-three, besides ninety colleges, two thousand three hundred and seventy-four chantries and free chapels, and one hundred and ten hospitals. It is now too late to lament the demolition of all the monasteries, two or three of which in every county (as being many of them spacious and stately edifices), would excellently well have served for county-hospitals and work-houses: much more should the overthrow of the colleges be lamented, since even the two illustrious universities of Oxford and Cambridge were included in the dissolution-act, and it was some time after, that the king was, with much difficulty, induced to continue them in their former condition. Yet so inconsistent was he, almost at the same time, as to found new and magnificent colleges in the said universities. And what shall we likewise say of the destroying of such as were real hospitals for the sick poor, the most innocent and useful of any kind of charity whatever? There was no one person in Henry's dominions who durst openly dissent from his system, except Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury; and we have already observed, in the civil history, that this prelate was screened from destruction by the personal affection of the king.

After the fall of Cromwell, the archbishop was obliged to proceed with great caution, and resolved to befriend the protestants, by gradually sapping the foundations of the Romish religion; he even made a motion in the house of lords for moderating the Six Articles, which had been the foundation of a most cruel persecution; and, though unsupported by the other prelates, he argued with such strength of reason, that the house agreed to the act of mitigation. He actually finished the draught of a code, intituled "Reformatio legum ecclesiasticarum," which he presented to the king at Hampton-court; and letters patent were drawn up for authorizing this digest: nay Henry, about this time, seemed bent upon a farther reformation. In a letter to the archbishop, he forbade the practice of creeping to the cross, and of several other superstitious ceremonies of popery. But his intention was partly frustrated by Gardiner, who, in a letter to him from the Imperial court, where he resided, gave him to understand, that if any farther innovations should be made in the religion of England, the emperor would never consent to a pacification. This was the true reason for dropping the scheme of the digest, in which Cranmer had made such considerable progress. Nevertheless, Cranmer, in obedience to Henry's commands, translated the Liturgy and some processions into the English language.

Henry himself was, indeed, very intent upon the great work of reformation he proposed in religion; and the sum of it having been drawn up in The necessary Erudition of a Christian Man, this book was published by authority, and recommended to all persons as a rule for directing their belief and practice. It contained a rational account of the Christian covenant, with an exposition of the Apostles Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, the Ten Commandments, and the sacraments; and though these last, and the doctrines relating to them, were asserted therein agreeable to what had been determined in the statute of the Six Articles, yet the worship of saints, pilgrimages, and other superstitions, superstitions, which had for some ages debased religion, were condemned: the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical matters was explained so as to prevent any just offence being taken at his title of Head; the pope's pretensions were refuted; the Holy Catholic Church was defined to be an aggregate body, "comprehending all assemblies of men over the whole earth, that receive the faith of Christ, who ought to hold in unity of love and brotherly agreement together, by which they become members of the catholic church:" and the unreasonableness of placing its unity in a submission to the bishop of Rome, is fully shewed. Sinners were taught to depend wholly upon the merits of Christ; unlearned people were exhorted to pray in their mother-tongue; and a foundation laid for a farther reformation, by declaring "every national church to be a complete body within itself, with power to reform heresies, correct abuses, and do every thing else necessary for keeping itself pure, and governing its members."

To complete his designs for the instruction of the people, Cranmer had prevailed upon Henry to cause the Bible to be translated into English, and published: it accordingly appeared in English in the year 1541, under the following title: "The Bible in English, of the largest and greatest Volume, used and appointed by our sovereign Prince, King Henry VIII. supreme Head of the Church and Realm of England, to be frequented and used in every Church within this his said Realm, according to the Tenor of his former Injunctions given in that behalf: overseen and perused, at the Command of the King's Highness, by the reverend Fathers in God, Cuthbert, bishop of Durham, and Nicholas, bishop of Rochester. Printed by Richard Grafton, cum privilegio ad imprimendum solum, 1541." The printing this Bible was looked upon as a great point gained for the Reformation; but still the fires of Smithfield blazed with the bodies of protestants as well as papists. Cranmer, imperceptibly, was gaining ground on many of the grossest absurdities of the church of Rome: he had wrote a preface to the lately published translation of the Bible, which had been translated by Tindal, and revised by Coverdale: and even Bonner was obliged to fix up six copies of the same in his cathedral of St. Paul's. In this convocation he proposed, with Henry's leave, that candles, silk habits, and other ornaments of images might be taken away; and he desired that each morning and evening a chapter of the New Testament should be read in every church.

Towards the latter end of his reign Henry became more and more arbitrary, both in spirituals and temporals. The archbishops of Canterbury and York, Bonner, bishop of London, and several other prelates, were fain to make conveyances in his favour of many manors belonging to their respective dioceses, upon very slight considerations; and these deeds were confirmed by parliament, which had already vested in him all the colleges, free chapels, and other remaining religious endowments. In the last year of his reign the French king sent over Annibault, his admiral, with a proposal for abolishing the mass in both kingdoms; and Henry relished the scheme so well, that he ordered Cranmer to draw up the form of a communion to be substituted in the room of it; but his death prevented it from being put in execution.

When Edward succeeded to the throne, the archbishop exerted all his influence to complete the Reformation. The king had been instructed by tutors who were attached to the protestant doctrines; and the protector openly favoured that religion. Cranmer was assisted by Barlow, bishop of St. David's, Ridley, afterwards bishop of London, and several other able preachers, who, by their zeal and elocution, contributed to the success of his endeavours. Gardiner perceiving, by the complexion of the ministry and the inclinations of the people, that he should be of very little service to the cause of popery by openly opposing the tenets of the Reformation, endeavoured to check the progress of them by representing to the protector, that all innovations during a minority would produce confusion and disturbance in the state, and proposing that matters of religion should continue in the state they were left at the death of Henry, until the reigning king should take the management of affairs into his own hands. Very little regard was paid to his insinuations. A book written against the corruptions of popery, and published by Harman, archbishop and elector of Cologne, was now translated into the English language, and printed at London by the direction of Cranmer. This performance made a strong impression on the minds of the people; which were farther enlightened by Marcat's Declaration of the Mass, and a Paraphrase of Erasmus on the New Testament, which were carefully translated, and published for the general use of the nation. Glasier, in a sermon at St. Paul's church, affirmed that the institution of Lent was no more than a politic law; and others preached against the other parts of the popish worship: but these were vehemently opposed by the inferior clergy, who derived their subsistence from the fees they received by the sacrament and other sacramentals, and chiefly by singing masses for the departed souls of the poor, for which they charged two pence a mass. These therefore were enemies to the Reformation, which would have deprived them of bread; and they were supported by Gardiner, Bonner, and Tonstal, who declared against all alteration in religion; but the chief of the party was the princess Mary, who now openly espoused the regulations of her father, and in particular the act of the Six Articles.

It may not be amiss in this place to give a short account of the English bishops at this juncture, extracted from the best authorities, as it will serve to shew the reader what difficulties Cranmer had to struggle with in promoting the Reformation.

Holgate, archbishop of York, Holbeach, bishop of Worcester, Goodrick, bishop of Ely, and Ridley bishop elect of Rochester, seconded Cranmer's designs: Latimer, who had quitted his bishopric in the late reign, lived in retirement with Cranmer at Lambeth, without being reinstated in his see: Heath, who had succeeded Latimer, was of any religion that could secure his own preferment: Thirlby, made bishop of Westminster by Henry, was an excellent courtier and a fine gentleman, but a strict papist: Skip, bishop of Hereford, was a time-server, though he had been raised by Anne Boleyn for his zeal for the Reformation: Day, bishop of Chichester, seems to have been a man of conscience, but inclined more to popery than the Reformation: King, bishop of Oxford, was always of the same religion with the prince upon the throne:

throne: Chambre, bishop of Peterborough, was a court bishop, and we know little of his principles: Tonstal, bishop of Durham, was a prelate of virtue and moderation, and well-affected to the royal supremacy, but was a papist in the belief of transubstantiation and other points: Goodrick, bishop of Ely, was, as we have already seen, a friend to Cranmer, but was too good a courtier to be so useful as he might have been to the Reformation: Sampson, bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, had espoused the royal reformation against the pope, but was a papist and time-serving prelate: Salcot, otherwise called Capon, bishop of Salisbury, was a worthless and mercenary man, and a papist: Knight, bishop of Bath and Wells, was looked upon to be a good statesman, but in matters of religion he seems to have been indifferent: Vesey, bishop of Exeter, minded little of religious matters, but supported great pomp and figure in life, and, upon a valuable consideration, resigned his bishopric in this reign; but inclining to popery, resumed it in the next: Bush, bishop of Bristol, was a man of learning and merit, therefore we may suppose him to have favoured the Reformation: Aldrich, bishop of Carlisle, was a man of learning, but a time-server, and in his heart a papist: Bird, bishop of Chester, though married, was a papist, as appeared by the encouragement he met with under queen Mary. Barlow, bishop of St. David's, had been advanced by the recommendation of queen Anne Boleyn to Wolsey, and continued his zeal for reformation; he likewise was married: Kitchen, bishop of Llandaff, was a mean mercenary prelate, and if he had any religion, it was popish: and the same may be said of Bulkeley, bishop of Bangor, and of Durphew, bishop of St. Asaph.

On the fifth of November, 1547, the convocation met, and Taylor, dean of Lincoln, was chosen prolocutor. Cranmer opened the assembly with a speech, in which he pressed the members to a farther reformation, that the remains of popery might be entirely laid aside. The lower house presented four petitions to the upper house, praying that the ecclesiastical laws might be reviewed and published, pursuant to a statute enacted in the late reign; that the clergy of the lower house might be admitted to sit in parliament with the commons, according to the ancient usage; that the corrections made by the bishops and others, in the offices of divine service, by order of this convocation, might be laid before the house; and that the rigour of the statute for the payment of the first-fruits might be mitigated. The attendance of the lower clergy in parliament had been two hundred years in disuse, and therefore no regard was paid to this petition. It was resolved, however, that some bishops and divines should be appointed to labour for the reformation of the church-service. In this convocation a motion was made for annulling all canons, laws, and usages, against the marriage of priests; and likewise all vows of celibacy; and a resolution taken to administer the communion in both kinds. This was immediately confirmed by act of parliament.

At the same time the privy-council published a proclamation, indemnifying all those who had omitted carrying candles on Candlemas-day, taking ashes on Ash-Wednesday, creeping to the cross, carrying palms, and other ceremonies of superstition. They likewise directed a mandate to the archbishop of Canterbury, for a general suppression of images; and this order was rigorously put into execution, though not without a dangerous opposition. Cranmer's next care was to form a committee for reforming the offices of the church: it was composed of eminent preachers and doctors in divinity, who proceeded with great accuracy and circumspection. A form being drawn up for the communion in both kinds, was published by the king's proclamation, and the book distributed to all the parishes of England.

The new Liturgy being established, and the act of Uniformity passed, another visitation was set on foot: the instructions given to the visitors imported, that in all parish-churches, the service should be read in a plain audible voice, as the people did not understand it while the priests retained the tone they used in reading Latin prayers: that some of the old rites should be abolished, such as priests kissing the altar, the practice of crossing, lifting the book from one place to another, breathing on the bread and shewing it before the distribution, praying by beads, and substituting a certain number of Ave Marias for one Pater noster: that the priest should exhort the people to remember the box of the poor; and that curates should catechise at least once in six weeks: that the communion should not be sold in trentals; and that there should be but one communion in one church, except on Easter-day and Christmas, when people came to the sacrament in greater numbers: and that no market should be held, or bargains made, in churches or churchyards, especially in time of divine service, or sermon. Cranmer at the same time held a provincial visitation, in which the articles were drawn according to the king's injunction. The council sent orders to London, to forbid special masses in St. Paul's church, and to take care that there should be only one communion at the great altar. Gardiner also, to whom the new Common Prayer and the other offices, composed by the committee, were extremely disagreeable, exerted all his eloquence and influence in exciting the people to reject such innovations; he was several times summoned before the council, and reprimanded, for the liberties he had taken in defending popery: at length he flatly told the protector duke of Somerset, that, as a bishop, he could not be answerable to his own conscience for omitting to preach upon the mass and eucharist, which he had conceived to be the principal points of the Christian religion. He was therefore committed to the Tower, and all his papers were secured.

In the year 1551, Cranmer and the other prelates of the Reformation, at the remonstrances of Peter Martyr and Calvin, the famous reformer of Geneva, were prevailed upon to suffer a revival and correction of the Book of Common Prayer. This was accordingly done, and some alterations were made in things which Cranmer had rather tolerated for the sake of bringing over the papists, than for any opinion he had of their efficacy. The use of oil and the sign of the cross were omitted in confirmation; as was extreme unction in the visitation of the sick; and the prayers for the dead, in the communion and burial services. Many other alterations also took place, to the discredit of transubstantiation; and some considerable variations were made in the forms of delivering the consecrated elements. Cranmer then, by order of the king and council, proceeded to draw up articles of religion, for greater greater uniformity of doctrine and practice: this was a favourite measure with Cranmer, and we have elsewhere mentioned the progress which he made in it. They were afterwards published, and differ only in some particulars from those authorized by Elizabeth in 1562.

In the last parliament of Edward, an act was passed for dividing the diocese of Durham into two bishoprics, one of which was denominated the see of Newcastle. The council afterwards appointed visitors, to make an enquiry about the plate, jewels, and other furniture, in all cathedrals and churches, and compare what they should find with the inventories made in former visitations, that they might know how far, and in what manner, it had been embezzled.

Upon the accession of queen Mary, all the deprived popish bishops were restored, and consequently the protestants, who had filled their sees, were set aside; and a letter was issued to the bishops, attended by a proclamation, forbidding all exercises of preaching and expounding the Scriptures, without the queen's licence: and one of Mary's first measures, after the parliament met, was to repeal Edward's laws in favour of the Reformation, and to restore religion to the state Henry VIII. had left it in. Another act was made against affronting priests, and another repealing all acts allowing marriage in the clergy. Upon the suppression of Wyatt's rebellion, the queen directed instructions to bishops for visiting their clergy. Those instructions inveighed strongly against the religion established by king Edward, and then proceeded to require, "that the bishops, and others having ecclesiastical jurisdiction, shall, with all possible expedition, put the canons and ecclesiastical laws in execution, which were formerly used in the reign of king Henry VIII. provided they are not contrary to the laws and statutes of the realm: that no bishop, or ecclesiastical officer, shall in any instrument of process insert the clause, "regia auctoritate fultus:" that the oath of primacy or succession, that is, the oath of supremacy, should not be imposed on the clergy at ordination or admission to benefices; with many others in favour of popery, too numerous to be here inserted.

After this, commissions were issued for depriving the bishops who had been favourable to the Reformation; and according to bishop Burnet, no fewer than twelve thousand clergymen, throughout England, were turned out of their benefices, on account of their being married. Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, were committed, by the queen's order, to the mayor and bailiffs of Oxford, where they were obliged to dispute with four popish divines in public, and treated with the most insolent partiality. Those who were imprisoned in and about London, drew up repeated addresses and petitions to the queen and parliament; and these being altogether neglected, their friends and partizans were inflamed into some indecencies against the government, which were productive of a severe persecution.

In the beginning of this reign a great number of English protestants retired to the continent, and settled in several places. Those residing at Franckfort were greatly influenced by John Knox, the Scottish reformer, who exclaimed against the English Liturgy, and was a violent assertor of purity in the church-government. These principles produced a schism among the English refugees:

those who had retired to Zurich disclaimed all such innovations: Knox and Wittingham consulted Calvin, who disapproved the English service. Nevertheless, they agreed to compromise the difference, and to compile a new liturgy from those of England and Geneva. Dr. Cox, however, with some other refugees, arriving at Franckfort, acquired a majority in the assembly, and fixed the imputation of treason upon Knox and his party. They supported the charge from parts of his own writings, levelled not only at queen Mary, but against the emperor, so that he was obliged to take refuge in Geneva; and Cox modelled the church at Franckfort according to the English constitution.

In the mean while the persecution, as we have seen in the civil part of the history, proceeded very warmly in England; and a resolution was taken, if possible, to bring into the universities a test for purging them of all protestants, and to prevent their admission for the future: this was done by way of oath, which being very remarkable, I shall here transcribe:

"You shall swear by the holy contents of this book, that you shall not keep, hold, maintain, and defend, at any time, during your life, any opinion erroneous or error of Wickliff, Hus, Luther, or any other condemned of heresy; and that you shall keep, hold, maintain, and defend, generally and especially, all such articles and points as the catholic church of Rome believeth, holdeth, or maintaineth, at this time; and that ye shall allow and accept, maintain and defend, for their power, all traditions, institutions, rites, ceremonies, and laudable customs of the said church of Rome as she taketh them, alloweth them, and approveth them; and that you shall generally and especially hold as the said catholic church holdeth, in all those articles wherein lately hath been controversy, dissention, and error, as concerning faith and works, grace and free-will, of sin [in a good work, of the sacrifice of the New Testament, of the priesthood of the new law, of communion under both kinds, of baptism and Christian liberty, of monastic vows, of fastings and choice of meats, of the single life of priests, of the church, of the canonical books, of the form of holding of matters not expressed in Scripture, of the inerrability of general councils in faith and manners, of the power of the church to make laws, of the church's sacraments, and efficacy of the power of excommunication conferred upon the church, of punishing heretics, of the sacrifice of the mass, of purgatory, of worshipping saints and praying to them, of worshipping the images of saints, of pilgrimages, of evangelical precepts and councils; and likewise of all other articles wherein controversy or dissention hath been in the church before this day."

It doth not appear that this oath was pressed more than one year; for, towards the end of the year 1557, the queen was so much exasperated upon being informed, that, notwithstanding all the severe methods that had been used, the number of English heretics was rather increased than diminished, that she issued out commissions that fell very little short of the inquisition. Among other sufferers, was John Rough, a Scotchman, who had signaled his zeal for the Reformation, both in his own country and in England, where he held a benefice in Yorkshire; the government therefore finding that he had enjoyed a local protection, ordered him to be tried before Bonner, who condemned him to the stake, and he was burned in Smithfield, together with a woman of the same communion. These, and the many raging inhumanities of this time, were principally promoted, as we have already seen, by cardinal Pole, who went to a ridiculous degree of zeal.

About this time, Weston, dean of Westminster, was prevailed on, or intimidated, to surrender the foundation of that house, which was again converted into an abbey, and the government of it bestowed upon Dr. Fecknam, dean of St. Paul's, who had under him fourteen monks. The queen likewise restored and rebuilt the convent of Observants, at Greenwich, in gratitude for their having distinguished themselves in opposition to her father's divorce from her mother: she likewise restored the nunnery of Sion, near Brentford, in Middlesex; and furnished the ancient monastery of Sheen, near Richmond, in Surry, with a convent of Carthusians. The fraternity of Knights Hospitallers of Jerusalem was refounded, and sir Thomas Tresham was made lord-prior; but he dying, that dignity was conferred upon sir Richard Shelley, whose preferment was confirmed by the pope, and he was the last grand-master of that order in England. Mary likewise re-endowed the hospital in the Savoy; and made an attempt to resettle the monastery of Glastonbury. Towards the end of this reign Pole gave out articles of enquiry for the visitation of his diocese of Canterbury, which regarded both clergy and laity, and were well calculated to promote the detestable persecution that then raged. The other chief ecclesiastical events of this reign are mentioned in the civil history.

Upon the accession of Elizabeth to the throne, all the ecclesiastical measures which had been taken in the last reign were reversed. Soon after the queen's coming to the crown, she, by proclamation, ordered the English Liturgy, as it was used in her own chapel, together with the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Epistles and Gospels, to be read in all churches and chapels throughout her dominions, in the vulgar tongue; her first parliament restored the first-fruits and tenths to the crown; the supreme government of the state ecclesiastical, and the Book of Common Prayer and Administration of Sacraments in the English Tongue, were also restored: and thus, by degrees the protestant religion was again established. The bishops that refused the oath of supremacy were all removed, and protestant bishops placed in their room. It was enacted, that all persons should go to divine service on Sundays and holidays; and a fine of one shilling was imposed upon every absentee, the same to be given to the poor. The queen, in virtue of her restored supremacy, prepared a set of injunctions, which contains so good an account of the declared sense of the church of England in matters of religion at this time, that I cannot refuse the reader a perusal of them.

"It was no where declared, either in the Scriptures, or by the primitive church, that priests might not have wives; upon which many, in king Edward's time, had married: yet great offence was given by the indecent marriages some of them made. To prevent the like scandal for the future, it was ordered, that no priest or deacon should marry without allowance from the bishop, two justices of the peace, and the consent of the woman's parents or friends. All the clergy were to use habits according to the degrees in their universities; the queen declaring that this was not done for any holiness in them, but for order and decency. No man might use any charm, or consult with such as did. All were to resort to their own parish-churches, except on extraordinary occasions. Inn-keepers were to sell nothing in the time of divine service. None were to keep images, or other monuments of superstition in their houses. None might preach but such as were licenced by their ordinary. In all places they were to examine the causes why any, in the late reign, had been imprisoned, punished, or put to death, upon the pretence of religion; and all registers were to be searched for it. In every parish the ordinary was to name three or four discreet persons, who were to see that all the parishioners did duly resort on Sundays and holidays to church; and those who did not, and upon admonition did not amend, were to be denounced to the ordinary. On Wednesdays and Fridays the Common Prayer and Litany were to be used in all churches. All slanderous words, as Priest, Heretic, Schismatic, and Sacramentarian, were to be forborne, under severe penalties. No books might be printed without a licence from the queen, the archbishop, the bishop of London, the chancellor of either of the universities, or the bishop or archdeacon where it was printed. All were to kneel at their prayers, and to shew a reverence when the name of Jesus was pronounced." Then follows an explanation of the oath of supremacy, in which the queen declared, "that she did not pretend to any authority for administering divine service in the church; and that all she challenged, was that which at all times had belonged to the temporal crown of England: that she had the sovereignty and rule over all manner of persons, under God, so that no foreign power had any rule over them; and if those who had formerly appeared to have any scruples about it, took it in that sense, she was well pleased to accept of it, and did acquit them of all penalties in the act." The next was about altars and communion-tables: she ordered, that for the future, for the preventing of riots, no altar should be taken down without the consent of the curates and church-wardens; that a communion-table should be made for every church; and that, on sacrament-days, it should be set in some convenient place in the chancel, and at other times it should be placed where the altar had stood. The sacrament-bread was ordered to be round and plain, without any figure on it, but somewhat broader and thicker than the cakes formerly prepared for the mass. Then the form of bidding-prayer was prescribed, with some variation from that of king Edward's time; for whereas to the thanksgiving for God's blessing to the church in the saints departed this life, a prayer was added, "that they with us, and we with them, may have a glorious resurrection;" now the words they with us, as seeming to import a prayer for the dead, were left out.

The queen next gave orders for a royal visitation of the clergy all over England. The commissioners were chiefly laymen, to whom she committed her whole supremacy. The English refugees now returned to their own country; the greater part of them with strong prejudices against the church-service; and several foreign princes interceded terceded with the queen in behalf of those dissenters, that they might be indulged with the liberty of a separate worship. This, however, she would never grant, though they enjoyed a toleration by her connivance. Dr. Parker was prevailed upon to accept the archbishopric of Canterbury; and the papists affected afterwards to ridicule the irregularity of his ordination, which they branded with the name of Nag's-head Consecration, because, after he had been consecrated at Lambeth chapel, the officers of the court of Canterbury were entertained at a tavern of that name in Cheapside: it appears, however, from incontestible evidence, that he was duly consecrated; and thus authorized, he proceeded to the consecration of other prelates, who were elected into vacant sees. Jewell, bishop of Salisbury, published a list of the absurdities in the church of Rome, and declared from the pulpit, that if any papist would make good a single proposition of those he had stigmatized, either from the Scripture, from the ancient fathers, or councils, he would give up the contest, and subscribe himself a profelyte. He afterwards distinguished himself by his Apology for the Church of England; and acquired great reputation for learning all over Europe.

In proportion as England, by the wisdom of its queen, enjoyed the blessings of peace and plenty, with the esteem and veneration of all its neighbours, religious heats increased within it. The prodigious influx into England of foreign sectaries, driven hither by persecution, had infused into many of the common people an inclination for the plainer modes of worship practised abroad; and several English noblemen, allured by the sweets of sacrilege, were so forward in encouraging such doctrines, that in a few years a formidable party was formed in England against the church.

This party, which was known by the name of the Puritans, as affecting strict evangelical purity in the doctrine, habit, and ceremonies of holy worship, was chiefly under the guidance of Thomas Cartwright, of the university of Cambridge, under whom, and the auspices of Theodore Beza, a foreigner, they greatly gained ground, and grew so troublesome to the queen and kingdom, by their writings and preachings, and publicly refusing to attend the divine service of the established church, or conform to any of its rites, that Elizabeth, to suppress them, was obliged, in the year 1569, to publish a proclamation enjoining uniformity of worship and ecclesiastical habits, and that all the books of the dissenters should be delivered into the hands of the bishops, or the queen's council, under pain of imprisonment to those who concealed them. Cartwright, however, still continued to publish pamphlets in defence of his tenets*. He was seconded by one Edward Deringe, who gave lectures in St. Paul's cathedral, and a presbytery was formed at the village of Wandsworth, on the model of the Geneva institution. Some dignitaries

* I have, in this note, given the reader the heads of his opinions, by which he will perceive the total sum of the objections of the dissenters to the church at this period.

"I. The names and functions of archbishops and archdeacons ought to be suppressed,

"II. The names of the lawful ministers of the church, such as bishops and deacons, when abstracted from the office described in the Holy Scriptures, are likewise to be rejected, and the whole brought back to the apostolical institution: and thus the bishops function ought to be limited to praying and preaching, and the deacons to take care of the poor.

"III. The government of the church ought not to be intrusted with bishops, chancellors, or archdeacons officials, but in the hands of the ministers and elders of the same church.

"IV. That the ministry ought not to live at large, but that every one ought to be tied to a particular congregation.

"V. That nobody ought to solicit for the function of a minister, nor stand candidate as it were for that employment.

"VI. That ministers ought not to be ordained by the sole authority of the bishop; much less are they to receive orders in a study, or such private place: but this office ought to be confirmed by a public choice of the congregation."

Besides these heterodoxies and misrepresentations of the government of the church, there were several unsound propositions maintained by Cartwright and his party; and of these the chancellor had an account sent him this year: these were ranged under the following articles.

"I. In reforming the church, it is necessary to proceed upon the first model, and to bring every thing up to an apostolical institution.

"II. None ought to be admitted into the ministry, unless qualified for teaching; and those who have no claim for this function, ought to forfeit their character, and be discharged.

"III. Preaching, praying, and administering the sacraments, ought to be performed by the same person: from hence it follows, that those who are ministers of the word, that is, those who cannot preach, ought neither to pray publicly for the congregation, nor administer the sacraments.

"IV. Popish priests have no authority to be ministers of the Gospel by virtue of their own ordination.

"V. Nothing but canonical Scripture ought to be publicly read in the church.

"VI. The church liturgy ought to be so formed for the public service, that no allowance should be left for private prayer or reading; but that all the audience should attend to the minister, whether preaching or praying.

"VII. That the office of burying the dead belongs no more to the minister, than to the rest of the parish.

"VIII. That all portions of Scripture, all names and distinctions of God Almighty, are to be treated with the same reverence and regard: and therefore it is against reason to enjoin the people to stand at the reading of the Gospel, or to bow, and pull off their hats, at the name of Jesus.

"IX. That sitting at the holy communion is as lawful and defensible a posture, as standing or kneeling; and, over and above, it is more convenient, because it gives a better image of a supper.

"X. That the sacrament ought not to be delivered in private places, nor by the ministers themselves, and much less by women and private persons, as baptism is sometimes administered to infants, and the Lord's supper to those in danger of death.

"XI. That to make use of the sign of the cross in the baptism of infants is a superstitious practice, and the customary reasons for the use of this ceremony, makes it still more intolerable.

"XII. It is very reasonable that the father should present the child to the church for baptism, and make a profession of what faith he intends to instruct him in; and that this ought to be done without representing, form, or answering, "I will," "I will not," "I believe," and so forth, in the name of the infant: neither is it to be suffered that the child's name should be given by a woman in the church; or that an ignorant one should engage for the education of the infant. By an ignorant one, is meant one not qualified to receive the Lord's supper.

"XIII. That in giving the names at baptism, all resemblance of paganism should be avoided; and besides, the names of officers should be declined upon such occasions, as that of Christ, Angel, Baptist, &c.

"XIV. That to forbid matrimony at certain times of the year is quite a popish fancy; but to take money for a licence within the times prohibited, is still more intolerable.

"XV. To give any persons liberty to marry without acquainting the congregation, who are the proper judges of the impediment (in case there should be any) is unlawful.

"XVI. The keeping Lent, together with Friday and Saturday, either upon motives of superstition, or otherwise, is unlawful; neither is it a sufficient defence to settle the keeping those fasts upon reasons of state.

"XVII. Keeping the holidays is unlawful, and so are fairs, upon the Lord's day.

"XVIII. These words, "Receive the Holy Ghost," at the ordination of ministers, is a ridiculous and wicked expression.

"XIX. Kings and bishops ought not to be anointed." Collier, vol. ii. p. 525, 526.

of the church took up the pen, and answered some pamphlets: a proclamation was issued for executing the laws against nonconformists, and some of the principal dissenters were suspended, deprived, and imprisoned. The severities exercised against them were chiefly attributed to archbishop Parker, who suspected them of practices against his person. He had always been a bitter enemy to their opinions, and now, perceiving they were countenanced by persons of high rank, he complained that the church had no friend at court but the queen herself. She ordered the lord high-treasurer Burleigh to make a severe speech in the council against nonconformity: she declared against the religious exercises of the dissenters, and seemed at this juncture inclined to a persecution; for ten Dutchmen and one woman were condemned to the stake for heresy, though the sentence was afterwards mitigated into banishment; yet two persons of the same nation were actually burned in Smithfield.

Hitherto the papists in England had lived free from persecution, nay they were even indulged with the liberty of solemnizing their own rites within their private houses, though against the laws then in being; but when that hot haughty prelate, pope Pius V. in the year 1569, fulminated his bull against Elizabeth, by which he deprived her of her crown, and absolved her subjects from their obedience and allegiance to her, the government, well knowing what vast swarms of missionaries were then in England, thought it necessary to redouble its circumspection upon the popish party. Many gentlemen of the inns of court were brought before the archbishop of Canterbury, and not giving a satisfactory account of their principles, were sent to prison. The gentlemen in the commission of peace all over England were obliged to sign an instrument, professing their conformity to, and belief in, the established religion; and in the next parliament, which sat in the year 1571, the law was enacted against those who brought into, or offered to publish in England, any bulls or mandates from the pope, &c. already mentioned in the civil history of this reign†: yet, for six whole years together, after this law was made, it was not executed upon any papist, till Cuthbert Mayne, a priest, and an obstinate maintainer of the pope's authority over that of the queen, was executed at Launceston, in Cornwall; and a country gentleman who had harboured him, had his goods confiscated, and himself adjudged to perpetual imprisonment.

Archbishop Parker dying in 1575, was succeeded in the see of Canterbury by Grindal, of York, a prelate of great moderation towards the puritans. In his first convocation, some articles for the regulation of the clergy were agreed upon; and in the summer after he made a metropolitical visitation. The articles of his injunctions manifest a becoming concern for the doctrines and worship of the church; but appearing too zealous for the puritans, the members of the Star-chamber, by virtue of their ecclesiastical commission, confined him to his house, and suspended him for six months from his jurisdiction. At length, however, he was restored to his functions, which he exercised until, finding himself pressed with age and infirmities, he resigned his archbishopric in 1583, and retired to Croydon, where he soon after died.

He was succeeded by Dr. John Whitgift, bishop of Worcester, a divine who had already distinguished himself by his learning and regard for the church of England. The beginning of his administration was pestered with the sect of Brownists, so called from their founder, Robert Brown, an English gentleman of Rutlandshire, who refused to join the congregation in any public office of worship, and out-did all the other puritans in railing against the church. Brown having written some pamphlets that were obnoxious to the ministers of the state and Gospel, Elias Thacker and John Copping, who had dispersed some of them, were prosecuted by the government, and executed for their crime. As to Brown himself, he was a poor unsteady wrong-headed man; he was saved from the gallows by being kinsman to the lord Burleigh; he next conformed, and then relapsed, and conforming again, had a benefice given him: at last he died in jail, into which he had been thrown for the breach of the peace: his sect, however, continued very numerous. But Whitgift was a prelate of great resolution, and pressed conformity as vigorously as the queen could wish him: finding the dissenters, among other things, had confined the queen's supremacy to a temporal jurisdiction, he took occasion to represent them to Elizabeth as agreeing with the papists on that head. Elizabeth could not brook the least opposition of this kind, and finding Whitgift to be a prelate according to her own mind, she remitted all ecclesiastical businesses to him, that she might be free from the importunities of the great patrons of the dissenters.

The first thing, therefore, that Whitgift did, was to press the clergy of his own diocese to subscribe to the following articles, which had been declared lawful by the civilians and judges of England.

"I. That the bishop, but no other inferior judge, may punish any person, ecclesiastical or lay, by a pecuniary mulct, for an ecclesiastical crime or offence, especially if he sees the party more afraid of such a penalty than the church censures.

"II. By the ecclesiastical law, the ordinary may set a pecuniary punishment upon such as absent themselves from divine service without reasonable excuse, especially when his absence proceeds from contempt.

"III. Some canonists affirm, that a bishop may make an ordinance, that an excommunicated person shall pay ten thousand pounds for every month he stands excommunicated out of contempt."

The pressing those articles raised such a storm of calumny against the archbishop as must have crushed him, had he not been powerfully supported by Elizabeth. After various tentatives to reclaim the dissenters, Whitgift at last gave the heads of them a meeting at Lambeth, in presence of the earl of Leicester and other ministers, who, though puritanically inclined, could not help deciding in his favour. Nevertheless, in the next parliament, a strong party in the house of commons joined in a petition to the upper house in favour of the nonconformists; but they were baffled by the vigilance of the archbishop, who prevailed upon the queen to quash all objections from the house of commons, and inflict farther severities on the dissenters; they were subjected to the oath "ex officio," as often as it should be administered, on pain of imprisonment. Cartwright was sent to the Fleet for refusing it; Udal, one of their preachers, was condemned to death; and Penry was executed for having written some satirical libels.

The other ecclesiastical occurrences of this reign are very inconsiderable; I shall therefore only observe, that the dissenters, who, like all other sects, increased under persecution, now swarmed all over England; and at last they disputed the legality of the ecclesiastical commission under which they had suffered so great severities, and the matter was solemnly argued at the bar, in an action brought by one Caudrey, a deprived minister: many learned arguments were produced on each side the question;

but the judges came to a resolution, that if the act of supremacy had never been made, the king or queen of England, for the time being, might establish such an ecclesiastical commission as was then in force, by the ancient prerogative and law of England. Some time after this, one John Greenwood, a priest, and Henry Barrow, a gentleman, were, to the shame of Christianity, executed for not thinking like the queen and her council; but Cartwright, relenting in his opposition, had some indulgence shewn him: and, in the latter part of Elizabeth's reign, the farther execution of the more sanguinary laws against dissenters were, for reasons of state, judged proper to be remitted.

OF LEARNING and LEARNED MEN in the XVIth CENTURY.

LEARNING, on its revival, was held in great estimation by the English princes and nobles; and as it was not yet prostituted by being too common, even the great deemed it an object of ambition to attain a character for literature: the four successive sovereigns, Henry, Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, may be, on one account or other, admitted into the class of authors. Queen Catherine Parr translated a book; lady Jane Grey, considering her age, her sex, and her station, may be regarded as a prodigy of literature; sir Thomas Smith was raised from being professor at Cambridge, first to be ambassador to France, and afterwards secretary of state. The dispatches of those times, and among others those of Burleigh himself, are frequently interlarded with quotations from the Greek and Latin classics: even the ladies of the court valued themselves on knowledge; lady Burleigh, lady Bacon, and their two sisters, were mistresses of the ancient as well as the modern languages, and valued themselves more on their erudition than on their rank and quality. But to be more particular:

Cardinal Wolsey may be said to have been the father of revived learning in England, in this century. He had before him the same which Leo X. the finest gentleman of his age, had acquired by restoring more than an Augustan age. In Italy, Bembo, Vida, Sannazarius, and more great poets and writers than ever appeared in any one nation at any one time, all found encouragement and protection, either from the bounty or through the example of his holiness. Painting, sculpture, and architecture, now started at once to that height from which they have been ever since declining. Wolsey had a soul exquisitely susceptible of the glory arising from a patronage, that gives surer immortality than power or titles can communicate. The learning of the English in general, at this time, was equally useless and heavy, and their taste none. Wolsey saw this, and had the virtue to attempt to improve the one, and introduce the other. He had himself as much learning as was sufficient for a gentleman, and more than was useful for a statesman. Mr. Guthrie, in his History of England, has favoured us with a letter of this great man, addressed to the masters of a school he founded at Ipswich, which does great honour to his style, his taste, and his judgment: it contains the method of teaching and education that was to be observed in that school; and it is no small reproach to English literature, that this piece, the most perfect of its kind that we know of, must have been utterly lost here, had it not been preserved in a foreign grammar, which, by great accident, fell into the hands of a late laborious antiquary.

I am pleased that I can here introduce the reader to some acquaintance with this curious piece, as it fully confirms the character of the cardinal's taste and learning. It is drawn up as a scholar, and at the same time as a gentleman would express himself, were it not perhaps in too princely a style: it is prefaced by a letter to his two schoolmasters, where he pays great compliments to their functions, and exhorts them strongly to the faithful discharge of their duty. He then lays down the method of education to be observed in his school, and orders the boys to be divided into eight classes: he orders those in the first class to be instructed in the eight parts of speech, and to be taught to pronounce the Latin in a full, open, elegant manner. The second class is to practise the speaking of Latin: every boy is to have a note-book, and being well grounded in his rudiments, he is to be exercised in translating some quick, witty, pertinent saying from English into Latin: they are in this class to read no author but their rudiments; though the masters are at liberty to teach them, if they pleased, Lily's Carmen Monitorium, or Cato's Distichs: "Nimirum (says the cardinal) formandi oris gratia." To the third class his eminency recommended the reading of Æsop, for the improvement of their ordinary style, because of that author's pure, neat, polite, and pleasant language: along with this study he recommends the learning of Lily upon Nouns, but without enjoining it. The fourth class is to read Virgil, that prince of poets, as the cardinal calls him; and he orders the masters to make the boys read the majesty of his verse aloud, in full sonorous tone. There is something so genteely expressed by the cardinal, when he comes to speak of the fifth class, that I cannot help transcribing and translating it: "Imprimis hoc unum admonendum censuerimus, ut neque plagis severioribus, neque vultuosis minis, aut ulla tyrannidis specie tenera pubes afficiatur. Hac enim injuriâ ingenii alacritas, aut exingui, aut magnâ ex parte obtundi solet."—"In the first place, I think it proper to put you upon your guard, that tender youth is not to be treated with severe whippings, or blustering threatenings, nor with the least appearance of tyranny; for by such usage a forward genius is commonly either quite crushed, or at least in a great measure blunted." After this preface, he recommends to the fifth class Cicero's Select Epistles, as being, in his opinion, the best book for obtaining the richness and copiousness of style. The sixth class are appointed to read books of history, such as Sallust, or Cæsar's Commentaries; and, by the bye, he recommends it to the masters to teach the students in this class, the knowledge of defective, anomalous, and heteroclite verbs, out of Lilly. The seventh class are enjoined to read the Epistles of Horace, with Ovid's Metamorphoses and Fasti; they are likewise to be taught composition of verses and epistles; to reduce verse to prose, and prose to verse; and to have always in the morning some specimen of their composition ready: and the cardinal concludes his directions to this class in the following amiable manner: "Interdum laxandus est animus, intermiscendus lusus at liberalis tamen et literis dignus. In ipsis studiis sic voluptas est intermiscenda, ut puer ludum potius discendi quam laborem existimet. Cavendum erit ne immodicâ contentione ingenia discipulorum obruantur, aut lectione prælongâ defatigentur. Utrâque enim juxta offenditur."—In the mean time the mind is to be relaxed, and labour to be mixed with diversions, but such diversions as may become a gentleman, and a man of letters. Pleasure is even to be mingled with study itself, that the boy may think learning rather an amusement than a toil. Particular care is to be taken not to hurt the genius of a boy by over-stretching it, nor to fatigue him by too long lessons: both extremities are hurtful." I cannot withstand the temptation of translating the whole of the section relating to the eighth and last class: "Lastly (says his eminence), when the youths, by such exercises, have attained to some knowledge of the language, let them then proceed to the higher rules of grammar, such as the figures, as they are laid down by Donatus Valla, upon elegance, and several ancient writers who treat upon the Latin tongue. In reading those works, we particularly recommend it to you, to endeavour to make yourselves masters of every passage requiring immediate explanation: as, for instance, suppose you were to give the plan of one of Terence's comedies, you are to preface it with a short account of the author's life, his genius, and his manner of writing; you are next to explain the pleasure and profit that attends the reading of comedies; you are then, in a clear but succinct manner, to explain the signification and etymology of the word, to give a summary of the fable, and also an exact description of the nature of the verse; you are afterwards to construe it in its natural order; lastly, you are carefully to mark out to your pupils every striking elegance of style, every antiquated expression, every thing that is new, every grecicised turn, every thing that is obscure, every etymology, derivation, or composition, that may arise, whatever is harsh or confused in the arrangement of the sentence: you are to mark every orthography, every figure, every graceful ornament of style, every rhetorical flourish, whatsoever is proverbial, all passages that ought to be imitated, and all that ought not. Besides, you are to take care in school, that your pupils speak as correctly as possible; you are to applaud the excellent, and you are to mend the incorrect; sometimes you ought in the English language to throw out a short ground-work for an essay; but let it be somewhat that is excellent: if you please, you are to lay before them certain short rules, by which they may more conveniently handle the subject assigned them.

To his zeal for the improvement of youth, the cardinal added all the qualities of a fine gentleman and a polite courtier. Erasmus, one of the best judges of wit and good-manners that ever wrote, in several of his epistles takes particular notice of his politeness and affability: he says, that his manners betrayed nothing of his birth; and that the public was not in greater admiration of his exalted fortune, than of his generous disposition. But it was not for Wolsey to confine his love for learning and the Muses to his own example and munificence, without planting those seminaries, which, in succeeding ages, were productive of many of the noblest fruits of learning. He searched for men of genius and letters, as the lord of a soil does for a rich mine: he employed no ministers but such as were scholars; and under his administration, the dignities of the law, the church, and of the state, were filled with men who had nothing but merit to recommend them. Dr. Clark and Dr. Knight were through him made bishops; Dr. Taylor was made master of the Rolls; Dr. Pace, one of the principal secretaries of state; Dr. Gardiner, who had a very fine turn for letters, was employed in several embassies; not to mention Cromwell and others, who by his means rose to the highest offices in the state, with a vast number of other promotions, equally just and generous.

Wolsey's house, like Cicero's Tulculanum, was a retreat to all men of letters, without distinction; they were welcome to his purse, to his library, and to his table. The study of the liberal arts, says the great author I have already quoted, when decayed and degenerated, was by him revived and renewed. Learning, whilst struggling with the patrons of ancient ignorance, was encouraged by his countenance, protected by his authority, embellished by his splendor, and cherished by his munificence. Whenever he heard of a learned foreigner, he settled on him a handsome salary, suitable to his merit, and invited him to England. He employed agents through all countries for making up a library which might vie with that of Ptolemy Philadelphus himself; and revived the study of the three learned languages, the Hebrew, the Greek, and the Latin, without which, to use his own expression, learning itself was but lame.

No mechanic ever worked with more labour in his profession, than the cardinal did with assiduity to adorn England with the luminaries of learning: he brought Matthias Calphurnius, one of the best Greek scholars of his time, from Greece, to teach that language at Oxford; and I am apt to believe it is owing to his labours that England can shew more great men than any other nation can in that language: though Erasmus differed from him greatly, both in political and religious matters, yet he allowed him a large appointment, and offered to provide provide for him, if he would come to England, either in the church or state: he was the patron of Ludovicus Vives, another learned foreigner, perhaps the best critic of his time, who lived some time in England at the cardinal's invitation: he appointed Lavinius, a pupil and relation of Erasmus, to be his private secretary, and gave him an education worthy his merit. I should tire the reader were I to enumerate all the other instances of Wolsey's regard for the polite arts; I shall therefore close this account of the cardinal with observing, that he did a thousand generous acts for the benefit of learning, for which his memory deserves all the immortality the pen can bestow.

There were many other persons of note in the literary walk during this reign; but it would too much swell our work to enumerate all their names and writings: we must not, however, pass unnoticed Dr. John Collet, dean of St. Paul's, and founder of the school there; nor William Lilly, born at Odiham, in Hampshire, who was first master of St. Paul's school, and composed a grammar of the Latin tongue, which goes by his name, and is still in use in several of our schools; John Leland, that famous searcher of antiquities, flourished also in Henry's time.

The short reign of his successor, Edward VI. furnished very few persons of note, either as swordsmen or scholars. Edward Hall, a barrister at law, wrote a chronicle of the union of the two houses of York and Lancaster, which was well received; and Thomas Sternhold, born at Southampton, turned into English metre the Psalms of David, as we now hear them sung in most of our churches.

During the reign of Mary, bloody and tumultuous as it was, we find several learned men, the chief of whom were John Rogers, a clergyman of Lancashire, who translated the Bible into English, with notes; and Henry, lord Stafford, son to Edward, duke of Buckingham, who, amongst other works he wrote, translated a book out of Latin into English, entitled, "Utriusque potestatis differentia," which book, as some think, was first composed by Edward Fox, bishop of Hereford: John Hopkins also translated several of the Psalms into English metre, which, with those of Sternhold, still continue to be sung in the church.

Revived and improved literature made one of the principal glories of Elizabeth's reign; England under her saw an Augustan age! Elizabeth herself translated several books, and was familiarly acquainted with the Greek as well as Latin tongue. It is pretended that she made an extempore reply in Greek to the university of Cambridge, who had addressed her in that language: it is certain that she answered in Latin without preparation, and in a very spirited manner, to the Polish ambassador, who had been wanting in respect to her; when she had finished, she turned about to her courtiers, and said, "God's death! my lords (for she was much addicted to swearing), I have been forced this day to scour up my old Latin that hath lain long rusting." Elizabeth, after she was queen, did not entirely drop the ambition of appearing as an author: and, next to her desire of admiration for beauty, this seems to have been the chief object of her vanity: she translated Boethius Of the Consolation of Philosophy, in order, as she pretended, to allay her grief for Henry IV's change of religion. As far as we can judge from Elizabeth's compositions, we may pronounce, that, notwithstanding her application and excellent parts, her taste in literature was very indifferent; she was inferior to her successor in this particular, who was himself far from being a just model of eloquence.

Unhappily for literature, at least for the learned of this age, the queen's vanity lay more in shining by her own learning, than in encouraging men of genius by her liberality: this province she left to Leicester, &c.

During this reign England produced a number of excellent poets, such as Spencer, Sidney, Donne, Johnson, Shakespeare, Beaumont, and Fletcher: Fairfax translated Tasso with great ease and elegance, and Harrington translated Ariosto with tolerable accuracy; Bacon acquired immortal renown by his philosophical writings; Camden excelled as an antiquary and historian. In this reign we owe to the patronage of the illustrious great who composed the English court, the strength of Jewell's reasoning, the inimitable style of Hooker, with the extent and variety of Raleigh's learning; it was under Elizabeth that Hobbes formed his first notions; and, towards the latter end of her reign, Cromwell drew his first breath, as if (says a modern author) it had been the will of Heaven, that she should not leave the world without bequeathing to it a spirit equal to her own.

L A W S.

H E N R Y VIII.

THIS king's first parliament sat on the twenty-first of January, 1510, at Westminster. Its laudable design seems to have been chiefly pointed towards relieving the people from the dreadful yoke under which they groaned, through the infamous revival of the penal statutes by Empson and Dudley. Among other statutes, it was now enacted, "that untrue inquisitions found in the reign of king Henry VII. by the procurement of Richard Empson and Edmund Dudley, entitling the king to tenures in capite, may be traversed by the parties, though they have had liveryes: and that their livery should be no conclusion." By another act, all assurances made by Emp-son and Dudley of lands to the use of others, were made void, and their joint feoffees stood seised of the whole. The penal laws against clothworkers were likewise repealed, or mitigated. But the most important act of this parliament, was that determining that all actions for the king, upon any penal statute, should be taken within three years after the offence was committed; and actions for any other person, within one year: this act wisely foreclosed the field of litigation, by ripping up or reviving past offences, since no benefit for a forfeiture could accrue three years after the offence charged or committed.

peace, in their sessions, to hear and determine all offences and contempts committed against any statutes in force, saving treason, murder, and felony. A law was likewise made for obliging coroners to do their duty without having the thirteen shillings and four pence advanced to them as a fee; since the meaning of the law was, that the fee should accrue from the estate of the murderer, but not in cases of death by accident or misadventure.

On the fourth of February, 1512, the parliament sat again, when the following acts were passed: That every person carrying beyond seas money, plate, or jewels, should forfeit double the value. This had been a favourite measure in the English government, though it was often broke through for conveniency; but as the English were now upon the eve of a war with France, it was absolutely necessary to enforce it. By another act it was ordained, "That all sorts of men, under the age of forty years, excepting judges and clergymen, should make use of bows and arrows, and practise shooting." This act was occasioned by the experience of the decay of military discipline in England. The use and conveniency of fire-arms bade fair to enervate the bodies of the English, who, by the practice of archery and strength of their arms in drawing the bow, had rendered themselves the terror of Europe; it was therefore provided by the parliament, that those exercises should be revived, not only to improve the natural strength of Englishmen, but because the long-bow and arrow was still a more formidable weapon than any of the small fire-arms that were yet carried to the field. In consequence of this principle, that bodily exercise in the people is absolutely necessary for the defence of the state, another act was made in this parliament, in confirmation of a statute passed in the nineteenth of the late reign, against shooting with cross-bows, and retracting all licences which allowed such exercise.

Two other acts which passed in this parliament, relate entirely to the expedition which was now on foot against France: the first was a kind of extension of the law made in Henry VII's time, and which we have already taken notice of, for empowering all those who followed the king to the wars, to alienate their lands; for it was now provided, that who is or shall be in the king's wars beyond the sea, or on the sea, shall have a protection of "Profecturus, or Moraturus cum clausula volumus;" and he may alien his lands holden in capite, without licence: and if he die in that service, his heirs, within age and ward, his executors, feoffees, or assigns, shall have the wardship and marriage towards the performance of his will.

The other act related to false musters, and to penalties upon captains using the same, or defrauding the soldiers of their pay: desertion was made felony without benefit of clergy, and was cognizable by the justices of the peace of that county where the offender was apprehended.

By another act it was provided, "That no person within the city of London, or within seven miles of the same, should practise physic or surgery without being first examined by the bishop of London, or the dean of St. Paul's, who were to be assisted by expert physicians and surgeons. The same provisions were to extend throughout all the other counties in the kingdom, but with this difference, that the number of assistants to be called in by the bishop there, was left undetermined; and the practitioners approved of at London were not to undergo any second examination: but all this was with a saving clause to the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge of all their rights and privileges.

In the winter of the following year, 1513, an act passed for taking away benefit of clergy from all who committed murder or felony in any consecrated place, or upon the king's highway, or in their houses.

In 1514, the parliament passed an act relating to surgeons, by which they were exempted from serving all constabships and wardships, bearing of arms, and sitting on all juries and inquests, by reason of the continual service and attendance they give day and night, and at all times, to their patients. This privilege is still enjoyed by all persons of that profession.

The parliament of the year 1515, passed many salutary acts; among others, a sumptuary law was enacted against the excessive expence of apparel; and the dress of every degree among the laity was regulated. Another act confirmed and made perpetual the statute of the third of this reign, concerning the maintenance of archery and shooting in long-bows. I am inclined to believe, with lord Herbert, that this precaution chiefly tended to exercise the common people, whom the conveniency of calivers, or hand-guns, then in use, was apt to render idle and effeminate. Another act was made for regulating the wages of artificers and farmers servants; and another for encouragement of husbandry. Another act was made, for regulating the manner of manufacturing woollen cloth, and a severe penalty imposed upon any person that should export Norfolk wool out of the kingdom. Those acts concerning the woollen trade were at this time absolutely necessary, because of the disreputation which the faults in that trade had brought upon English cloths in foreign countries.

But the most remarkable act of this parliament was for remedying an abuse become frequent, from the great hurry the members of the house of commons were generally in for returning into the country before the close of the sessions: it was therefore provided, that such members who shall, without leave from the house, absent themselves from their duty, shall forfeit all their wages to which they are entitled from their constituents. From this act it appears, that the practice of paying wages, viz. four shillings to a knight of the shire, and two shillings at least to a burgess, a day, besides travelling expences, was still continued, and punctually observed. But it is remarkable we know of no coercive power upon the face of this act, which the house of commons before this time had over its own members; and the act itself establishes no other penalty against those who should absent themselves even without leave from the house, besides the loss of their wages. This, however, is no argument that the house might not exercise a compulsory power, by ordering such members into custody; though it is a very strong reason for thinking, that the payment of their wages was then by law so much a debt from the constituents, that, let the behaviour of the representative, after chosen, be what it would, it might be levied by him.

The parliament of 1523 took the state of the coinage into consideration. It was found that the

the increase of trade demanded a greater circulation of money, than the current specie of that time could effect; it was therefore enacted, "That coiners who make money in any mint in England, should coin of every hundred pounds of gold, twenty pounds into half angels, or pieces of forty pence; and of every hundred pounds worth of bullion, plate, or silver, a certain portion into groats, two-pences, pence, and farthings: the farthings to have a different make from the half-penny; that they who bring less than one hundred pounds in bullion, or plate, to the mint, shall have the tenth part thereof in half-pence or farthings; and yet this shall not extend to the mint-masters of York, Durham, or Canterbury." By another statute it was enacted, "That all in the king's service in war, might alienate their lands for the performance of their wills; and if any of them died in the king's service in war, his feoffees or executors should have wardship of his heirs and lands." This gave a new blow to what still remained of the feudal institution, as it left the barons and great tenants at farther liberty to indulge their full enjoyment, at the expence of their estates, of all the luxuries now introduced by the extension of commerce and the increase of coin. Thus many of those great possessions, which, ever since the Conquest, or soon after, had gone from father to son in the same descent, came now into the hands of commoners, and thereby the system of property was almost daily and hourly altered.

The parliament which sat in the year 1530, passed several acts relating to the clergy, which we have mentioned in their proper places; besides which, several acts passed of a civil nature; in particular one act, by which all servants embezzling goods to the value of forty shillings and upwards, within their masters houses, were adjudged to be guilty of felony; and the goods, after conviction, were ordered to be returned to the rightful owners. Another act was made for prohibiting the exportation of brass; probably with a view to encourage the making of great guns. Several regulations about foreign tradesmen likewise passed in this parliament, and they were subjected to the same taxes and duties with natural-born subjects.

In 1532, the twenty-fourth of this king, it was enacted by the parliament, that none should have the benefit of his recourse to his ordinary, excepting those in holy orders, and even they were to give security for their good behaviour. The act, however, did not extend to those, who, being attainted of felony or murder, are afterwards admitted to the benefit of clergy, and so delivered to the ordinary; but the ordinary, having such a person in his custody, might, if he pleased, discharge himself of the same, by degrading him, and sending him to the King's Bench.

By another act in the same session, the places where jails ought to be built and kept, were pointed out: the justices of the peace, in their respective counties, had the power of taxing the inhabitants towards building the jail, and of appointing collectors for raising the money for the same. Another act was made against false verdicts, by which a writ of attainder was followed against every juror giving such verdict; and the jury, if found guilty, was each man to forfeit twenty pounds, one half to go to the king, and the other to the party that sueth.

Another act provided for the importation of all French wines by the king's natural subjects, English, Irish, or Welsh; and that no such wines should be imported between the last day of September and the second day of February: it was farther enacted, that no person should retail French wine for above one penny the pint, and malmsey and sack for one shilling the gallon. Another excellent act was made, extending the statute of the staple (which was before confined between merchant and merchant, and only for the merchandize of the staple) to the rest of the king's subjects: and this, says lord Herbert, not only enlarged contracts, but strengthened the sinews of them.

By another act, another terrible grievance which the subjects laboured under from the clergy's power, was removed. It seems (as the preamble of the act recites) that it had been a common practice to cite people, upon fictitious and surmised causes, from the most distant parts of the kingdom, to the Arches, Audience, and other high courts of the archbishops; and upon their not attending, to lay them under excommunication, or suspension from divine service; it was therefore provided, that no such citation should take place, but in cases specified by the statute.

Another act declared all feoffments of lands to the use of the church, to be void; and that all assurances of lands to churches, communities, or companies of any kinds, were as prejudicial to the lords superiors of such lands, as if they were alienated in mortmain.

Several other acts passed in this parliament, equally beneficial, though not so extensive, in their nature: which were all allowed of by Henry, that he might strengthen his own power against the clergy, and strike the greater terror into the court of Rome.

In 1534, the parliament passed an act, giving power to the chancellor to settle the price of victuals; and all exportation of corn or cattle was prohibited, excepting to the English dominions abroad. By another act, all those who, being regularly indicted, shall stand mute to prevent the course of law, are deprived of the benefit of clergy. Another act was made to prevent the abuse of converting tillage into pasturage, especially for sheep: in the preamble of the act, great complaints are made against this practice, which raised the rents, and enhanced the prices of every thing; it was therefore enacted, "that no man should have in his farmed lands above two thousand sheep; yet that every temporal person may keep upon his inheritance as many as he will: secondly, that no man shall take and hold above two farms at once; and those to be in the same parish, upon certain penalties there set down."

By another act it appears, that the legislature thought it became them to take into consideration the state of printing: an act had been made so far back as the reign of Richard III. for importing books, both printed and manuscript; according to the preamble of this act, made in Henry's reign, there were but few printers within this realm in the reign of Richard III. who were cunning and expert in the said science and craft of printing; but there being now great numbers of that kind, the said act of Richard III. was repealed; and, for the encouragement both of printers and book-binders, it was provided that no man should buy books which were brought from beyond seas to sell again, if they were bound: that no man shall buy books by retail, brought from beyond seas; and that the prices of books, increased to a miserable rate, were to be qualified by the king's great officers of state, or the justices, or any two of them. Several other acts, not relating to the business of the Reformation, were likewise passed for the benefit of the subject, but are too immaterial to be mentioned here.

The parliament of 1536, undertook and brought about the union of England with Wales, in the manner we have related in the history of this reign; and, in order to introduce a general uniformity, justices of the peace, with like powers as they have in England, were appointed by the lord chancellor of England in the county-palatine of Chester, and the other counties already mentioned. By another, the inhuman forest-laws were taken away. By another, it was enacted, that no person, from the first of July, 1536, should have power and authority to pardon or remit treasons, murders, manslughters, or any felons, or their accessaries, in any part of England, Wales, or the Marches of the same: that likewise none should make justices of oyer, justices of assize, justices of peace, or justices of jail-delivery; but they should be made by the king's letters patent; and that all original writs, and all manner of indictments of treason, felony, and trespass, and all manner of trespass, should be made in the king's name; and things done against the king's peace, should be supposed to be done against the king's peace, and not against the peace of any other person. But, notwithstanding the generality of those acts, a great many privileges still continued to the proprietors of lordships.

It appears that there was as yet in England no determined method established by the municipal law for the trial of pirates, who were left to the forms of the civil law, which did not admit any one to be put to death without first confessing their offences, and required more strict proof of the fact than the nature of the offence would admit of: by this means great numbers of offenders had escaped; and those who were convicted, were often put to the torture for confession: but it was now enacted, that they should be judged by commissioners appointed by the king, and in the same manner as if their offences had been committed on land; and that no benefit of clergy should be allowed the criminal: the act, however, very properly made a distinction between pirates, and those who took things through necessity, upon the sea; the said things, viz. provisions, materials, or utensils for navigating the ship, to be paid for, if taken on this side the streights of Morocco (Gibraltar, I suppose) in four months; and if on the other side, in twelve. Another act was made in favour of the breed of English horses; and a penalty imposed upon those who, having parks, did not keep mares thirteen hands, and stallions fourteen hands high. Several regulations were likewise made concerning the form for suing for the gifts and grants made under the king's sign manual. The king, likewise, in this session, carried, in part, his former design of voiding private deeds made in prejudice of the right of wardship: it was likewise enacted, that no lands should pass by bargain and sale, but that which was by writing indented, sealed, and enrolled.

We have now the title of the first law ever made in England relating to bankrupts, in the thirty-fourth year of Henry VIII. viz. "the lord-chancellor, treasurer, &c. shall take order with bankrupts bodies, lands, and goods, for the payment of their debts." But there was a farther regulation made in this act by the thirteenth of Elizabeth.

We now come to the time when interest, or use for money lent, and in those days always known by the name of Usury, was first settled in England by law. It was a statute of 37 Henry VIII. cap. ix. entitled, "How offenders in usury shall be punished." Before this time (says the judicious Josiah Child) there was no law for limiting the rate of interest; there was little trade, and as little money, in the nation, wherefore every man took such an interest for what money he could put out, as he could get; which in sundry instances (to be found in history here and there) was, before this time, higher than ten per cent. as partly appears from the strong expressions in this law, the preamble of which says, "that sundry statutes have been made for the avoiding and punishing of usury, being a thing unlawful [and yet, with the same breath, these lawgivers established it; for this was the church's opinion in those times, though never uniformly put in practice], of other corrupt bargains, shiefts, and chevifances; which statutes are so obscure and dark in intent [so framed on purpose to leave room to avoid the penalties; whilst, in general words (to please the clergy), it was declared sinful], and are of so little force, that by reason whereof little or no punishment hath ensued to the offenders of the same; for reformation whereof (says this preamble gravely), be it enacted, that all former statutes concerning usury, shiefts, &c. all forfeitures and penalties concerning the same be henceforth utterly void.

TAXES in the Reign of HENRY VIII.

In his fourth year, in a parliament at Westminster, were granted to the king two fifteenths of the temporalty, and two tenths of the clergy; and head-money, of every duke ten marks, an earl five pounds, a baron four pounds, a knight four marks, and every man valued at eight hundred pounds in goods, to pay four marks, and so after that rate till him that was valued at forty shillings, and he paid twelve pence; and every man and woman of fifteen years and upwards, four pence.

In his sixteenth year a parliament was holden, wherein divers subsidies were granted to the king, towards the charges of his wars in France.

In his fourteenth year, order was taken by cardinal Wolsey, that the true value of all men's substance might be known, and would have had every man sworn to give an account of his worth, and required a tenth part thereof towards the king's charges in the then war, as the spirituality had granted a fourth part: this the Londoners thought very hard, and thereupon were excused taking an oath, and were allowed to bring in their bills upon their honesties. But when all was done, after much labouring by the cardinal, the clergy granted one half of their yearly spiritual revenues for five years; and the temporalty, two shillings in the pound, from twenty pounds and upwards; and from forty shillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty shillings twelve pence; and under forty shillings, of every head, of sixteen years and upwards, four pence, to be paid in every two years.

In his sixteenth year, the cardinal, of his own head, attempted by commission to draw the people to pay the sixth part of every man's substance in plate or money; but this was generally opposed, and caused insurrections in several counties, which coming to the king's knowledge, he utterly disavowed it, and blamed the cardinal extremely for attempting it.

In his twenty-fourth year, in a parliament then held, a fifteenth was granted to the king, towards his charges in erecting fortifications against Scotland.

In his thirty-first year, a subsidy of two shillings in the pound upon lands, and twelve upon goods, with four fifteenths, were granted to the king, towards his charges in making bulwarks.

In his thirty-fifth year, a subsidy was granted, to be paid in three years; every Englishman being worth, in goods, twenty shillings and upwards to five pounds, to pay four pence of every pound; from five pounds to ten pounds, eight pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, sixteen pence; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound two shillings: strangers, as well denizens as others, being inhabitants, to pay double. And for lands, every Englishman paid eight pence of the pound, from twenty shillings to five pounds; from five pounds to ten pounds, sixteen pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, two shillings; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound three shillings: strangers double. The clergy, six shillings in every pound of benefices; and every priest having no benefice, but an annual stipend, six shillings and eight pence yearly, during three years.

EDWARD VI.

A Very necessary statute was made the second and third of Edward VI. cap. xv. "for restraining the sellers of all manner of provision in England, from combining together not to sell but at a fixed price; and also for restraining workmen and labourers not to make or do their work but at a fixed price; or to do but a certain work in a day, or not to work but at certain hours." A clause, wisely intended, was added to this act, licensing all manner of workmen relating to building of houses, &c. to follow their occupation in all cities and towns corporate, although they did not live therein, nor were free of such corporations: but this clause was repealed by a statute of the third and fourth of this king, cap. xx. plainly (as appears) by the interposition of the city of London, who represented "that being the king's chamber and most ancient city of this realm, the artificers and craftsmen of the arts, crafts, and mysteries aforesaid, were at great costs and charges, as well in bearing and paying taxes, tallages, subsidies, scot, lot, and other charges, as well to the king's majesty as to the said city, and to many and sundry triumphs and other times for the king's honour; and that if foreigners [i. e. non-freemen] should come and work among them within the liberties of the said city, contrary to their ancient privileges, the same should be a great decay of learning, and the impoverishment and driving away of the freemen, being artificers of the crafts and mysteries aforesaid, within the said city; for reformation whereof, the said clause is hereby repealed entirely." So that the reasons for this repeal are expressed as above only in respect to London, yet the repeal being general, took in all other corporations, cities, and towns; and so it remains to our own times, contrary to the opinion of most wise and judicious men. By cap. iii. of the said second and third year of king Edward VI. for regulating the purveyors for the king's household, post-horses are therein fixed at one penny per mile.

In the third and fourth of king Edward VI. there was an act of parliament passed (cap. ii.) with many well-contrived clauses for preventing of frauds in the woollen manufactures in England, such as for the clothier's seal on his cloth, against over-stretching the cloths, for the well drying of cloth, also for the well dyeing of wool to be converted into cloth, or into hats or caps; also for preventing the putting any deceitful thing upon cloth, such as flocks, chalk, flour, starch, &c. nor to use iron cards in the rowing of cloths; also for just measuring of cloths: for all which purposes overseers are directed to be annually appointed, not only in corporation-towns, by the chief magistrates, jointly with the wardens, &c. of the clothworkers, but in towns, villages, and hamlets not incorporated, by the justices of the peace, jointly with the clothworkers; which overseers shall, at least once in every quarter of a year, or as often as they think needful, visit clothiers, drapers, dyers, and preservers houses, shops, &c. to which overseers one moiety is hereby given of all the forfeitures and penalties of this act, and the other to the king, &c. All which evidently shews the care of the legislature for that manufacture, and also that it was at this time universally spread all over the kingdom, and in a flourishing condition.

Notwithstanding all which favourable laws for regulating the English woollen manufacture, we have another statute, anno 1552 (5 and 6 Edward VI.) for the very same ends and purposes, to which we refer the curious reader.

We have seen, under the year 1515, a statute for ascertaining the length, breadth, and weight of certain English woollen cloths; as also another more ample statute, anno 1549, for more fully regulating the different kinds of them: in this year, 1552, we have another still more extensive law for the same purpose (5 and 6 Edward VI. cap. vi.) wherein the woollen manufactures of all the different counties of England and Wales are ascertained with respect to length, breadth, weight, &c. whereby all former statutes concerning this subject are repealed. Yet, as perfect as this statute might then be thought, there were many more subsequent ones made on the same subject, not only for ascertaining the true dimensions and weight of those cloths, but for discovering and restraining many frauds and irregularities therein; the full recital of which would be both tiresome and unprofitable to the generality of readers; such as are desirous of perusing them, may consult the statute-books.

By cap. xxiv. of the said 5 and 6 Edward VI. there is another monopolizing act relating to the making of felt hats and thrummed hats, coverlets, and dornecks (i. e. diaper linen), though somewhat more moderate than that in favour of the city of York; for whereas, by the statute made in the year 1544, the manufacture of coverlets was absolutely confined to that city alone, exclusive of all other parts whatever of that county, this law now before us only confines the making of the above-named four kinds of goods to the city of Norwich, and to incorporate or market-towns of that county.

By a statute of the seventh and last year of king Edward VI. cap. v. "I. The prices of wines are fixed thus; Gascony and Guienne at eight pence per gallon; and Rochelle wine at four pence per gallon; nor should any other wines be sold at an higher price than twelve pence per gallon, on forfeiture of five pounds. This statute is said, in the preamble, to be enacted for the avoiding of many inconveniences, much evil rule, and common resort of misruled persons, used and frequented in many taverns, of late newly set up in back lanes, corners, and suspicious places, both in London and other towns and villages.

"II. The next clause enacts, that none but such as can spend a thousand marks, or else, lastly, shall be the son of a duke, marquis, earl, viscount, or baron of the realm, shall have in his house any vessel of the said wines, for his family's use, exceeding ten gallons, on forfeiture of ten pounds.

"III. Nor shall any person keep a tavern retailing of the said wines, unless licensed, and that only in cities, towns-corporate, boroughs, port-towns, or market-towns, or in the towns of Gravesend, Sitting-bourn, Tuxford, and Bagshot, on the forfeiture of ten pounds: and there shall be but two taverns for retailing wines in every city or town, except in London, which may have forty taverns, in York eight taverns, in Norwich four, in Westminster three, in Bristol six, in Lincoln three, in Hull four, in Shrewsbury three, in Exeter four, in Salisbury three, in Gloucester four, in Westchester four, in Hereford three, in Worcester three, in Southampton three, in Canterbury four, in Ipswich three, in Winchester three, in Oxford three, in Cambridge four, in Colchester three, in Newcastle upon Tyne four. By this limitation it may be thought a pretty near guess may be made at the comparative magnitude of cities and towns, allowances being made for towns situated on very public roads; yet this matter is nevertheless still very uncertain.

"IV. None of the said taverns shall retail wines to be spent or drank within their respective houses.

"V. Merchants may use in their own houses (but not to sell) such wines as they shall import; also high-sheriffs, magistrates of cities and towns, and inhabitants of fortified towns, may keep vessels of wine for their own consumption only."

As extraordinary as several parts of this statute may appear to some of us at this time, they may be pretty well accounted for, not only from the sobriety, poverty, and simplicity of that age, compared with ours, but also from the unsettled and tumultuous disposition of a great part of the people, those especially who adhered to the old religion, and those also who excited commotions in most counties against inclosures; yet, with respect to the limited number of taverns, in several of the fore-named towns, we cannot now perhaps altogether clearly judge or determine the proportion of the magnitude of those places therefrom; for instance, Cambridge is allowed four and Oxford but three taverns; nor some other points relating to this act.

TAXES in the Reign of EDWARD VI.

In no king's reign were ever more parliaments for the time, nor fewer subsidies. The greatest was in his last year, when there was but one subsidy, with two fifteenths and tenths, granted by the temporalty, and a subsidy by the clergy. And indeed, to shew how loth this king was to lay impositions upon his people, this may be a sufficient argument, that, though he was much in debt, yet he chose rather to negotiate a loan of money from the people of the Low Countries, at the interest of fourteen per cent. per ann. But his way of raising money was by selling the chantry-lands and religious houses, granted him by parliament; and by enquiring after all church-goods, either remaining or embezzled, as jewels, gold and silver chalices, ready money, copes, and other vestments, reserving to every church one chalice and one covering for the communion-table, the rest to be applied to his own benefit. He also raised money by enquiring after offences of officers in great places: on enquiry one Beaumont, master of the Rolls, being convicted of many crimes, surrendered all his offices, lands, and goods, into the king's hands. Also one Whalley, receiver of Yorkshire, being found a delinquent, surrendered his office, and paid a great fine besides. Also the lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, conscious that he had sold the king's lands and timber woods without commission, and had applied the king's stores to his own use, for these and other offences, surrendered his office, and was fined four thousand pounds, which he paid in hand. One thing more was done in his time, for raising of money; twenty thousand pounds weight of bullion was appointed to be made so much baser, that the king might gain thereby one hundred and forty thousand pounds.

MARY.

WE have seen, under the year 1285, that the first statutes made in England for widening the roads between market-towns, was made purely for the prevention of robberies, without the least hint therein of the benefit to arise thereby to carriages, on account of commerce, of which there was but very little at that time.

From that time we meet with nothing relating to that subject (except the paying the suburbs about London, &c.) till king Henry VIII's reign, in which there are four statutes, viz. two for the altering or removing certain roads (annis 14 & 15, cap. vi.) in the Weald of Kent, and (anno 26, cap. vii.) in the deep ways of Sussex; both which have been already taken notice of, under the year 1524; a third, for mending a lane near Chester; and a fourth for the repair of bridges, and highways at the ends of bridges; neither of which two did we think worthy of animadversion. But commerce beginning to increase considerably in the reign of his daughter Mary, whereby the old roads became much more frequented by heavy carriages, an act, of 2 and 3 Philip and Mary, anno 1555 (cap. viii.) takes notice, "that the highways were then very noisome and tedious to travel in, and dangerous to all carriages; wherefore it was now enacted (and is still in force), that every parish should annually elect two surveyors of the highways, to see that the parishioners, according to their lands, abilities, farms, &c. send their carts, horses, men, tools, &c. four days in every year, for mending the roads." So that this is properly the first general statute made for mending the roads, extending extending to all England and Wales, by the labour and expence of each respective parish alone; and on that bottom alone we find in all six statutes relating to this subject in queen Mary's reign, nineteen in queen Elizabeth's, and one in king James I's reign; after which there were none of this kind till king Charles II's Restoration. The said parochial means for keeping the roads in repair were found, in most cases, tolerably effectual, till after the Restoration of Charles II. when the vast increase of the nation's commerce and manufactures, and of the capital city of London, with the concomitant increase of luxury, brought in such a number of heavy-wheeled carriages on our roads, as rendered it by degrees impracticable in most cases for parishes entirely to keep their own part of the roads in tolerable condition, more especially in the counties near London, and in the manufacturing counties. This has introduced the more equitable and effectual method of tolls payable at numberless toll-gates (called turnpikes) by the identical wearers of those roads alone: and many subsequent local statutes have been made for those ends, and also several general ones for limiting the weight of waggon-loads, the breadth of wheel-rims, called fellies, the number of horses, &c. And thus much we thought sufficient to serve for a summary history of the laws relating to the roads of England, so as not to have much occasion to name them any more in this work.

What we have here said, concerning a summary history of the keeping the roads or highways of England in repair, may also be partly applied to the subject of deepening rivers, and meliorating havens or harbours on the sea-coasts. With respect to the former, we have seen that the first instance thereof in the statute book, is that of the third of Henry VI. (cap. v.) for deepening the river Lea from the town of Ware to London, an. 1424; and that in his ninth year (cap. ix.) for the same end: after which we find none, either for rivers or for havens, till the reign of Henry VIII. who repaired and fortified several harbours; for that of 4 Henry VII. for preserving the river Thames, relates merely to the fishing therein; and that of the eleventh of the same king, for removing weirs and engines from Southampton harbour, was for the like purpose; but we find no more statutes of either kind till queen Elizabeth's reign, some of which, as also subsequent ones, we may perhaps think it necessary to take a more particular notice of, in their respective places; as also for bridges over rivers.

TAXES in the Reign of Queen MARY.

Queen Mary began with a rare example, for in the first year of her reign, she remitted, by proclamation, the subsidy of four shillings in the pound of land, and two shillings in the pound of goods granted in the last parliament of king Edward VI.

In her second year, in a parliament then holden, was granted to the king and queen a subsidy of the laity, from five pounds to ten pounds, of eight pence in the pound; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, of twelve pence in the pound; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of sixteen pence in the pound; all strangers to pay double: and the clergy, six shillings in the pound. If this were all, then, upon the matter, in all her time there came no new charge upon her people: for one subsidy remitted, and one received, made but even.

In her last year she borrowed twenty thousand pounds of the city of London, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum.

E L I Z A B E T H.

IN the fifth year of Elizabeth (cap. iii.) was the first statute enacted in England for the relief of the poor: for whereas all other acts of parliament were only on the foot of voluntary contributions for the poor, resting or depending upon the charitable devotion of the people, which method had not answered the intended purpose, or prevented common beggars from multiplying every where, it was now therefore found necessary to go a step farther. It is certain that the suppression of the convents had not a little increased this disorder; those houses having been a great relief to the poor of their own lands, and in their neighbourhood, to whom not only their kitchens, but their granaries, were ever open, more especially in times of dearth; when, therefore, the church-lands were sold by Henry VIII. at very easy purchases, it was then declared to be for enabling the buyers to keep up that wonted hospitality, which, however, they greatly neglected to do; yet still there was no compulsory law till now. This act, therefore, after "directing poor and impotent persons of every parish to be relieved of that which every person will, of their charity, give weekly, to be gathered by collectors, and distributed to the poor, so as none of them shall go, or sit, openly begging; (now comes the compulsory clause) and if any parishioner shall obstinately refuse to pay reasonably towards the relief of the said poor, or shall discourage others, then the justices of the peace, at their quarter-sessions, may tax him at a reasonable weekly sum; which if he refuses to pay, they may commit him to prison: yet, where the parishioners have more poor than they can relieve, the justices may licence so many of their poor as they shall think proper, to beg in one or more hundreds of their respective counties. Lastly, beggars in any other place than where legally licenced, were to be punished according to the laws of vagabonds."

The next statute of the same session of parliament (viz. cap. iv.) entitled "A repeal of so much of former statutes as concern the hiring, keeping, departing, working, or order of servants, labourers, &c. and a declaration who shall be compelled to serve in handicrafts, and whom in husbandry, and their several duties, &c." gives the substance of many former laws, with their imperfections, contrariety, and remarks, and observes that the wages ascertained in many of those acts of parliament were now become insufficient, by reason of the advanced prices of all necessaries since those times; yet, large and comprehensive as this act is (and too much of it is still in force) there are sundry subsequent statutes, both in this and succeeding reigns, for the regulation of disputes between masters and their servants, apprentices, and labourers, concerning their wages, time of labour, &c.

The next law (cap. v.) of that year, entitled "Constitutions for the maintenance of the navy, &c." contains many good clauses for encouraging our own shipping and mariners: as "I. By permitting herrings, and other fish caught upon our coasts, to be exported duty-free. II. That no foreign ships shall carry any goods coastwise, from any one English port to another. III. Wines and woad shall be imported from France in English shipping alone (with some inconsiderable exceptions.) IV. That, as well for the maintaining of shipping, the increase of fishermen and mariners, and the repairing of port-towns, as for the sparing and increase of the flesh victuals of this realm, it shall not be lawful for any to eat flesh on Wednesday and Saturdays, on the penalty of three pounds for each offence, excepting cases of sickness; and also those by special licences to be obtained [this purely political fasting from flesh meat was partly altered by cap. ii. 27 Eliz. by leaving out Wednesday; yet the victuallers were to utter no flesh in Lent, nor on Fridays and Saturdays]; for which said licence obtained by peers, they were to pay one pound six shillings and four pence to the poor's box of the parish; knights and their wives, thirteen shillings and four pence; and others, six shillings and eight pence each: but no licence was to extend to the eating of beef [on these days] at any time of the year [this shews, that in those days, black cattle were deemed scarce]; nor to the eating of veal, in any year, from Michaelmas to the first day of May. "But because (adds the statute) no person shall misjudge the intent of this statute, be it enacted, that whosoever shall, by preaching, teaching, writing, or open speech, notify that any eating of flesh, or forbearing of flesh, mentioned in this statute, is of any necessity for saving the soul of man, or that it is the service of God, otherwise than as other polite laws are and be, then such persons shall be punished as spreaders of false news ought to be."

In the following year the parliament, assembled at Westminster, among others, passed the following acts, viz. I. An act against holding or maintaining the authority of the bishop of Rome. II. That no one shall procure a false witness, upon the penalty of forty pounds; nor any one be a false witness, upon the penalty of twenty pounds, and six months imprisonment. III. An act making the clipping and wasting of coin treason. IV. That any person who shall be seen or found in the company of Egyptians [gypsies], shall be deemed felons. V. An act for the due execution of the act "De excommunicato capiendo." VI. An act for translating the Bible and Common Prayer Book into Welsh. VII. An act to establish and confirm the queen's supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs. The work of Reformation, which, with several interruptions, had been carrying on above thirty years, was in a great measure completed, and the articles of the church of England settled by the convocation, and reduced to the number of thirty-nine, as they stand at this day.

The parliament which was dissolved on the twenty-second of January, 1567, made the following acts: I. An act declaring the making and consecrating of bishops within this realm, to be good, orderly, and lawful. II. That no man shall send any rams, sheep, or lambs, alive, out of the realm, upon pain, for the first offence, of forfeiture of all his goods, and one year's imprisonment; and for the second, of being declared a felon. III. That cut-purses and pickpockets shall not have benefit of clergy. IV. Whereas there was but one sheriff for Surry and Suffex, one for Essex and Hertfordshire, one for Somerset and Dorsetshire, one for Warwick and Leicestershire, one for Nottingham and Derbyshire, one for Oxford and Berkshire; it was ordered that, for the future (the year 1567 being the first), each of these counties should have a sheriff respectively.

In the year 1571, the fourteenth of Elizabeth's reign, was passed the famous act for the maintaining the queen's title, of which we have given the substance, in our history of that reign*. The other acts made in this parliament are little worth notice, if we except one relating to the clergy, by which it is enacted, "that no ecclesiastical person shall be admitted to any benefice with cure, except he be twenty-three years of age at least, and shall first subscribe the articles of religion, in presence of the ordinary, and, within two months after induction, read the same in his parish-church, in the time of common prayer, and declare his unfeigned assent thereunto, and all this upon pain of deprivation. That no one shall retain a benefice with cure, being under the age of twenty-one years, or without a testimonial of his honest life, nor unless he is able to render to the ordinary an account of his faith in Latin."

In the eighteenth year of her reign, an act was passed, making it treason to impair, diminish, or falsify the coin of the realm.

The parliament of 1585 enacted several severe laws against papists: it was also declared, "that no person should be returned to serve upon juries, but who has an estate of freehold lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to the clear yearly value of four pounds at least."

The parliament which met in February, 1593, passed a very rigid statute against all non-conformists, which equally affected papists and protestants. In the preamble to this act it is said, "that this act was made for preventing and avoiding such great inconveniences and perils as might happen and grow by the wicked and dangerous practices of seditious sectaries and disloyal persons." The act ran, "that if any person above the age of sixteen years, shall refuse to repair to some church, or refuse to do the same for the space of one month, shall be committed to prison, there to remain, without bail or mainprize, until they shall conform, and make such open submission and declaration of their conformity, as by this act is appointed." The offenders against this statute, who refused to make the submission, were to abjure the realm, and not to return without her majesty's licence, under the penalty of suffering as felons, without benefit of clergy. This bill met with great opposition in the house of commons, as may be seen in d'Ewe's Journal, p. 474, &c. where the speeches on both sides are inserted. There was an act also made against popish recusants, by which they were confined within five miles of their respective dwellings, on forfeiture of all their goods and chattles, together with lands, during life. By another act all the abbey-lands were confirmed to the crown and grantees.

The parliament which met at Westminster on the twenty-fourth of October, 1597, and was dissolved on the ninth of February, 1598, made the following acts: "I. An act for the punishment of rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars: by this statute all the following persons are to be adjudged rogues and vagabonds: people who go about begging as poor scholars, or on the pretence of loss by fire or shipwreck; collectors for jails, or persons delivered out of jail and begging for their fees; such as use any subtle craft or unlawful games, fortune-tellers, gypsies, fencers, bear-wards, common players, and minstrels, jugglers, lurkers, pedlars, and petty-chapmen, fellows not working for reasonable wages when they are able, and the like: their punishment is, to be whipped and sent from parish to parish, by the officer in each, the next straight way to the parish where they were born, or last dwelt for the space of a whole year. II. An act for erecting hospitals, houses of correction, and workhouses for the poor. III. One for the increase of mariners, and maintenance of navigation. IV. An act against lewd and wandering persons, pretending to be soldiers or mariners, and travelling without testimonials from justices of the peace.

In the last parliament of this reign, holden at Westminster, on the twenty-seventh of October, 1601, the following statutes were passed. I. An act for the relief of the poor, appointing the choosing of overseers, and the manner of raising money for the relief of the poor. II. That every parish in England shall pay a weekly sum for the relief of the sick, hurt, and maimed soldiers and mariners. III. An act to redress the misemployment of lands, goods, &c. given to charitable uses. IV. That persons cutting and carrying away corn growing, robbing of orchards, breaking or cutting up hedges, poles, &c. and digging or pulling up fruit-trees, cutting or spoiling wood or underwood, not being felony by law, shall be obliged to make satisfaction or be whipped.

TAXES in the Reign of Queen ELIZABETH.

In the parliament holden in the first year of her reign, a subsidy was granted, of two shillings and eight pence in the pound on goods, and four shillings on lands, to be paid at two several payments, by every person, spiritual and temporal.

In her sixth year, in a parliament held at Westminster, one subsidy was granted by the clergy, and another by the laity, together with two fifteenths and tenths.

In her eighth year, at a parliament then held, there were offered to her four subsidies, upon condition she would declare a successor; but she refused their offer, and directly remitted the fourth subsidy which they had granted, saying, "that it was all one, whether the money was in her subjects coffers or in her own."

In her thirteenth year, in a parliament then held, towards her charges of repressing the Northern rebellion, there was granted her a subsidy of six shillings in the pound, by the clergy; and by the temporality, two fifteenths, and a subsidy of two shillings and eight pence in the pound.

In her six-and-thirtieth year a parliament was holden, in which two subsidies were granted by the clergy, and by the laity three, besides six fifteenths and tenths; but it was put in this act, that this contribution, the like whereof had not been known in former ages, should not be drawn into example.

In her fortieth year, in a parliament at Westminster were granted her by the clergy three entire subsidies, and by the laity as many, with six fifteenths and tenths.

In her forty-second year, to furnish her with money towards the Irish war, she delegated certain commissioners to confirm the crown-lands to the possessors that held any of controverted titles, and to take money for the confirmation, thereby to take away the trouble by contractors, who were at this time very busy.

ARTS and SCIENCES, MANNERS and CUSTOMS, in the XVIth Century.

IF there is a satisfaction, says a modern historian, in viewing in painting and sculpture the features of our ancestors, it must be equally so to read in the page of history their manners and dispositions. We have already shewn how great encouragement learning and the polite arts received from Wolsey, in the beginning of this period; neither were the English wanting all this time in cultivating and cherishing new-born arts and discoveries. One Owen is noted as being the first who, about the year 1536, cast brass cannon in England, some specimens of which are said to be still preserved in the Tower of London. The art of printing had also before this time been imported, and had been brought to as great perfection in England as in any neighbouring country. Music and painting had met likewise with encouragement, Henry himself having some taste for those arts, as appears from several letters patent in favour of their professors, especially to the famous Hans Holbein.

Archbishop Nicholson, in his English Historical Library, speaking of the state of geographical knowledge at or about this period, observes, "that since the beginning of king Henry VIII's reign, our eldest general geographer or antiquary is said to have been Thomas Sulmo, a Guernsey man, who died at London in the year 1545. The year following, a much greater man of the profession, sir Thomas Elliot, one of king Henry's ambassadors, and sir Thomas More's friends, died also. Cotemporary with those two was George Lily (son of William, the famous grammarian), who lived some time at Rome with cardinal Pole, and published the first exact map that ever was, till then, drawn of this island."

In the year 1521 was first introduced the use of hand-guns or musquets, whereby, in process of time the practice of bows and arrows in war was quite laid aside.

About the year 1535, glasses were first begun to be made in England: the finer sort was made in Crutched-friars, London; the fine flint-glass, little inferior to that of Venice, was first made in the Savoy-house, in the Strand, London; but the first glass-plates for looking-glasses and coach windows, were made about the year 1673, at Vauxhall, near Lambeth, by the encouragement of the duke of Buckingham. The English have improved this manufacture so greatly, as to surpass every other nation in Europe in this useful branch of business.

The ingenious author of the Present State of England, printed in 1683, acquaints us, that the first manufacture of knives in England was begun in 1562, by Thomas Matthews, on Fleet-bridge, London.

London. How strangely are things altered since those times! for now London excels all the earth in this article, and supplies many other nations therewith in great quantities.

Mr. Anderson, in his most elaborate and useful work, lately published, concerning the Origin of Commerce, to which I acknowledge myself greatly indebted for many curious extracts, tells us that he has in his possession the first work ever published in England on the art of Italian book-keeping, or merchants-accounts by double-entry; it is a folio, printed at London, anno 1569, in a black letter, the author James Peele. The style (says Mr. Anderson) is obsolete, yet he has sufficiently testified that he understood the true grounds and principles of double-entry accounts full as well as some who have written much later.

In all probability, this art of double-entry accounts had its rise, or at least its revival, amongst the mercantile cities of Italy: possibly it might be first known at Venice, about the time that numeral algebra was taught there, from the principles of which science double-entry, or what we call merchants-accounts, seem to have been deduced, viz. about the middle of the XVth century, though it did not reach England till our commerce, about this time, began to be considerable. It is said that Lucas de Burgo, a friar, was the first European author who published his algebraic work at Venice, anno 1494.

In the year 1589, William Lee, M. A. of St. John's college, Cambridge, invented an engine or steel-loom, called the Stocking-frame, for knitting or weaving of stockings. This was but twenty years after we had first learned from Spain the method of knitting them with wires or needles. Mr. Lee's invention has proved of considerable benefit to the stocking manufacture, by enabling England, in after times, to export vast quantities of silk stockings to Italy, &c. where, it seems (by sir Josiah Child's excellent Discourse on Trade, first published in the year 1678), they had then not got the use of the stocking-frame, though little short of one hundred years after its invention: yet Dr. Howell, in his History of the World (vol. iii. p. 222.) makes this invention eleven years after, 1600; and adds, that Mr. Lee not only taught his art in England and in France, but his servants did the same in Spain, Venice, and Ireland.

We have the best authority for fixing the date of the first manufacturing of sail-cloth in England to the year 1599, being the preamble to an act of parliament of king James I. cap. xxiii. reciting, that "whereas the cloths called Mildernix, and Powl Davies, whereof sails and other furniture for the navy and shipping are made, were heretofore altogether brought out of France, and other parts beyond sea, and the skill and art of making and weaving the said cloth was never known or used in England till about the thirty-second year of the reign of the late queen Elizabeth (i. e. 1590.), about which time the skill and art of making and weaving was attained to, and since practised and continued in this realm to the great benefit and commodity thereof," &c.

As we still excel all nations upon earth both in naval power and maritime commerce, every thing relative to either should (as far as is practicable) come to us at the first hand; yet, though it may seem somewhat strange, that a nation in those days very far from being eminent in shipping, should have so long supplied us with this great article, it ought to be considered, that they were in those days (and long before we fell into it) eminent for the manufacture of many kinds of excellent cloths, made both of flax and hemp; and that perfection (in almost every art) is not to be arrived at but by very slow degrees.

In or about the same year was the invention of the telescope or spying-glass discovered, being justly esteemed one of the most useful and excellent discoveries of modern times; though it was, it seems, produced by mere chance. The common account is, that two children of one Janssen, a spectacle-maker at Middleburgh, in Zealand, being at play in their father's shop, and looking through two pieces of glass between their fingers, which were at some small distance from each other, the weather-cock of the church-steeple appeared to them unusually large, and much nearer; of this they instantly told their father, who, surprized also at first, made the experiment of fixing two such pieces of glass in brazen circles, or cylinders, so as they might be placed nearer or farther, at pleasure. Janssen very soon improved this discovery so much, that he presented a telescope, twelve inches long, to prince Maurice, and another to the archduke Albert. Mr. Wotton (in his Reflections on ancient and modern Learning) relates, "that prince Maurice, conjecturing this might be of great use in war, desired him to conceal his secret, and for that reason his name was so little known, that neither Des Cartes nor Gerard Vossius had ever heard any thing of him, when they attributed this invention to one Jacobus Metius, of Alldmain." None of these first telescopes, however, were above eighteen inches long, neither were they properly framed for astronomical observations, until Galileo, astronomer to the grand-duke of Tuscany, hearing of this discovery for bringing objects nearer, made such great improvements therein, as to have gained him, in the opinion of many, the honour of the invention itself, by giving to the telescope the appellation of Galileo's Tube. Some, indeed, make this noble invention to have happened some years later, and that J. Baptista Porta, a Neapolitan, was the first inventor; but the general belief is as above. Our incomparable sir Isaac Newton was the inventor of the reflecting telescope, consisting of specula, or mirrors, instead of lenses, which has been since much improved, and is much more exact than reflecting ones. The microscope, which magnifies the smallest objects so as to be distinctly viewed, was discovered in the year 1621; and it is said this happened both at Naples and Holland at the same time. Mezeray makes this invention eighteen years later; yet he adds, that even the ancients must have known the use of them, if what Roger Bacon says be true, viz. "that Julius Cæsar being on the Belgic shore, opposite Britain, did, with certain great burning-glasses, discover the posture and disposition of the British army, and all the coasts of that country."—Which whoever please, may believe!

By the telescope, astronomy is brought to such a degree of perfection, as it was impossible for the ancients to arrive at. Navigation, and consequently commerce, is likewise much assisted, from a more perfect discovery of the heavenly bodies:

and many volumes have been published of the wonderful and amazing discoveries made by the microscope.

About this time flourished the famous Danish astronomer, Tycho Brahe, who made some astronomical discoveries and improvements, which proved very beneficial to navigation and maritime commerce. He deceased anno 1601.

The progress which the fine arts made in England since the death of their patron, Wolsey, was next to nothing. The English poetry, indeed, seemed to have risen amongst us complete, and is the only art that, since the days of Shakespeare and Spencer, has been on the declining hand. Architecture came, towards the middle and close of this century, to be more sumptuous; but its style was barbarous. Painting has, in England, been always of foreign growth, and when transplanted hither, has been but just kept alive by the bounty of the great; nor could England, during the successive reigns of Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, produce a patron like Wolsey, or an artist like Holbein, who in the likeness could draw the character.

The progress made in the mathematical art was confined to the studies of Dee and one or two more, who were patronized by Burleigh. In natural philosophy the nation was excessively ignorant, insomuch that we read in the year 1577, some of the greatest men about court suffered themselves to be bubbled out of considerable sums by impostors, who pretended to the secret of transmuting metals: we are sorry to find the name of that great and able man Burleigh, in the list of those dupes of a senseless credulity. The queen's own example re-

Although the nobility of this age preserved great remains of the ancient customs, yet they were by degrees acquiring the taste of elegant luxury, and many edifices in particular were built by them, neat, large, and sumptuous, to the great ornament of the kingdom, says Camden, but to the no less decay of the glorious hospitality of the nation. It is, however, more reasonable to think, that this new turn of expence promoted arts and industry, while the ancient hospitality was the source of real disorder and sedition, idleness. Among the other species of luxury, that of apparel began much to increase during this age, and the queen thought proper to restrain it by proclamation. Her example was very little conformable to her edicts; as no woman was ever more conceited of her beauty, nor more desirous of making impressions on the hearts of beholders; no one ever went to greater extravagance in apparel, nor studied more the variety and richness of her dress; she appeared almost every day in a different habit, and tried all the several modes by which she hoped to make herself agreeable: she was likewise so fond of her cloaths, that she never would part with any of them; and at her death she had in her wardrobe all the different habits, to the number of three thousand, which she had ever worn in her life-time. The retrenchment of the ancient hospitality, and the diminution of retainers, was ever favourable to the prerogative of the sovereign, and, by disabling the great noblemen from resistance, promoted the execution of the laws, and extended the authority of the courts of justice.

OF COMMERCE, HUSBANDRY, NAVIGATION, PUBLIC REVENUES, &c. in ENGLAND during the XVth Century.

THE English had not the same splendor of success with the Spaniards, nor such influence in other courts, nor did they possess that great power which rendered Spain so dangerous to her neighbours; but they acquired a new kind of glory from the ocean, and the extensive maritime trade they carried on: they knew their true element, and that alone made them more happy than all the foreign conquests and possessions of their ancient kings, and they became a powerful, civilized, industrious, laborious, and enterprising nation. The improvements made by the Spaniards in navigation excited their emulation, and they undertook three successive voyages to discover a north-west passage to Japan and China: Drake and Cavendish sailed round the globe, attacking in all places those very Spaniards who had extended their conquest and trade to both ends of the world: the famous sir Walter Raleigh established the colony of Virginia, and afterwards assisted in that expedition wherein the English fleet went and insulted Philip II. upon his own coasts, destroying his ships, and burning the rich city of Cadiz: at length, grown more formidable, they, in 1602, defeated the first fleet Philip III. sent to sea, and from that time acquired a superiority at sea, which they have ever since maintained.

From the first beginning of Elizabeth's reign they applied themselves to manufactures. The Flemings, being persecuted by Philip II. removed to London, bringing with them an increase of inhabitants, industry, and riches. This capital, which enjoyed the blessings of peace under Elizabeth, cultivated likewise the liberal arts, which are the badges and consequences of plenty: in a word, London was enlarged, civilized, and embellished, and in a short time one half of the little island of Great Britain was able to counterbalance the whole power of Spain.

The English now figured as the second nation in the world in industry, as in liberty they were the first. They began early to establish a navy-royal; they commenced a great fishery on the Banks of Newfoundland, a whale-fishery in the North Seas, and a trade to Russia; and, by means of an important discovery of a passage by sea to that country, round the north cape of Lapland, opened an extensive field for other discoveries, and new branches of commerce; they also commenced their Turkey trade; and in the very last year of this century incorporated the East India company.

Agriculture now began to be considered in England as the chief riches of the state, while in Spain they began to neglect this real good for ideal treasures: the gold and silver trade of the new world enriched the king of Spain, but in England the subject was benefited by the sale of the natural commodities. A private merchant of London, sir

Thomas Gresham, was at that time rich enough to build the Royal Exchange at his own expence, and to found and endow the college which bears his name; and several other citizens founded hospitals and public schools. Such, says Mr. de Voltaire, in his Essay on General History, were the glorious effects produced by industry in this kingdom, that private persons could do what kings at present can only effect, during the most happy administration.

Thus much in general: I shall now proceed to point out the most remarkable gradations, by which the several articles under our consideration tended to perfection during this period.

Nothing material of discovery had been made from England since Cabot's voyage to the coast of America, in the year 1496. In 1525, king Henry VIII. sent two ships towards the same coasts, one of which was cast away in the Gulph of St. Laurence, and the other returned home the same year, but without any material discovery. One Robert Thorn is said to have put Henry upon this voyage, in hopes of finding a north-west passage to the Moluccas.

In our review of the state of Commerce, &c. at the end of the reign of Henry VII. we have shewn the state of husbandry in England at that time; it seems the evil then complained of, was now grown to a greater height, for, in the twenty-fifth of Henry VIII. a law was made (cap. xiii.) which represents "the custom of engrossing great numbers of sheep in one man's hands, and for that end keeping many farms in the same man's hands, as a practice which has not been but within a few years past, putting such lands as they can get into pasture, and not to tillage; whereby they have not only pulled down churches and towns [quære, how this could be], and enhanced old rates and rents, or else brought them to such excessive fines, that no poor man is able to meddle with them; but also have enhanced all manner of corn, cattle, wool, pigs, geese, hens, chickens, eggs, &c. by reason whereof a marvellous multitude of people be not able to provide meat, cloaths, &c. for themselves and families. One of the greatest occasions why those covetous people do keep such great quantities of lands in their hands from the occupying of the poor husbandman, and do use it in pasture and not in tillage, is only the great profit that cometh by sheep, now got into few persons hands in respect to the whole number of the king's subjects, that some have twenty-four thousand, some twenty thousand, some ten thousand to five thousand sheep, whereby a good sheep, that used to be sold for two shillings and four pence, or three shillings at most, now sold for six, five, or four shillings at the least; and a stone of wool, which used to be sold for eighteen pence and twenty pence, is now sold for four shillings or three shillings and four pence at least, &c. which things tend to the decay of hospitality, the diminishing of the people, and the let of cloth-making, whereby many poor people have been accustomed to be set to work. For the remedy whereof, it was in substance enacted, I. That none shall keep above two thousand four hundred sheep (exclusive of lambs) at any one time, unless it be on his own land of inheritance, in which case he is not hereby limited, nor any spiritual persons. II. No man shall hold above two farms, in the parish of one of which two he shall be obliged to live or reside himself."

The increase of the woollen manufacture increasing the demand for wool, gave rise to this practice of engrossing farms, and turning them into sheep-walks, which undoubtedly can be managed by much fewer hands than tillage-farms can be, whereby depopulation must necessarily ensue.

In the year 1536, the twenty-seventh of Henry VIII. the king gave encouragement to certain merchants to send out two ships on discovery to the north coast of America, where they visited Cape Breton and Newfoundland; and being in great distress for want of provisions there, they returned home in October the same year; and although this voyage proved unfavourable to their main intent of finding a north-west passage to India, yet it gave rise to the very beneficial fishery of the English on the Banks of Newfoundland, on which barren island one Mr. Hoar, of London, merchant, attempted a settlement at this time, though he met with much misfortune in that unsuccessful attempt.

We find that the English merchants of Southampton and London traded to Brasil in the years 1540 and 1542, and so it seems at those times to have been permitted, and until the year 1580, when the king of Spain got possession of Portugal.

About this time the state of shipping, even in the port of London, was very low, compared with the present time. If we may give credit to Wheeler's Treatise of Commerce, who wrote in 1601, he expressly asserts, that about sixty years before he wrote, there were not above four ships, besides those of the royal navy, that exceeded one hundred and twenty tons burthen, within the river of Thames.

In the year 1553, the last of Edward VI. a very great cosmographical as well as mercantile discovery was made by the enterprising genius of a certain Englishman, who (whether reading Othier's account of the situation of the lands and seas about Norway, &c. delivered to the great king Alfred, anno 887, or whether from any informations lately received from the Norway people, with whom we now constantly traded) about this time discovered a passage by sea to Russia, along the north end of Norway and Russian Lapland, and down into the sea or rather great bay, since termed the White Sea, in which is situated the noted port of Archangel. Sir Hugh Willoughby, as commander in chief, with three ships, had begun this voyage just before the death of Edward VI. being supported by a society or company of gentlemen and merchants for the discovery of unknown countries. It seems to have been the scheme of the famous Sebastian Cabot, who was chosen governor of that company, and who well deserved the pension already noted to have been settled on him by Edward VI. and that the wars of Sweden with Russia by the way of Norway, in some degree obliged the English to attempt this new passage to Russia by the Northern Ocean. This undertaking was supported by a subscription of six thousand pounds, divided into twenty-four shares, twenty-five pounds each share. With those ships went letters from king Edward to all kings, princes, &c. for their protection. It was intended chiefly as a shorter and easier passage (as they imagined) to Cathay (a name then used for that country which is now called China.) Sir Hugh Willoughby being tossed up and down down for a long time as far as seventy-two degrees north latitude, was compelled, by the sudden approach of winter, to run into an obscure harbour in Russian Lapland, called Arcaia Keca, where he and the crew of two of his three ships (seventy in number) were frozen to death, and where some Russian fishermen, in the summer following, found him sitting in his cabin, with his diary and other papers before him: it being the custom of those Laplanders to frequent the sea-coasts in summer for the benefit of the fishery, but when winter approaches, to withdraw into the Calmarisle and parts, which occasions those stormy shores to be desolate in winter. Richard Chancellor however, in the third ship, accidentally fell into the bay of St. Nicholas, or White Sea, on the Russian coast, where no European, nor any other ships, had ever been seen before: here he landed at the abbey of St. Nicholas, near Archangel, then only a castle, determining to wait on the czar John Basilowitz, at that time engaged in the Livonian war; which war having greatly interrupted the Eastland trade, that prince was the more inclinable, by Chancellor's interposition, to grant the English considerable privileges at Archangel, &c. The Russians before those times having no sea-ports nor shipping on the Baltic shores, the rich furs, hemp, &c. were carried to other parts of Europe, from the ports of Livonia lately possessed by the Teutonic knights of St. Mary of Jerusalem. Thus (as in general is noted in our introduction), although we failed in our principal aim of arriving at China by this supposed north-east passage, we however made a useful and profitable discovery of a trade by sea to Russia: and this same discovery moreover pointed out likewise to the English the way to the whale-fishery at Spitzbergen, soon after put in practice.

Chancellor, from Archangel, by the governor's leave and assistance, travelled on sledges to the czar's court at Moscow, of whom (overjoyed at the new opening of a maritime commerce with Europe) he obtained privileges from the English merchants, and letters to king Edward VI. who, however, died before the arrival of Chancellor.

Thus, by the encouragement of this excellent young prince, for making discoveries northward, a beginning was made for a trade to Russia; but Edward dying before he had executed a very ample charter to those adventurers, it was the said first and second of Philip and Mary (February 6, 1554) that the first charter of incorporation was granted to the Russia company (as it has since been usually called), but then by the name of the Merchants Adventurers for the Discoveries of Lands, Countries, Isles, &c. not before known or frequented by any English. The preamble to this charter, and the substance of the whole it sets forth, is, that the marquis of Winchester, then lord high-treasurer, the earl of Arundel, lord high-steward of the queen's household, the earl of Bedford, lord privy-seal, and the earl of Pembroke, the lord Howard of Effingham, lord high-admiral, &c. had already fitted out ships for discoveries northward, north-eastward, and north-westward, not as yet frequented by other Christian monarchs in friendship with us, to have one governor (the first to be Sebastian Cabot, for life), and twenty-eight of the most sad (i. e. sedate), discreet, and honest of the said fellowship, four of whom to be called Consuls, and the other twenty-four to be called Assistants; the governor and two consuls (or three consuls in the governor's absence), and twelve assistants to be the quorum of a court. This corporation might purchase lands to the yearly value of sixty pounds thirteen shillings and four pence, to have perpetual succession, a common-seal, may plead and be impleaded, may impose mulcts, forfeitures, &c. on offenders against the company's privileges, and may admit persons from time to time to be free of the company; may make conquests of lands of infidels, so to be discovered by them. And whereas one of the said ships (i. e. Chancellor's) set forth last year (1553) arrived safe, and wintered, in the dominions of our cousin and brother, lord John Basilowitz, emperor of all Russia, who entertained them honourably, &c. and granted them letters to us, with free licence to traffick into his country, with other privileges, under his signet; wherefore we grant this corporation liberty to resort, not only to all parts of that emperor's dominions, but to all other parts not known to our subjects; none of whom but such as shall be free of, or licenced by, this company, shall frequent the parts aforesaid, under forfeiture of ship and merchandize, one half to the crown and the other half to the company."

It seems the Bristol merchants had gotten into the Russia trade soon after its discovery, being encouraged thereto by sir Sebastian Cabot.

Much the like complaints in relation to the English woollen manufacturers as have been made in the present time, were we find made above two hundred years ago, as appears by the statute of the second and third of Philip and Mary (cap. xi.) entitled, "Who shall use the trade of weaving," viz. "that whereas the rich clothiers do oppress the weavers, some by setting up and keeping in their houses divers looms, and maintaining them by journeymen and persons unskillful; some by engrossing looms into their hands, and letting them out at such unreasonable rents as the poor artificers are not able to maintain themselves by, and much less their wives and families, some again by giving much less wages for the workmanship of cloths than in times past, whereby they are forced utterly to forsake their occupations, &c. wherefore it is enacted, I. That no clothier, living out of a city, borough, or market-town, shall keep above one loom in his house, nor let out any loom for hire. II. That no woollen weaver, living out of a city, borough, or market-town, shall keep more than two looms, nor more than two apprentices. III. No weaver (whilst such) shall have a tucking-mill, nor be a tucker, fuller, nor dyer. IV. No tucker or fuller (whilst such) shall keep any loom in his house. V. That no person who hath not heretofore been a cloth-maker, shall hereafter make or weave any kind of broad white woollen cloths, but only in a city, borough, town corporate, or market-town, or else in such places where such cloths have been used to be commonly made for ten years preceding this act. [This clause was probably well intended, that the searchers might be the better enabled to see the goodness of this manufacture.] VI. No person shall set up as a weaver, unless he hath previously served an apprenticeship of seven years to that business. Lastly, that nothing in this act is to extend or be prejudicial to the inhabitants of the counties of York, Cumberland, and Westmoreland; but they

they may keep looms in their houses, and do every other matter relating to spinning, weaving, and cloth-making in the said counties as before the making this statute."

After England had held the town and port of Calais (with its dependent garrisons of Guisnes and Ham) for two hundred and eleven years (the only part of the continent of France held by England) during which time it was not only a door always open for the invasion of France, over which, for that reason, England had no small influence; but (which is more to our purpose) was extremely well situated for a staple port, to disperse, in more early times, the wool, lead, tin, and, in later times, the woollen manufactures of England, into the inland countries of the Netherlands, France, and Germany; the loss of this important place (in the year 1558) to the French, most shamefully and negligently, in the midst of winter, was undoubtedly a considerable prejudice to commerce, and not a little to the honour and influence of England. Hereupon the staple of wool, &c. was removed to Burges, to the great benefit of that city, which had been for some time declining from its ancient opulence and grandeur.

That most diligent agent for the Russian company, Mr. Anthony Jenkinson, did, in the year 1557, first set on foot a new channel of trade, through Russia into Persia, for raw silk, &c. He sailed down the great river Volga to Nisi, Novogorod, Casan, and Astracan, and thence crossed the Caspian sea to Persia. At Boghar, a goodly city, he found merchants from India, Persia, Russia, and Cathay or China, from which last-mentioned country it was nine months journey to Boghar. Jenkinson returned the same way to Colmizro, in the bay of St. Nicholas, anno 1560, and so home the same year to England. On his return he published the first map of Russia, that had ever been made. This voyage, it seems, he performed seven different times; yet so promising a prospect for that company was dropped some few years afterwards, and remained as if it had never been, until the reign of king George II. anno 1744, when it was revived by an act of parliament, enabling the Russia company to trade thence into Persia; upon which considerable quantities of raw silk were brought home by the very same way that Jenkinson took from Persia to Russia, and thence to England: yet the continual troubles and ravages in Persia have since suspended the good effects of this law.

We are now arrived (November 17, 1558) at the commencement of the most illustrious female reign, and of the longest duration, which probably ever existed in the world, viz. that of the truly great Elizabeth, queen of England, it is not now either our present province or intention to draw her character at length, which has already been done; we shall therefore, at this entrance on her glorious government, confine ourselves to this one brief remark, viz. that, to her immortal honour and her kingdom's immense benefit, her reign was supplied with more important articles for commercial history, and more beneficial to the kingdom (even whilst she was surrounded by foreign and domestic enemies) than perhaps all the preceding reigns jointly, since the time of her great predecessor king Edward III. We shall here only in general remark, that, on her now succeeding to the crown, she found the balance of power and wealth already got into the hands of the commons, or people, she prudently conducted her measures accordingly; though now and then she would exert her prerogative as far (though with more prudence) as did some of her less wise successors.

In the year 1560, the second of Elizabeth, she by her charter confirmed all former charters of privileges to the company of merchant-adventurers of England, and likewise granted them two other ample charters, viz. one in the sixth, and the other in the twenty-eighth year of her reign, in the former of which they had first the designation of Merchant-adventurers given them.

The English Russian company which had been incorporated in the first and second of Philip and Mary, anno 1554, had now the noble sanction of an act of parliament, in the eighth year of Elizabeth's reign.

Martin (afterwards sir Martin) Frobisher or Forbisher made now his first voyage for discovering a north-west passage to the East Indies. Captain Luke Fox, in his book, in quarto, entitled The North-west Fox, printed anno 1535, says, "that Mr. Forbisher was fifteen years in noting and bringing up the adventure, before he did attempt the same, which was brought to pass by the help of Ambrose Dudley, earl of Warwick." He set out with two barks, of twenty-five tons each, and one pinnace, of ten tons, and entered the streights going into the great bay (since called Hudson's Bay), which he named Forbisher's Streight; he also gave the following names to places there, viz. Queen Elizabeth's Foreland, Cape Labrador, Gabriel's Island, Prior's Sound, and sundry other islands, capes, and bays, by which names the same places are known to this day. He brought home one of the savages, and also a kind of bright stone, which being tried by the London goldsmiths, it was given out by them, that it held gold in it very richly, and are said to have promised great matters, if any quantity thereof could be obtained; which flattering hopes produced a second voyage, ten years after, although no north-west passage was found.

Mr. John Hawkins, assisted by the subscriptions of sundry gentlemen, now fitted out three ships, and having learned that Negroes were a very good commodity in Hispaniola, he sailed to the coast of Guinea, took in Negroes, and sailed with them for Hispaniola; where he sold his slaves and English commodities, and loaded his three vessels with hides, sugar, and ginger, and also many pearls, returning home anno 1563, after making a prosperous voyage. This seems to have been the very first attempt from England for establishing a Negro trade.

The English genius was not to be discouraged by former unsuccessful attempts for finding a passage to China and the East Indies, without interfering with the Portuguese by the Cape of Good Hope south-eastward, nor with the Spaniards south-westward by the Streights of Magellan: and as they had attempted in vain a passage north-eastward, there seemed now only the north-westward passage to be explored, which we have seen had been in part already attempted by Forbisher. The Portuguese and Spanish chart-makers and cosmographers were, it seems, expressly enjoined by their sovereigns, not to give any kind of light to any other nation, in this respect, because they were greatly apprehensive left, if there were any such north-west passage, it would prove a much shorter course to India and China than theirs, either by the south-east or south-west passage. For encouraging the English in this attempt, sundry treatises were published by sir Humphrey Gilbert, Mr. Richard Wilkes, &c. built mostly upon the romantic reports of certain ancient and some more modern authors, without any solid probability: yet, upon such slight grounds, and encouragement of friends, captain Forbisher made his second attempt in 1577, with one of the queen's own ships, two barks, and one hundred and forty persons, some of whom were gentlemen. He again entered the streights he had named after himself in his former attempt, where he found store of glittering stones and sand, which he had seen in his last voyage, and with which he now loaded his vessels, returning home the same year, with his imaginary treasure, which, upon farther trial proved good for nothing. However, this served to give rise to the third and last fruitless attempt, by the same sea-commander, in the ensuing year, to find out a north-west passage to China.

In the same year, 1578, Hakluyt gives us an account of the Newfoundland fishers from Europe, in the preceding year, viz. "One hundred ships from Spain, fifty from Portugal, one hundred and fifty from France, and fifteen from England: that the English had the best ships, and therefore gave law to the rest, being in the bays, and protectors of others; for which it was then, and had been of old a custom to make them some sort of acknowledgement as admirals, such as a boat-load of salt for guarding them from pirates and other violent invaders, who frequently drove them from a good harbour;" &c. He says, "the fishery of the English at Iceland was the reason that we had not then such numbers of ships at Newfoundland; that the Spaniards, next to the English, had the best ships there; that there were then also twenty or thirty ships from Biscay, to kill whales, for train-oil." (But here is no mention as yet of whale-fins, or whale-bone, of so great value in our days (which shews its use for women's stays, &c. was not then known.) His friend, in a letter from Newfoundland, is earnest for the English to settle at the island of Cape Breton, for the benefit of the fishery, and in another isle in the mouth of the great river of St. Laurence. Hakluyt was in those times a most indefatigable enquirer after new trades and discoveries, and was undoubtedly of great use to our adventurers, by giving them much light into the nature and means of discoveries, and seems to have been a public blessing to England in those days.

We have, in the former part of the history of this reign, given an account of the circumnavigation of the terraqueous globe by sir Francis Drake, and therefore have no occasion to recapitulate the particulars of that transaction in this place; we shall therefore proceed to give a short account of the first establishment of, and charter granted to, the English Turkey company.

Queen Elizabeth having settled preliminaries at Constantinople, two years before, for her subjects to trade to Turkey, she now (viz. anno 1581) judged it reasonable to incorporate a number of eminent merchants for that end, sir Edward Osborn, an alderman of London, Thomas Smith, esq. Richard Staper, and William Garrett, merchants; in which charter of corporation the queen sets forth, "that the said sir Edward Osborn and Richard Staper, had, at their own great costs and charges, found out and opened a trade to Turkey, not heretofore, in the memory of any man living, known to be commonly used and frequented, by way of merchandize, by any merchants or other subjects of us or our progenitors, whereby many good offices may be done for the peace of Christendom; relief of Christian slaves, and good vent of the commodities of the realm, to the advancement of her honour and dignity; the increase of her revenue, and of the general wealth of the realm: her majesty therefore grants unto those four merchants, their executors and administrators, and to such Englishmen (not exceeding twelve in number) as the said sir Edward Osborn and Richard Staper shall appoint to be joined to them and the other two before-named persons, and their factors, servants, or deputies, for the space of seven years to trade to Turkey, in such manner as the said company shall agree between themselves. During which time, they may make bye-laws for their good government (not repugnant to the laws of the kingdom.) Nothing to be transacted without the consent of the governor for the time being (sir Edward Osborn being hereby appointed the first governor): the trade to Turkey to be solely to them, their factors and servants, during the said term: and any other subjects trading thither, either by sea or land, without this company's licence, to forfeit ships and goods; a moiety to the crown, the other moiety to this company. For the last six of the said seven years, this company shall export so much goods to Turkey as shall annually pay at least five hundred pounds custom to the crown (except in case of ship wreck, &c.) I. Proviso, that in case this exclusive grant shall hereafter appear to be inconvenient, the queen may revoke the same, upon one year's previous notice. II. Proviso, the queen, during the said term, may nominate two persons to be added to the said number of patentees, with the same privileges, &c. as the rest herein named. Lastly, that if, at the end of the said seven years these grantees desire it, the queen will grant other seven years to them, provided (as aforesaid) the said exclusive trade shall not appear to be unprofitable to the kingdom."

The queen's letters to the grand signor were received with much civility, being delivered to him by her ambassador, Hareborne, anno 1582, whom she empowered to settle consuls in the several ports, and to establish laws or rules to be observed by the English trading to Turkey.

With the first factor the indefatigable Hakluyt (vol. iii. p. 164, 165) sent excellent instructions for enquiring into the nature of dyeing stuffs; also what of those drugs might be produced in England; and how beneficial such new productions would have been to us, which he instances in that of saffron, first brought into England by a pilgrim; as also woad, originally from Thoulouse, in Languedoc: "that the damask-rose was first brought into England by Dr. Linacre, physician to king Henry VII. and king Henry VIII. Turkey fowls, about fifty years past (viz. about 1532): the artichoke in king Henry VIII's time; and of later times the musk-rose and several sorts of plums, by lord Cromwell, out of Italy: the apricot by king Henry VIII's French gardiner; (but there is no mentioned yet of peaches, nor of nectarines).

And now, within these four years (anno 1578) have been brought into England from Vienna, in Austria, divers kinds of flowers called tulips, and others procured thither a little before from Constantinople. And it is said, that since we traded to Zante (this must have been but lately), the plant that beareth the currant is also brought into this realm; and although it brings not fruit to perfection, yet it may serve for pleasure and for some use. (This shews it was then but just introduced.) Many other things have been brought in, that have degenerated by reason of the coldness of the climate: some things brought in, have, through negligence, been long lost; and archbishop Grindal brought the tamarisk plant from Germany, and many people have received great health by this plant."

On the commencement of the English trade to Turkey, the merchants having occasion to attend the queen and council, they had there great thanks and commendations for the ships they then built of so great burthen, with many encouragements to pursue the plan, for the kingdom's sake, says the author of Trade's Increase, who adds, that the ordinary returns of this trade, at the beginning, were three for one.

By England's entering at this time into a direct trade to Turkey, all the commodities of Greece, Syria, Egypt, Persia, and India, came home to us much cheaper. "And (says sir William Monson) when the Venetians served us with those rich eastern wares, by the way of the Red Sea, and down the Nile to Alexandria, and also by the way of caravans to Aleppo, they (i. e. the Venetians) also were then wont to take freight in their ships from port to port, whereas now (i. e. 1685) all strangers are more desirous to employ our own ships in that service."

Jacobs, in his Lex Mercatoria, alleges (upon what authority I know not), that the Barbary merchants were incorporated in king Henry VII's time; but that company decaying, out of their ruins arose the Levant or Turkey company, who first trading with Venice, and then with Turkey, furnished England that way with East Indian commodities, which till then were brought to us (mostly) by land, and to the Portuguese alone by long sea," &c.

The same year, 1582, the ship Susan, of London, mounting thirty-four guns, carried over to Turkey the English ambassador, Hareborn, who now first settled peace with Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, which piratical states had taken many ships belonging to London, Bristol, &c. and Hareborn having established all the English factories in Turkey (maugre the spite and malice of the French and Venetians) returned over-land to England.

Sir Walter Raleigh, whose great genius much inclining him to new enterprizes and discoveries, had this year formed a society of gentlemen and merchants to subscribe a considerable sum of money towards forming a settlement on the continent of North America, and on Lady-day, 1584, queen Elizabeth granted them a charter for that purpose. Amidas and Barlow, with two vessels, were accordingly sent thither: but they sailed about a thousand leagues out of their way; for the short course to the northern parts of America not being as yet known to us, they steered the wonted course of the Spaniards, by the Canary Islands, and thence into the trade-winds to the Caribbee Islands, thence sailing through the Gulph of Florida, they anchored at a part of what is now called Virginia, where, making some insignificant trade with the natives, exchanging toys for their furs, they returned home with gain (as they said), and greatly magnified the richness of the country. For encouraging a second adventure, they brought home some pearls and tobacco (the first of that sort that had been seen in England.) The wise queen seemed fond of this design, and either she herself, or sir Walter Raleigh, gave the country the name of Virginia, which they judiciously represented to be a pleasant country, abounding in fine woods, deer, hares, wild fowl, fish, vines, currants, &c.

Raleigh therefore obtained queen Elizabeth's patent to himself, &c. for the possessing such remote heathen lands, not then inhabited by Christians, as they should discover for six years, of which they thereby had the property granted to them for ever, reserving to the crown the fifth part of all gold and silver ore found therein, with power to seize to their proper use all ships, with their merchandize, that shall, without leave, plant within two hundred leagues of this intended settlement, excepting, however, the queen's subjects and allies, fishing at Newfoundland, &c. She also grants free denization to the planters and their posterity residing there: powers are also granted to the patentees for making bye-laws there, not repugnant to those of England.

It is observable, that in this, and some other patents of those times, there were no distinct place, longitude, or latitude, fixed or limited for such plantation, although undoubtedly North America was the country intended.

In the next year, 1585, captain John Davis, with two barks from Dartmouth, first sailed into the streights since called by his name, in the country called Old Greenland, and returned home the same year, as all others have done, without making any useful discovery. At this time we find they knew the use of somewhat like the harpoon, with which they killed a porpoise; but though many whales fell in their way, they knew not yet the right method of killing them.

This same year the gallant sir Richard Grenville sailed for Virginia by the old round-about course, above described, with seven ships, laden with arms, ammunition, and provisions, and with settlers for planting a colony. He began with planting at Roanoke Island, lying about five leagues from the continent, in eighty-six degrees north latitude. There he left one hundred and eight men: it is a truly melancholy consideration, that those poor creatures were left to shift for themselves in so wild a country, for above a year; who, so eager to discover gold and silver mines (now never like to be found there), whilst they neglected to prepare their provisions in due season, and going up the country in quest of those mines (for golden dreams were then universal), most of them were either destroyed by the natives, or perished for want; and the few who survived were taken up by sir Francis Drake, coming now again upon the coast from harrassing the Spanish West Indies, who took them all home with him, even although they had sown corn there, which was very near ripe, sufficient for two years sustenance; sustenance; and they were but just gone, when a ship, fitted out at the sole expence of sir Walter Raleigh, arrived there with all sorts of conveniences, as did sir Richard Grenville soon after, with three other ships, bringing a farther supply: but finding the places quite desolate where the English planters had settled, they all returned home. In those accounts there appears to be some confusion, with respect as well to the identical year, as to the names of persons engaged therein, which is owing to the inaccuracy of writers and transcribers in those days, which, however is of very little consequence at present.

Sir Walter Raleigh had his mind so intensely set upon a plantation in North America, that he again sent out three ships, with an hundred and fifty persons of both sexes. These planters Raleigh's superintendant settled in the isle of Roanoke, where he found the second colony had been destroyed by the natives. Here he rebuilt the fort and houses, calling it the city of Raleigh in Virginia: he left one hundred and fifteen men in this new settlement, and returned home, where he remained three years before he could obtain the necessary supplies, which he had promised to bring in the year after he had left the colony, where he arrived in 1590, with these supplies both of men and stores, in three ships. It seems, such of the colony as had remained alive had removed to a place on the continent called Croatoan, that word being carved upon the trees; to this place they intended to sail in search of the colony, but a storm unfortunately arising, the ships lost their anchors and cables, and provisions also failing, they agreed to return home, leaving that miserable colony to perish, to the shame of that age; for although Raleigh was in trouble about this time, yet surely the queen and nation ought to have shewn some compassion to the poor people left in a wilderness amongst savages.

Thus was this scheme of a plantation in Virginia quite laid aside during all the rest of queen Elizabeth's reign, and all the great expence of Raleigh and the other adventurers utterly thrown away, besides the loss of many mens lives.

It was in the year 1591 that the first voyage from England to East India was undertaken with three ships; but it was rather a privateering adventure, than a proper mercantile voyage, for they took several ships in their way to India. They had lost so many men by sickness near the cape of Good Hope, that they were obliged to send one of their ships home, and proceeded with only two to India: moreover, in a storm beyond the Cape they lost company with captain Raymond in the principal ship, which was never heard of more; so that only captain Lancaster's ship arrived in India, which also met with many grievous misfortunes; and, on her return, sailing to the West Indies, whilst the captain and the rest of the men went on shore to seek provisions on an uninhabited island, six of the sailors ran away with the ship; and at the end of three years this unfortunate officer was brought home, several of his men having perished for want at that place.

Some English ships now made a voyage to Cape Breton, at the entrance of the Bay of St. Laurence, in North America, some for morse-fishing and others for whale-fishing (says Hakluyt), which is the first mention we find of the latter fishery by any English; and although they met with no whales there, they found on an island eight hundred whale-fins, where a Biscay ship had been lost three years before. This too is the first mention of whale fins or whale-bone by the English. How the ladies stays were made before this commodious material in them was discovered, does not appear; probably slit pieces of cane, or of some other tough and pliant wood, might have been in use before.

By the trade to Archangel the English became well acquainted with the northern seas at this time, where also they at first carried on a great fishing, or hunting rather, for morfes (as the Russians call them, the English call them sea-horses, and the Dutch and French, sea-cows) on Cherry Island, beyond the North Cape, so called from alderman Cherry, but called by the Dutch Bear Island: but it seems those amphibious animals became so shy, that the moment they saw any man, they ran into the sea. The English thereupon fell into the whale-fishery, though not quite so early as this time.

Grotius tells us, that the Hollanders, about this time built two thousand ships every year; a thing almost incredible, considering their new existence as an independent state, did it not proceed from so illustrious and respectable an author, and their own countryman.

Our own Turkey merchants first, and the Dutch East India company next (for they had got the start of us in the East India trade) keeping up the price of pepper and other spices to a high rate, we being at war with Spain, and so could not get spices from Lisbon at first-hand, queen Elizabeth now determined to enter her people directly on a commerce to East India.

Accordingly, on the thirty-first of December, 1600, she granted a charter to George, earl of Cumberland, and two hundred and fifteen knights, aldermen, and merchants, "that, at their own costs and charges they may set forth one or more voyages to the East Indians, in the countries and parts of Asia and Africa, and to the islands thereabout, divers of which countries, islands, &c. have long since been discovered by others of our subjects; to be one body politic and corporate, by the name of the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the East Indies: to have succession: to purchase lands (without limitation): to have one governor, and twenty-four persons, to be elected annually, who shall be called Committees, jointly to have the direction of the voyages, the provision of the shipping, and the management of all other things belonging to the said company. Sir Thomas Smith, alderman of London, was to be the first governor: and a deputy-governor to be elected in a general court: both the governors, and all the committees to take the oath of fidelity; as also every member shall take an oath, before being admitted to traffic as a freeman of this company. The company, their sons (at twenty-one years of age), their apprentices, servants, and factors, in India or elsewhere, may, for fifteen years, from Christmas last, freely and solely trade (by such ways and passages as are already found out, or which shall hereafter be discovered) into the countries and ports of Asia and Africa, and into and from all the islands, ports, towns, and places of Asia, Africa, and America, or any of them, beyond Cape Bona Esperanza to the Streights of Magellan, where any traffic of merchandize may may be used, and to and from every of them, in such manner as shall from time to time be limited and agreed on, at any general court of the company; any statute, usage, diversity of religion or faith, or any other matter to the contrary notwithstanding, so as it be not any country already possessed by any Christian potentate in amity with her majesty, who shall declare the same to be against his or their good liking. Either the governor or deputy governor must always be one in the general assemblies, when they may make all reasonable constitutions, &c. agreeable to the laws of England, for their good government, by plurality of voices; and may punish, by fines and imprisonment, the offenders against their laws. The queen grants the company an exemption from paying any customs for the first four voyages; and for the customs which shall afterwards be payable for merchandize from India, the company shall be allowed to give their bonds, payable one half in six months and the other half in six months after: for merchandize lost at sea, outward-bound, the customs shall be allowed to the company out of the next cargo shipped off. Indian merchandize that shall have paid the customs, may, at the end of thirteen months, be re-exported by any subjects, without paying for their customs. The company may export, in their first voyage, now preparing, thirty thousand pounds in foreign coin, or bullion, so that at least six thousand pounds thereof be first coined in the queen's mint; and the like for the subsequent voyages; provided the company first import at least so much foreign coin or bullion, in gold or silver, into this realm, of which six thousand pounds shall be coined as aforesaid. The company may send yearly to East India six good ships and six pinnaces, with five hundred mariners, unless the navy-royal goes forth. None of the queen's subjects, but the company, their servants, or assigns, shall resort to India, without being licenced by the company, upon pain of forfeiting ships and cargoes, with imprisonment till the offenders give one thousand pounds bond to the company not to trade thither again. Nevertheless, for the encouragement of merchants strangers, and others, to bring in commodities to the realm, the queen gives power to the company to grant licences to trade to East India; and she promises not to grant leave to any others to trade thither, during the company's term, without their consent. The majority of any general meeting of the company may admit apprentices, servants, factors, &c. to the fellowship or freedom of the said company. The silver to be exported shall only be shipped at the ports of London, Dartmouth, and Plymouth, and shall be duly entered by the custom-house officers, without paying any custom for the same. Gold and silver, imported by the company, shall be entered before the landing of the same. Provided, that, in case this charter shall hereafter appear not to be profitable to the crown and realm, then, upon two years notice to the company, their charter shall cease and determine: but if otherwise, then the queen promises, at the end of the said fifteen years, upon the company's suit, to grant them a new charter for fifteen years longer."

This is the very same East India company which, through many various vicissitudes, existed under the same denomination until the year 1708, when it was absorbed by the present United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies. The original shares subscribed were fifty pounds each.

To close this account of the rise and first proceedings of our East India company, we shall remark, that the company's ships in their homeward bound passage took possession of the island of St. Helena, then uninhabited; though, according to the custom of the Portuguese, well stocked with goats, hogs, and poultry, that they might be supplied therewith when obliged at any time to stop there. Here our East India company planted and fortified, and held it till the year 1673; as will be shewn in the course of this history. This island is all a high rock, whose surface is covered with about twelve inches of earth. As the winds blow constantly at south-east, from the Cape of Good Hope to this island (which is about twenty-two miles in circuit), it is sailed in about three weeks, without handling the sails, and the moderate gale renders the voyage very pleasant. On the contrary, it is extremely difficult to find this island in sailing from Europe, because of the said constant south-east wind; for which reason, when a ship is sent from England thither, they are obliged to sail directly to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence take their course to St. Helena, as already described. The great and only benefit our shipping receive from this island, is the fresh water and provisions they there meet with in their return from India, whereby above two hundred families are there supported and employed.

The very last day of the XVIth century having thus given birth and form to the first English East India company, the members thereof immediately raised seventy-two thousand pounds, though not in one joint-stock, or common capital, as in succeeding times, there having been no joint-stock in this company till the year 1613. They this year, 1601, sent out their first fleet for India, commanded in chief by captain James Lancaster, having one ship of six hundred tons, one of three hundred tons, two of two hundred each, and one of one hundred and thirty, as victualler to the whole fleet, carrying four hundred and eighty men and twenty seven thousand pounds in money and goods, the remainder of the said seventy-two thousand pounds being entirely expended in the purchase of those ships, and for artillery, ammunition, provisions, &c. But queen Elizabeth did not live to see the return of this voyage. At Acheen, in the island of Sumatra, they loaded pepper for some of their ships, but not meeting with a sufficiency, and sailing from thence for the Streights of Malacca, they completed their lading by the capture of a Portuguese ship of nine hundred tons, laden with calicoes and other goods. Sailing thence to Bantam, they delivered queen Elizabeth's letter and presents to the king, as they had before done to the king of Acheen; and from both those kings they received letters and presents for queen Elizabeth; they also obtained privileges for the company from those monarchs. Having settled factories at Bantam, they sailed homewards, and arrived in the Downs in September, 1603, having prosperously made their first voyage in two years and seven months.

In the year 1601, we have a statute of the forty-third of queen Elizabeth (cap. xii.) for awarding commissioners to hear and determine policies of assurances made among merchants, in the preamble of which statute are the following words: "Whereas it hath been, time out of mind, an usage amongst merchants, both of this realm and of foreign nations, when they make any great adventure (especially into remote parts, to give some consideration of money to other persons (which is commonly in no small number) to have from them assurance made of their goods, merchandizes, ships, and things adventured, or some parts thereof, at such rates, and in such sort as the party assurers and party assured can agree; which course of dealing is commonly termed a Policy of Assurance; by means of which it cometh to pass, upon the loss or perishing of any ship, there followeth not the undoing of any man, but the loss lighteth rather easily upon many, than heavily upon few, and rather upon them that adventure not, than upon those that adventure; whereby all merchants, especially of the younger sort, are allured to venture more willingly, and more freely: and whereas heretofore such assurers have used to stand so justly and precisely on their credit, as few or no controversies have arisen thereupon; and if any have grown, the same have, from time to time, been ended and ordered by certain grave and discreet merchants, appointed by the lord-mayor of London; until of late years, that divers persons have withdrawn themselves from that arbitrary course, and have sought to draw the parties assured to seek their moneys in her majesty's courts, to their great charges and delay. For remedy whereof, it is now enacted, that the lord-chancellor (or keeper) do award one general or standing yearly commission for the determining of causes on policies of assurance, such as now are, or hereafter shall be entered within the office of assurance within the city of London, this commission to consist of the judge of the admiralty, the recorder of London; two doctors of the civil law, two common lawyers, and eight discreet merchants, or to any five of them: which commission shall have authority to determine all causes concerning policies of assurance, in a summary way; who shall summon the parties, examine witnesses upon oath, and imprison disobeyers of their decrees. They shall meet weekly at the office of assurance, on the west side of the Royal Exchange, for the execution of their commission, without fee or reward. And any such as may think themselves aggrieved by their determinations, may, in two months, exhibit his bill in Chancery, for a re-examination of such decree; provided the complainant do first lay down to the said commissioners the sum awarded; and that the lord-chancellor, or keeper, may either reverse or confirm the first decree, according to equity. Lastly, no commissioner shall be an assurer, or assured."

This law sufficiently demonstrates, that at this time there was a great increase of foreign commerce in England.

Assurance, or insurance, of ships and merchandize on the seas, is of great antiquity, even as far back as the reign of the emperor Claudius Cæsar.

The sea-laws of Oleron, as far back as the year 1194, treat of it.

It seems to have been in use in England upon the revival of commerce, somewhat earlier than on the continent; and Antwerp, though in its meridian glory, learned it from England: "whereas (says Molineux's Lex Mercatoria, the meetings of merchants in London were held in Lombard-street (so called because certain nations of Lombardy kept there a pawn-house, or Lombard, long before the Royal Exchange was built), all the policies of assurance at Antwerp; which then were, and now (1622) yet are made, do make mention, that it shall be in all things concerning the said assurances, as was accustomed to be done in Lombard-street in London; which is imitated also in other places of the Low Countries."

As the gradual increase of the suburbs of London does in great measure keep pace with the gradual increase of the general commerce of England, and as it is, moreover, a curious and entertaining part of history, to mark the gradual advances of both, I therefore have no need of an apology for laying before my readers whatever falls in my way of that kind, during the period now before us.

We find by an act of the fourteenth and fifteenth of Henry VIII. (cap. ii.) for limiting foreign artificers as to their journeymen and apprentices, that the jurisdiction of the London corporations was to extend two miles from the city, viz. within the town of Westminster, the parish of St. Martin in the Fields, and of Our Lady in the Strand, St. Clement Danes without Temple-bar, St. Giles in the Fields, St. Andrew in Holborn, the town and borough of Southwark, Shoreditch, White-chapel parish, St. John's street (i. e. Clerkenwell), and Clerkenwell parish, St. Botolph without Aldgate, St. Catherine's (near the Tower of London), and Bermondsey-street." This is an authentic view of the several suburbs of London in the year 1524. Nevertheless we are not to imagine that all those suburbs were contiguous to each other, or joined, as at present to the great contiguity; for there were then, and long after, sundry large breaks, or interruptions, where no buildings were; not only the street (now so well built) called the Strand, then chiefly taken up with the capital dwellings of the nobility, with their large adjoining gardens, but also a great part of St. Martin's parish, were still literally in the Fields: the like may be said of St. Giles in the Fields (then styled the town of St. Giles), and of the upper part of St. Andrew's in Holborn, much of all which, and also of Westminster, Clerkenwell, Shoreditch, White chapel, and Southwark, was literally Fields, even so late as the reign of queen Elizabeth, as appears by a map of London and its suburbs, still extant, first published in the year 1560.

By a statute 24 Henry VIII. the streetway between Charing-cross and Strand-cross (i. e. that is near where Somerset-house is now situated) in the suburbs of London, was directed "to be sufficiently paved and maintained, at the charge of the owners of the land adjoining." This shews that the Strand was not yet built into a continued street.

In the following year, 1534, the high-street between Holborn-bridge and Holborn-bars, at the west end thereof, was directed to be paved; as were also the streets of Southwark; and that every one should maintain the said pavements before his own ground, or forfeit to the king six pence for every yard square.

were brought from beyond seas to sell again, if they were bound: that no man shall buy books by retail, brought from beyond seas; and that the prices of books, increased to a miserable rate, were to be qualified by the king's great officers of state, or the justices, or any two of them. Several other acts, not relating to the business of the Reformation, were likewise passed for the benefit of the subject, but are too immaterial to be mentioned here.

The parliament of 1536, undertook and brought about the union of England with Wales, in the manner we have related in the history of this reign; and, in order to introduce a general uniformity, justices of the peace, with like powers as they have in England, were appointed by the lord chancellor of England in the county-palatine of Chester, and the other counties already mentioned. By another, the inhuman forest-laws were taken away. By another, it was enacted, that no person, from the first of July, 1536, should have power and authority to pardon or remit treasons, murders, manslughters, or any felons, or their accessaries, in any part of England, Wales, or the Marches of the same: that likewise none should make justices of oyer, justices of assize, justices of peace, or justices of jail-delivery; but they should be made by the king's letters patent; and that all original writs, and all manner of indictments of treason, felony, and trespass, and all manner of trespass, should be made in the king's name; and things done against the king's peace, should be supposed to be done against the king's peace, and not against the peace of any other person. But, notwithstanding the generality of those acts, a great many privileges still continued to the proprietors of lordships.

It appears that there was as yet in England no determined method established by the municipal law for the trial of pirates, who were left to the forms of the civil law, which did not admit any one to be put to death without first confessing their offences, and required more strict proof of the fact than the nature of the offence would admit of: by this means great numbers of offenders had escaped; and those who were convicted, were often put to the torture for confession: but it was now enacted, that they should be judged by commissioners appointed by the king, and in the same manner as if their offences had been committed on land; and that no benefit of clergy should be allowed the criminal: the act, however, very properly made a distinction between pirates, and those who took things through necessity, upon the sea; the said things, viz. provisions, materials, or utensils for navigating the ship, to be paid for, if taken on this side the streights of Morocco (Gibraltar, I suppose) in four months; and if on the other side, in twelve. Another act was made in favour of the breed of English horses; and a penalty imposed upon those who, having parks, did not keep mares thirteen hands, and stallions fourteen hands high. Several regulations were likewise made concerning the form for suing for the gifts and grants made under the king's sign manual. The king, likewise, in this session, carried, in part, his former design of voiding private deeds made in prejudice of the right of wardship: it was likewise enacted, that no lands should pass by bargain and sale, but that which was by writing indented, sealed, and enrolled.

We have now the title of the first law ever made in England relating to bankrupts, in the thirty-fourth year of Henry VIII. viz. "the lord-chancellor, treasurer, &c. shall take order with bankrupts bodies, lands, and goods, for the payment of their debts." But there was a farther regulation made in this act by the thirteenth of Elizabeth.

We now come to the time when interest, or use for money lent, and in those days always known by the name of Usury, was first settled in England by law. It was a statute of 37 Henry VIII. cap. ix. entitled, "How offenders in usury shall be punished." Before this time (says the judicious Josiah Child) there was no law for limiting the rate of interest; there was little trade, and as little money, in the nation, wherefore every man took such an interest for what money he could put out, as he could get; which in sundry instances (to be found in history here and there) was, before this time, higher than ten per cent. as partly appears from the strong expressions in this law, the preamble of which says, "that sundry statutes have been made for the avoiding and punishing of usury, being a thing unlawful [and yet, with the same breath, these lawgivers established it; for this was the church's opinion in those times, though never uniformly put in practice], of other corrupt bargains, shiefts, and chevifances; which statutes are so obscure and dark in intent [so framed on purpose to leave room to avoid the penalties; whilst, in general words (to please the clergy), it was declared sinful], and are of so little force, that by reason whereof little or no punishment hath ensued to the offenders of the same; for reformation whereof (says this preamble gravely), be it enacted, that all former statutes concerning usury, shiefts, &c. all forfeitures and penalties concerning the same be henceforth utterly void.

TAXES in the Reign of HENRY VIII.

In his fourth year, in a parliament at Westminster, were granted to the king two fifteenths of the temporalty, and two tenths of the clergy; and head money, of every duke ten marks, an earl five pounds, a baron four pounds, a knight four marks, and every man valued at eight hundred pounds in goods, to pay four marks, and so after that rate till him that was valued at forty shillings, and he paid twelve pence; and every man and woman of fifteen years and upwards, four pence.

In his sixteenth year a parliament was holden, wherein divers subsidies were granted to the king, towards the charges of his wars in France.

In his fourteenth year, order was taken by cardinal Wolsey, that the true value of all men's substance might be known, and would have had every man sworn to give an account of his worth, and required a tenth part thereof towards the king's charges in the then war, as the spirituality had granted a fourth part: this the Londoners thought very hard, and thereupon were excused taking an oath, and were allowed to bring in their bills upon their honesties. But when all was done, after much labouring by the cardinal, the clergy granted one half of their yearly spiritual revenues for five years; and the temporalty, two shillings in the pound, from twenty pounds and upwards; and from forty shillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty shillings twelve pence; and under forty shillings, of every head, of sixteen years and upwards, four pence, to be paid in every two years.

In his sixteenth year, the cardinal, of his own head, attempted by commission to draw the people to pay the sixth part of every man's substance in plate or money; but this was generally opposed, and caused insurrections in several counties, which coming to the king's knowledge, he utterly disavowed it, and blamed the cardinal extremely for attempting it.

In his twenty-fourth year, in a parliament then held, a fifteenth was granted to the king, towards his charges in erecting fortifications against Scotland.

In his thirty-first year, a subsidy of two shillings in the pound upon lands, and twelve upon goods, with four fifteenths, were granted to the king, towards his charges in making bulwarks.

In his thirty-fifth year, a subsidy was granted, to be paid in three years; every Englishman being worth, in goods, twenty shillings and upwards to five pounds, to pay four pence of every pound; from five pounds to ten pounds, eight pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, sixteen pence; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound two shillings: strangers, as well denizens as others, being inhabitants, to pay double. And for lands, every Englishman paid eight pence of the pound, from twenty shillings to five pounds; from five pounds to ten pounds, sixteen pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, two shillings; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound three shillings: strangers double. The clergy, six shillings in every pound of benefices; and every priest having no benefice, but an annual stipend, six shillings and eight pence yearly, during three years.

EDWARD VI.

A Very necessary statute was made the second and third of Edward VI. cap. xv. "for restraining the sellers of all manner of provision in England, from combining together not to sell but at a fixed price; and also for restraining workmen and labourers not to make or do their work but at a fixed price; or to do but a certain work in a day, or not to work but at certain hours." A clause, wisely intended, was added to this act, licensing all manner of workmen relating to building of houses, &c. to follow their occupation in all cities and towns corporate, although they did not live therein, nor were free of such corporations: but this clause was repealed by a statute of the third and fourth of this king, cap. xx. plainly (as appears) by the interposition of the city of London, who represented "that being the king's chamber and most ancient city of this realm, the artificers and craftsmen of the arts, crafts, and mysteries aforesaid, were at great costs and charges, as well in bearing and paying taxes, tallages, subsidies, scot, lot, and other charges, as well to the king's majesty as to the said city, and to many and sundry triumphs and other times for the king's honour; and that if foreigners [i. e. non-freemen] should come and work among them within the liberties of the said city, contrary to their ancient privileges, the same should be a great decay of learning, and the impoverishment and driving away of the freemen, being artificers of the crafts and mysteries aforesaid, within the said city; for reformation whereof, the said clause is hereby repealed entirely." So that the reasons for this repeal are expressed as above only in respect to London, yet the repeal being general, took in all other corporations, cities, and towns; and so it remains to our own times, contrary to the opinion of most wise and judicious men. By cap. iii. of the said second and third year of king Edward VI. for regulating the purveyors for the king's household, post-horses are therein fixed at one penny per mile.

In the third and fourth of king Edward VI. there was an act of parliament passed (cap. ii.) with many well-contrived clauses for preventing of frauds in the woollen manufactures in England, such as for the clothier's seal on his cloth, against over-stretching the cloths, for the well drying of cloth, also for the well dyeing of wool to be converted into cloth, or into hats or caps; also for preventing the putting any deceitful thing upon cloth, such as flocks, chalk, flour, starch, &c. nor to use iron cards in the rowing of cloths; also for just measuring of cloths: for all which purposes overseers are directed to be annually appointed, not only in corporation-towns, by the chief magistrates, jointly with the wardens, &c. of the clothworkers, but in towns, villages, and hamlets not incorporated, by the justices of the peace, jointly with the clothworkers; which overseers shall, at least once in every quarter of a year, or as often as they think needful, visit clothiers, drapers, dyers, and pressers houses, shops, &c. to which overseers one moiety is hereby given of all the forfeitures and penalties of this act, and the other to the king, &c. All which evidently shews the care of the legislature for that manufacture, and also that it was at this time universally spread all over the kingdom, and in a flourishing condition.

Notwithstanding all which favourable laws for regulating the English woollen manufacture, we have another statute, anno 1552 (5 and 6 Edward VI.) for the very same ends and purposes, to which we refer the curious reader.

We have seen, under the year 1515, a statute for ascertaining the length, breadth, and weight of certain English woollen cloths; as also another more ample statute, anno 1549, for more fully regulating the different kinds of them: in this year, 1552, we have another still more extensive law for the same purpose (5 and 6 Edward VI. cap. vi.) wherein the woollen manufactures of all the different counties of England and Wales are ascertained with respect to length, breadth, weight, &c. whereby all former statutes concerning this subject are repealed. Yet, as perfect as this statute might then be thought, there were many more subsequent ones made on the same subject, not only for ascertaining the true dimensions and weight of those cloths, but for discovering and restraining many frauds and irregularities therein; the full recital of which would be both tiresome and unprofitable to the generality of readers; such as are desirous of perusing them, may consult the statute-books.

By cap. xxiv. of the said 5 and 6 Edward VI. there is another monopolizing act relating to the making of felt hats and thrummed hats, coverlets, and dornecks (i. e. diaper linen), though somewhat more moderate than that in favour of the city of York; for whereas, by the statute made in the year 1544, the manufacture of coverlets was absolutely confined to that city alone, exclusive of all other parts whatever of that county, this law now before us only confines the making of the above-named four kinds of goods to the city of Norwich, and to corporate or market-towns of that county.

By a statute of the seventh and last year of king Edward VI. cap. v. "I. The prices of wines are fixed thus; Gascony and Guienne at eight pence per gallon; and Rochelle wine at four pence per gallon; nor should any other wines be sold at an higher price than twelve pence per gallon, on forfeiture of five pounds. This statute is said, in the preamble, to be enacted for the avoiding of many inconveniences, much evil rule, and common resort of misruled persons, used and frequented in many taverns, of late newly set up in back lanes, corners, and suspicious places, both in London and other towns and villages.

"II. The next clause enacts, that none but such as can spend a thousand marks, or else, lastly, shall be the son of a duke, marquis, earl, viscount, or baron of the realm, shall have in his house any vessel of the said wines, for his family's use, exceeding ten gallons, on forfeiture of ten pounds.

"III. Nor shall any person keep a tavern retailing of the said wines, unless licensed, and that only in cities, towns-corporate, boroughs, port-towns, or market-towns, or in the towns of Gravesend, Sitting-bourn, Tuxford, and Bagshot, on the forfeiture of ten pounds: and there shall be but two taverns for retailing wines in every city or town, except in London, which may have forty taverns, in York eight taverns, in Norwich four, in Westminster three, in Bristol six, in Lincoln three, in Hull four, in Shrewsbury three, in Exeter four, in Salisbury three, in Gloucester four, in Westchester four, in Hereford three, in Worcester three, in Southampton three, in Canterbury four, in Ipswich three, in Winchester three, in Oxford three, in Cambridge four, in Colchester three, in Newcastle upon Tyne four. By this limitation it may be thought a pretty near guess may be made at the comparative magnitude of cities and towns, allowances being made for towns situated on very public roads; yet this matter is nevertheless still very uncertain.

"IV. None of the said taverns shall retail wines to be spent or drank within their respective houses.

"V. Merchants may use in their own houses (but not to sell) such wines as they shall import; also high-sheriffs, magistrates of cities and towns, and inhabitants of fortified towns, may keep vessels of wine for their own consumption only."

As extraordinary as several parts of this statute may appear to some of us at this time, they may be pretty well accounted for, not only from the sobriety, poverty, and simplicity of that age, compared with ours, but also from the unsettled and tumultuous disposition of a great part of the people, those especially who adhered to the old religion, and those also who excited commotions in most counties against inclosures; yet, with respect to the limited number of taverns, in several of the fore-named towns, we cannot now perhaps altogether clearly judge or determine the proportion of the magnitude of those places therefrom; for instance, Cambridge is allowed four and Oxford but three taverns; nor some other points relating to this act.

TAXES in the Reign of EDWARD VI.

In no king's reign were ever more parliaments for the time, nor fewer subsidies. The greatest was in his last year, when there was but one subsidy, with two fifteenths and tenths, granted by the temporality, and a subsidy by the clergy. And indeed, to shew how loth this king was to lay impositions upon his people, this may be a sufficient argument, that, though he was much in debt, yet he chose rather to negotiate a loan of money from the people of the Low Countries, at the interest of fourteen per cent. per ann. But his way of raising money was by selling the chantry-lands and religious houses, granted him by parliament; and by enquiring after all church-goods, either remaining or embezzled, as jewels, gold and silver chalices, ready money, copes, and other vestments, reserving to every church one chalice and one covering for the communion-table, the rest to be applied to his own benefit. He also raised money by enquiring after offences of officers in great places: on enquiry one Beaumont, master of the Rolls, being convicted of many crimes, surrendered all his offices, lands, and goods, into the king's hands. Also one Whalley, receiver of Yorkshire, being found a delinquent, surrendered his office, and paid a great fine besides. Also the lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, conscious that he had sold the king's lands and timber woods without commission, and had applied the king's stores to his own use, for these and other offences, surrendered his office, and was fined four thousand pounds, which he paid in hand. One thing more was done in his time, for raising of money; twenty thousand pounds weight of bullion was appointed to be made so much baser, that the king might gain thereby one hundred and forty thousand pounds.

M A R Y.

WE have seen, under the year 1285, that the first statutes made in England for widening the roads between market-towns, was made purely for the prevention of robberies, without the least hint therein of the benefit to arise thereby to carriages, on account of commerce, of which there was but very little at that time.

From that time we meet with nothing relating to that subject (except the paving the suburbs about London, &c.) till king Henry VIII's reign, in which there are four statutes, viz. two for the altering or removing certain roads (annis 14 & 15, cap. vi.) in the Weald of Kent, and (anno 26, cap. vii.) in the deep ways of Suffex; both which have been already taken notice of, under the year 1524; a third, for mending a lane near Chester; and a fourth for the repair of bridges, and highways at the ends of bridges; neither of which two did we think worthy of animadversion. But commerce beginning to increase considerably in the reign of his daughter Mary, whereby the old roads became much more frequented by heavy carriages, an act, of 2 and 3 Philip and Mary, anno 1555 (cap. viii.) takes notice, "that the highways were then very noisome and tedious to travel in, and dangerous to all carriages; wherefore it was now enacted (and is still in force), that every parish should annually elect two surveyors of the highways, to see that the parishioners, according to their lands, abilities, farms, &c. send their carts, horses, men, tools, &c. four days in every year, for mending the roads." So that this is properly the first general statute made for mending the roads, extending extending to all England and Wales, by the labour and expence of each respective parish alone; and on that bottom alone we find in all six statutes relating to this subject in queen Mary's reign, nineteen in queen Elizabeth's, and one in king James I's reign; after which there were none of this kind till king Charles II's Restoration. The said parochial means for keeping the roads in repair were found, in most cases, tolerably effectual, till after the Restoration of Charles II. when the vast increase of the nation's commerce and manufactures, and of the capital city of London, with the concomitant increase of luxury, brought in such a number of heavy-wheeled carriages on our roads, as rendered it by degrees impracticable in most cases for parishes entirely to keep their own part of the roads in tolerable condition, more especially in the counties near London, and in the manufacturing counties. This has introduced the more equitable and effectual method of tolls payable at numberless toll-gates (called turnpikes) by the identical wearers of those roads alone: and many subsequent local statutes have been made for those ends, and also several general ones for limiting the weight of waggon-loads, the breadth of wheel-rims, called fellies, the number of horses, &c. And thus much we thought sufficient to serve for a summary history of the laws relating to the roads of England, so as not to have much occasion to name them any more in this work.

What we have here said, concerning a summary history of the keeping the roads or highways of England in repair, may also be partly applied to the subject of deepening rivers, and meliorating havens or harbours on the sea-coasts. With respect to the former, we have seen that the first instance thereof in the statute book, is that of the third of Henry VI. (cap. v.) for deepening the river Lea from the town of Ware to London, an. 1424; and that in his ninth year (cap. ix.) for the same end: after which we find none, either for rivers or for havens, till the reign of Henry VIII. who repaired and fortified several harbours; for that of 4 Henry VII. for preserving the river Thames, relates merely to the fishing therein; and that of the eleventh of the same king, for removing weirs and engines from Southampton harbour, was for the like purpose; but we find no more statutes of either kind till queen Elizabeth's reign, some of which, as also subsequent ones, we may perhaps think it necessary to take a more particular notice of, in their respective places; as also for bridges over rivers.

TAXES in the Reign of Queen MARY.

Queen Mary began with a rare example, for in the first year of her reign, she remitted, by proclamation, the subsidy of four shillings in the pound of land, and two shillings in the pound of goods granted in the last parliament of king Edward VI.

In her second year, in a parliament then holden, was granted to the king and queen a subsidy of the laity, from five pounds to ten pounds, of eight pence in the pound; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, of twelve pence in the pound; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of sixteen pence in the pound; all strangers to pay double: and the clergy, six shillings in the pound. If this were all, then, upon the matter, in all her time there came no new charge upon her people: for one subsidy remitted, and one received, made but even.

In her last year she borrowed twenty thousand pounds of the city of London, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum.

ELIZABETH.

IN the fifth year of Elizabeth (cap. iii.) was the first statute enacted in England for the relief of the poor: for whereas all other acts of parliament were only on the foot of voluntary contributions for the poor, resting or depending upon the charitable devotion of the people, which method had not answered the intended purpose, or prevented common beggars from multiplying every where, it was now therefore found necessary to go a step farther. It is certain that the suppression of the convents had not a little increased this disorder; those houses having been a great relief to the poor of their own lands, and in their neighbourhood, to whom not only their kitchens, but their granaries, were ever open, more especially in times of dearth; when, therefore, the church-lands were sold by Henry VIII. at very easy purchases, it was then declared to be for enabling the buyers to keep up that wonted hospitality, which, however, they greatly neglected to do; yet still there was no compulsory law till now. This act, therefore, after "directing poor and impotent persons of every parish to be relieved of that which every person will, of their charity, give weekly, to be gathered by collectors, and distributed to the poor, so as none of them shall go, or sit, openly begging; (now comes the compulsory clause) and if any parishioner shall obstinately refuse to pay reasonably towards the relief of the said poor, or shall discourage others, then the justices of the peace, at their quarter-sessions, may tax him at a reasonable weekly sum; which if he refuses to pay, they may commit him to prison: yet, where the parishioners have more poor than they can relieve, the justices may licence so many of their poor as they shall think proper, to beg in one or more hundreds of their respective counties. Lastly, beggars in any other place than where legally licenced, were to be punished according to the laws of vagabonds."

The next statute of the same session of parliament (viz. cap. iv.) entitled "A repeal of so much of former statutes as concern the hiring, keeping, departing, working, or order of servants, labourers, &c. and a declaration who shall be compelled to serve in handicrafts, and whom in husbandry, and their several duties, &c." gives the substance of many former laws, with their imperfections, contrariety, and remarks, and observes that the wages ascertained in many of those acts of parliament were now become insufficient, by reason of the advanced prices of all necessaries since those times; yet, large and comprehensive as this act is (and too much of it is still in force) there are sundry subsequent statutes, both in this and succeeding reigns, for the regulation of disputes between masters and their servants, apprentices, and labourers, concerning their wages, time of labour, &c.

The next law (cap. v.) of that year, entitled "Constitutions for the maintenance of the navy, &c." contains many good clauses for encouraging our own shipping and mariners: as "I. By permitting herrings, and other fish caught upon our coasts, to be exported duty-free. II. That no foreign ships shall carry any goods coastwise, from any one English port to another. III. Wines and woad shall be imported from France in English shipping alone (with some inconsiderable exceptions.) IV. That, as well for the maintaining of shipping, the increase of fishermen and mariners, and the repairing of port-towns, as for the sparing and increase of the flesh victuals of this realm, it shall not be lawful for any to eat flesh on Wednesday and Saturdays, on the penalty of three pounds for each offence, excepting cases of sickness; and also those by special licences to be obtained [this purely political fasting from flesh meat was partly altered by cap. ii. 27 Eliz. by leaving out Wednesday; yet the victuallers were to utter no flesh in Lent, nor on Fridays and Saturdays]; for which said licence obtained by peers, they were to pay one pound six shillings and four pence to the poor's box of the parish; knights and their wives, thirteen shillings and four pence; and others, six shillings and eight pence each: but no licence was to extend to the eating of beef [on these days] at any time of the year [this shews, that in those days, black cattle were deemed scarce]; nor to the eating of veal, in any year, from Michaelmas to the first day of May. "But because (adds the statute) no person shall misjudge the intent of this statute, be it enacted, that whosoever shall, by preaching, teaching, writing, or open speech, notify that any eating of flesh, or forbearing of flesh, mentioned in this statute, is of any necessity for saving the soul of man, or that it is the service of God, otherwise than as other polite laws are and be, then such persons shall be punished as spreaders of false news ought to be."

In the following year the parliament, assembled at Westminster, among others, passed the following acts, viz. I. An act against holding or maintaining the authority of the bishop of Rome. II. That no one shall procure a false witness, upon the penalty of forty pounds; nor any one be a false witness, upon the penalty of twenty pounds, and six months imprisonment. III. An act making the clipping and wasting of coin treason. IV. That any person who shall be seen or found in the company of Egyptians [gypsies], shall be deemed felons. V. An act for the due execution of the act "De excommunicato capiendo." VI. An act for translating the Bible and Common Prayer Book into Welsh. VII. An act to establish and confirm the queen's supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs. The work of Reformation, which, with several interruptions, had been carrying on above thirty years, was in a great measure completed, and the articles of the church of England settled by the convocation, and reduced to the number of thirty-nine, as they stand at this day.

The parliament which was dissolved on the twenty-second of January, 1567, made the following acts: I. An act declaring the making and consecrating of bishops within this realm, to be good, orderly, and lawful. II. That no man shall send any rams, sheep, or lambs, alive, out of the realm, upon pain, for the first offence, of forfeiture of all his goods, and one year's imprisonment; and for the second, of being declared a felon. III. That cut-purses and pickpockets shall not have benefit of clergy. IV. Whereas there was but one sheriff for Surry and Suffex, one for Essex and Hertfordshire, one for Somerset and Dorsetshire, one for Warwick and Leicestershire, one for Nottingham and Derbyshire, one for Oxford and Berkshire; it was ordered that, for the future (the year 1567 being the first), each of these counties should have a sheriff respectively.

In the year 1571, the fourteenth of Elizabeth's reign, was passed the famous act for the maintaining the queen's title, of which we have given the substance, in our history of that reign*. The other acts made in this parliament are little worth notice, if we except one relating to the clergy, by which it is enacted, "that no ecclesiastical person shall be admitted to any benefice with cure, except he be twenty-three years of age at least, and shall first subscribe the articles of religion, in presence of the ordinary, and, within two months after induction, read the same in his parish-church, in the time of common prayer, and declare his unfeigned assent thereunto, and all this upon pain of deprivation. That no one shall retain a benefice with cure, being under the age of twenty-one years, or without a testimonial of his honest life, nor unless he is able to render to the ordinary an account of his faith in Latin."

In the eighteenth year of her reign, an act was passed, making it treason to impair, diminish, or falsify the coin of the realm.

The parliament of 1585 enacted several severe laws against papists: it was also declared, "that no person should be returned to serve upon juries, but who has an estate of freehold lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to the clear yearly value of four pounds at least."

The parliament which met in February, 1593, passed a very rigid statute against all non-conformists, which equally affected papists and protestants. In the preamble to this act it is said, "that this act was made for preventing and avoiding such great inconveniences and perils as might happen and grow by the wicked and dangerous practices of seditious sectaries and disloyal persons." The act ran, "that if any person above the age of sixteen years, shall refuse to repair to some church, or refuse to do the same for the space of one month, shall be committed to prison, there to remain, without bail or mainprize, until they shall conform, and make such open submission and declaration of their conformity, as by this act is appointed." The offenders against this statute, who refused to make the submission, were to abjure the realm, and not to return without her majesty's licence, under the penalty of suffering as felons, without benefit of clergy. This bill met with great opposition in the house of commons, as may be seen in d'Ewe's Journal, p. 474, &c. where the speeches on both sides are inserted. There was an act also made against popish recusants, by which they were confined within five miles of their respective dwellings, on forfeiture of all their goods and chattles, together with lands, during life. By another act all the abbey-lands were confirmed to the crown and grantees.

The parliament which met at Westminster on the twenty-fourth of October, 1597, and was dissolved on the ninth of February, 1598, made the following acts: "I. An act for the punishment of rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars: by this statute all the following persons are to be adjudged rogues and vagabonds: people who go about begging as poor scholars, or on the pretence of loss by fire or shipwreck; collectors for jails, or persons delivered out of jail and begging for their fees; such as use any subtle craft or unlawful games, fortune-tellers, gypsies, fencers, bear-wards, common players, and minstrels, jugglers, lurkers, pedlars, and petty-chapmen, fellows not working for reasonable wages when they are able, and the like: their punishment is, to be whipped and sent from parish to parish, by the officer in each, the next straight way to the parish where they were born, or last dwelt for the space of a whole year. II. An act for erecting hospitals, houses of correction, and workhouses for the poor. III. One for the increase of mariners, and maintenance of navigation. IV. An act against lewd and wandering persons, pretending to be soldiers or mariners, and travelling without testimonials from justices of the peace.

In the last parliament of this reign, holden at Westminster, on the twenty-seventh of October, 1601, the following statutes were passed. I. An act for the relief of the poor, appointing the choosing of overseers, and the manner of raising money for the relief of the poor. II. That every parish in England shall pay a weekly sum for the relief of the sick, hurt, and maimed soldiers and mariners. III. An act to redress the misemployment of lands, goods, &c. given to charitable uses. IV. That persons cutting and carrying away corn growing, robbing of orchards, breaking or cutting up hedges, poles, &c. and digging or pulling up fruit-trees, cutting or spoiling wood or underwood, not being felony by law, shall be obliged to make satisfaction or be whipped.

TAXES in the Reign of Queen ELIZABETH.

In the parliament holden in the first year of her reign, a subsidy was granted, of two shillings and eight pence in the pound on goods, and four shillings on lands, to be paid at two several payments, by every person, spiritual and temporal.

In her sixth year, in a parliament held at Westminster, one subsidy was granted by the clergy, and another by the laity, together with two fifteenths and tenths.

In her eighth year, at a parliament then held, there were offered to her four subsidies, upon condition she would declare a successor; but she refused their offer, and directly remitted the fourth subsidy which they had granted, saying, "that it was all one, whether the money was in her subjects coffers or in her own."

In her thirteenth year, in a parliament then held, towards her charges of repressing the Northern rebellion, there was granted her a subsidy of six shillings in the pound, by the clergy; and by the temporality, two fifteenths, and a subsidy of two shillings and eight pence in the pound.

In her six-and-thirtieth year a parliament was holden, in which two subsidies were granted by the clergy, and by the laity three, besides six fifteenths and tenths; but it was put in this act, that this contribution, the like whereof had not been known in former ages, should not be drawn into example.

In her fortieth year, in a parliament at Westminster were granted her by the clergy three entire subsidies, and by the laity as many, with six fifteenths and tenths.

In her forty-second year, to furnish her with money towards the Irish war, she delegated certain commissioners to confirm the crown-lands to the possessors that held any of controverted titles, and to take money for the confirmation, thereby to take away the trouble by contractors, who were at this time very busy.

ARTS and SCIENCES, MANNERS and CUSTOMS, in the XVIth Century.

IF there is a satisfaction, says a modern historian, in viewing in painting and sculpture the features of our ancestors, it must be equally so to read in the page of history their manners and dispositions. We have already shewn how great encouragement learning and the polite arts received from Wolsey, in the beginning of this period; neither were the English wanting all this time in cultivating and cherishing new-born arts and discoveries. One Owen is noted as being the first who, about the year 1536, cast brass cannon in England, some specimens of which are said to be still preserved in the Tower of London. The art of printing had also before this time been imported, and had been brought to as great perfection in England as in any neighbouring country. Music and painting had met likewise with encouragement, Henry himself having some taste for those arts, as appears from several letters patent in favour of their professors, especially to the famous Hans Holbein.

Archbishop Nicholson, in his English Historical Library, speaking of the state of geographical knowledge at or about this period, observes, "that since the beginning of king Henry VIII's reign, our eldest general geographer or antiquary is said to have been Thomas Sulmo, a Guernsey man, who died at London in the year 1545. The year following, a much greater man of the profession, sir Thomas Elliot, one of king Henry's ambassadors, and sir Thomas More's friends, died also. Cotemporary with those two was George Lily (son of William, the famous grammarian), who lived some time at Rome with cardinal Pole, and published the first exact map that ever was, till then, drawn of this island."

In the year 1521 was first introduced the use of hand-guns or musquets, whereby, in process of time the practice of bows and arrows in war was quite laid aside.

About the year 1535, glasses were first begun to be made in England: the finer sort was made in Crutched-friars, London; the fine flint-glass, little inferior to that of Venice, was first made in the Savoy-house, in the Strand, London; but the first glass-plates for looking-glasses and coach-windows, were made about the year 1673, at Vauxhall, near Lambeth, by the encouragement of the duke of Buckingham. The English have improved this manufacture so greatly, as to surpass every other nation in Europe in this useful branch of business.

The ingenious author of the Present State of England, printed in 1683, acquaints us, that the first manufacture of knives in England was begun in 1562, by Thomas Matthews, on Fleet-bridge, London.

London. How strangely are things altered since those times! for now London excels all the earth in this article, and supplies many other nations therewith in great quantities.

Mr. Anderſon, in his moſt elaborate and uſeful work, lately published, concerning the Origin of Commerce, to which I acknowledge myſelf greatly indebted for many curious extracts, tells us that he has in his poſſeſſion the firſt work ever published in England on the art of Italian book-keeping, or merchants-accounts by double-entry; it is a folio, printed at London, anno 1569, in a black letter, the author James Peele. The ſtyle (ſays Mr. Anderſon) is obſolete, yet he has ſufficiently teſtified that he underſtood the true grounds and principles of double-entry accounts full as well as ſome who have written much later.

In all probability, this art of double-entry accounts had its riſe, or at leaſt its revival, amongſt the mercantile cities of Italy: poſſibly it might be firſt known at Venice, about the time that numeral algebra was taught there, from the principles of which ſcience double-entry, or what we call merchants-accounts, ſeem to have been deduced, viz. about the middle of the XVth century, though it did not reach England till our commerce, about this time, began to be conſiderable. It is ſaid that Lucas de Burgo, a friar, was the firſt European author who published his algebraic work at Venice, anno 1494.

In the year 1589, William Lee, M. A. of St. John's college, Cambridge, invented an engine or ſteel-loom, called the Stocking-frame, for knitting or weaving of ſtockings. This was but twenty years after we had firſt learned from Spain the method of knitting them with wires or needles. Mr. Lee's invention has proved of conſiderable benefit to the ſtocking manufacture, by enabling England, in after times, to export vaſt quantities of ſilk ſtockings to Italy, &c. where, it ſeems (by ſir Joſiah Child's excellent Diſcourſe on Trade, firſt published in the year 1678), they had then not got the uſe of the ſtocking-frame, though little ſhort of one hundred years after its invention: yet Dr. Howell, in his History of the World (vol. iii. p. 222.) makes this invention eleven years after, 1600; and adds, that Mr. Lee not only taught his art in England and in France, but his ſervants did the ſame in Spain, Venice, and Ireland.

We have the beſt authority for fixing the date of the firſt manufacturing of ſail-cloth in England to the year 1599, being the preamble to an act of parliament of king James I. cap. xxiii. reciting, that “whereas the cloths called Mildernix, and Powl Davies, whereof ſails and other furniture for the navy and ſhipping are made, were heretofore altogether brought out of France, and other parts beyond ſea, and the ſkill and art of making and weaving the ſaid cloth was never known or uſed in England till about the thirty-second year of the reign of the late queen Elizabeth (i. e. 1590.), about which time the ſkill and art of making and weaving was attained to, and ſince practiſed and continued in this realm to the great benefit and commodity thereof,” &c.

As we ſtill excel all nations upon earth both in naval power and maritime commerce, every thing relative to either ſhould (as far as is practicable) come to us at the firſt hand; yet, though it may ſeem ſomewhat ſtrange, that a nation in thoſe days very far from being eminent in ſhipping, ſhould have ſo long ſupplied us with this great article, it ought to be conſidered, that they were in thoſe days (and long before we fell into it) eminent for the manufacture of many kinds of excellent cloths, made both of flax and hemp; and that perfection (in almoſt every art) is not to be arrived at but by very ſlow degrees.

In or about the ſame year was the invention of the telescope or ſpying-glaſs diſcovered, being juſtly eſteemed one of the moſt uſeful and excellent diſcoveries of modern times; though it was, it ſeems, produced by mere chance. The common account is, that two children of one Janſſen, a ſpectacle-maker at Middleburgh, in Zealand, being at play in their father's ſhop, and looking through two pieces of glaſs between their fingers, which were at ſome ſmall diſtance from each other, the weather-cock of the church-ſteeple appeared to them unuſually large, and much nearer; of this they inſtantly told their father, who, ſurprized alſo at firſt, made the experiment of fixing two ſuch pieces of glaſs in brazen circles, or cylinders, ſo as they might be placed nearer or farther, at pleaſure. Janſſen very ſoon improved this diſcovery ſo much, that he preſented a telescope, twelve inches long, to prince Maurice, and another to the archduke Albert. Mr. Wotton (in his Reflections on ancient and modern Learning) relates, “that prince Maurice, conjecturing this might be of great uſe in war, deſired him to conceal his ſecret, and for that reaſon his name was ſo little known, that neither Des Cartes nor Gerard Voſſius had ever heard any thing of him, when they attributed this invention to one Jacobus Metius, of Alldmain.” None of theſe firſt telescopes, however, were above eighteen inches long, neither were they properly framed for aſtronomical obſervations, until Galileo, aſtronomer to the grand-duke of Tuscany, hearing of this diſcovery for bringing objects nearer, made ſuch great improvements therein, as to have gained him, in the opinion of many, the honour of the invention itſelf, by giving to the telescope the appellation of Galileo's Tube. Some, indeed, make this noble invention to have happened ſome years later, and that J. Baptiſta Porta, a Neapolitan, was the firſt inventor; but the general belief is as above. Our incomparable ſir Iſaac Newton was the inventor of the reflecting telescope, conſiſting of ſpecula, or mirrors, inſtead of lenſes, which has been ſince much improved, and is much more exact than reflecting ones. The microscope, which magnifies the ſmalleſt objects ſo as to be diſtinctly viewed, was diſcovered in the year 1621; and it is ſaid this happened both at Naples and Holland at the ſame time. Mezeray makes this invention eighteen years later; yet he adds, that even the ancients muſt have known the uſe of them, if what Roger Bacon ſays be true, viz. “that Julius Cæſar being on the Belgic ſhore, oppoſite Britain, did, with certain great burning-glaſſes, diſcover the poſture and diſpoſition of the Britiſh army, and all the coaſts of that country.”—Which whoever pleaſe, may believe!

By the telescope, aſtronomy is brought to ſuch a degree of perfection, as it was impoſſible for the ancients to arrive at. Navigation, and conſequently commerce, is likewise much aſſiſted, from a more perfect diſcovery of the heavenly bodies:

and many volumes have been published of the wonderful and amazing discoveries made by the microscope.

About this time flourished the famous Danish astronomer, Tycho Brahe, who made some astronomical discoveries and improvements, which proved very beneficial to navigation and maritime commerce. He deceased anno 1601.

The progress which the fine arts made in England since the death of their patron, Wolfey, was next to nothing. The English poetry, indeed, seemed to have risen amongst us complete, and is the only art that, since the days of Shakespear and Spencer, has been on the declining hand. Architecture came, towards the middle and close of this century, to be more sumptuous; but its style was barbarous. Painting has, in England, been always of foreign growth, and when transplanted hither, has been but just kept alive by the bounty of the great; nor could England, during the successive reigns of Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, produce a patron like Wolfey, or an artist like Holbein, who in the likeness could draw the character.

The progress made in the mathematical art was confined to the studies of Dee and one or two more, who were patronized by Burleigh. In natural philosophy the nation was excessively ignorant, insomuch that we read in the year 1577, some of the greatest men about court suffered themselves to be bubbled out of considerable sums by impostors, who pretended to the secret of transmuting metals: we are sorry to find the name of that great and able man Burleigh, in the list of those dupes of a senseless credulity. The queen's own example re-

Although the nobility of this age preserved great remains of the ancient customs, yet they were by degrees acquiring the taste of elegant luxury, and many edifices in particular were built by them, neat, large, and sumptuous, to the great ornament of the kingdom, says Camden, but to the no less decay of the glorious hospitality of the nation. It is, however, more reasonable to think, that this new turn of expence promoted arts and industry, while the ancient hospitality was the source of real disorder and sedition, idleness. Among the other species of luxury, that of apparel began much to increase during this age, and the queen thought proper to restrain it by proclamation. Her example was very little conformable to her edicts; as no woman was ever more conceited of her beauty, nor more desirous of making impressions on the hearts of beholders; no one ever went to greater extravagance in apparel, nor studied more the variety and richness of her dress; she appeared almost every day in a different habit, and tried all the several modes by which she hoped to make herself agreeable: she was likewise so fond of her cloaths, that she never would part with any of them; and at her death she had in her wardrobe all the different habits, to the number of three thousand, which she had ever worn in her life-time. The retrenchment of the ancient hospitality, and the diminution of retainers, was ever favourable to the prerogative of the sovereign, and, by disabling the great noblemen from resistance, promoted the execution of the laws, and extended the authority of the courts of justice.

OF COMMERCE, HUSBANDRY, NAVIGATION, PUBLIC REVENUES, &c. in ENGLAND during the XVIth Century.

THE English had not the same splendor of success with the Spaniards, nor such influence in other courts, nor did they possess that great power which rendered Spain so dangerous to her neighbours; but they acquired a new kind of glory from the ocean, and the extensive maritime trade they carried on: they knew their true element, and that alone made them more happy than all the foreign conquests and possessions of their ancient kings, and they became a powerful, civilized, industrious, laborious, and enterprising nation. The improvements made by the Spaniards in navigation excited their emulation, and they undertook three successive voyages to discover a north-west passage to Japan and China: Drake and Cavendish sailed round the globe, attacking in all places those very Spaniards who had extended their conquest and trade to both ends of the world: the famous sir Walter Raleigh established the colony of Virginia, and afterwards assisted in that expedition wherein the English fleet went and insulted Philip II. upon his own coasts, destroying his ships, and burning the rich city of Cadiz: at length, grown more formidable, they, in 1602, defeated the first fleet Philip III. sent to sea, and from that time acquired a superiority at sea, which they have ever since maintained.

From the first beginning of Elizabeth's reign they applied themselves to manufactures. The Flemings, being persecuted by Philip II. removed to London, bringing with them an increase of inhabitants, industry, and riches. This capital, which enjoyed the blessings of peace under Elizabeth, cultivated likewise the liberal arts, which are the badges and consequences of plenty: in a word, London was enlarged, civilized, and embellished, and in a short time one half of the little island of Great Britain was able to counterbalance the whole power of Spain.

The English now figured as the second nation in the world in industry, as in liberty they were the first. They began early to establish a navy-royal; they commenced a great fishery on the Banks of Newfoundland, a whale-fishery in the North Seas, and a trade to Russia; and, by means of an important discovery of a passage by sea to that country, round the north cape of Lapland, opened an extensive field for other discoveries, and new branches of commerce; they also commenced their Turkey trade; and in the very last year of this century incorporated the East India company.

Agriculture now began to be considered in England as the chief riches of the state, while in Spain they began to neglect this real good for ideal treasures: the gold and silver trade of the new world enriched the king of Spain, but in England the subject was benefited by the sale of the natural commodities. A private merchant of London, sir they may keep looms in their houses, and do every other matter relating to spinning, weaving, and cloth-making in the said counties as before the making this statute."

After England had held the town and port of Calais (with its dependent garrisons of Guisnes and Ham) for two hundred and eleven years (the only part of the continent of France held by England) during which time it was not only a door always open for the invasion of France, over which, for that reason, England had no small influence; but (which is more to our purpose) was extremely well situated for a staple port, to disperse, in more early times, the wool, lead, tin, and, in later times, the woollen manufactures of England, into the inland countries of the Netherlands, France, and Germany; the loss of this important place (in the year 1558) to the French, most shamefully and negligently, in the midst of winter, was undoubtedly a considerable prejudice to commerce, and not a little to the honour and influence of England. Hereupon the staple of wool, &c. was removed to Burges, to the great benefit of that city, which had been for some time declining from its ancient opulence and grandeur.

That most diligent agent for the Russian company, Mr. Anthony Jenkinson, did, in the year 1557, first set on foot a new channel of trade, through Russia into Persia, for raw silk, &c. He sailed down the great river Volga to Nisi, Novogorod, Casan, and Astracan, and thence crossed the Caspian sea to Persia. At Boghar, a goodly city, he found merchants from India, Persia, Russia, and Cathay or China, from which last-mentioned country it was nine months journey to Boghar. Jenkinson returned the same way to Colmizro, in the bay of St. Nicholas, anno 1560, and so home the same year to England. On his return he published the first map of Russia, that had ever been made. This voyage, it seems, he performed seven different times; yet so promising a prospect for that company was dropped some few years afterwards, and remained as if it had never been, until the reign of king George II. anno 1744, when it was revived by an act of parliament, enabling the Russia company to trade thence into Persia; upon which considerable quantities of raw silk were brought home by the very same way that Jenkinson took from Persia to Russia, and thence to England: yet the continual troubles and ravages in Persia have since suspended the good effects of this law.

We are now arrived (November 17, 1558) at the commencement of the most illustrious female reign, and of the longest duration, which probably ever existed in the world, viz. that of the truly great Elizabeth, queen of England, it is not now either our present province or intention to draw her character at length, which has already been done; we shall therefore, at this entrance on her glorious government, confine ourselves to this one brief remark, viz. that, to her immortal honour and her kingdom's immense benefit, her reign was supplied with more important articles for commercial history, and more beneficial to the kingdom (even whilst she was surrounded by foreign and domestic enemies) than perhaps all the preceding reigns jointly, since the time of her great predecessor king Edward III. We shall here only in general remark, that, on her now succeeding to the crown, she found the balance of power and wealth already got into the hands of the commons, or people, she prudently conducted her measures accordingly; though now and then she would exert her prerogative as far (though with more prudence) as did some of her less wise successors.

In the year 1560, the second of Elizabeth, she by her charter confirmed all former charters of privileges to the company of merchant-adventurers of England, and likewise granted them two other ample charters, viz. one in the sixth, and the other in the twenty-eighth year of her reign, in the former of which they had first the designation of Merchant-adventurers given them.

The English Russian company which had been incorporated in the first and second of Philip and Mary, anno 1554, had now the noble sanction of an act of parliament, in the eighth year of Elizabeth's reign.

Martin (afterwards sir Martin) Frobisher or Forbisher made now his first voyage for discovering a north-west passage to the East Indies. Captain Luke Fox, in his book, in quarto, entitled The North-west Fox, printed anno 1535, says, "that Mr. Forbisher was fifteen years in noting and bringing up the adventure, before he did attempt the same, which was brought to pass by the help of Ambrose Dudley, earl of Warwick." He set out with two barks, of twenty-five tons each, and one pinnace, of ten tons, and entered the streights going into the great bay (since called Hudson's Bay), which he named Forbisher's Streight; he also gave the following names to places there, viz. Queen Elizabeth's Foreland, Cape Labrador, Gabriel's Island, Prior's Sound, and sundry other islands, capes, and bays, by which names the same places are known to this day. He brought home one of the savages, and also a kind of bright stone, which being tried by the London goldsmiths, it was given out by them, that it held gold in it very richly, and are said to have promised great matters, if any quantity thereof could be obtained; which flattering hopes produced a second voyage, ten years after, although no north-west passage was found.

Mr. John Hawkins, assisted by the subscriptions of sundry gentlemen, now fitted out three ships, and having learned that Negroes were a very good commodity in Hispaniola, he sailed to the coast of Guinea, took in Negroes, and sailed with them for Hispaniola; where he sold his slaves and English commodities, and loaded his three vessels with hides, sugar, and ginger, and also many pearls, returning home anno 1563, after making a prosperous voyage. This seems to have been the very first attempt from England for establishing a Negroe trade.

The English genius was not to be discouraged by former unsuccessful attempts for finding a passage to China and the East Indies, without interfering with the Portuguese by the Cape of Good Hope south-eastward, nor with the Spaniards south-westward by the Streights of Magellan: and as they had attempted in vain a passage north-eastward, there seemed now only the north-westward passage to be explored, which we have seen had been in part already attempted by Forbisher. The Portuguese and Spanish chart-makers and cosmographers were, it seems, expressly enjoined by their sovereigns, not to give any kind of light to any other nation, in this respect, because they were greatly apprehensive left, if there were any such north-west passage, it would prove a much shorter course to India and China than theirs, either by the south-east or south-west passage. For encouraging the English in this attempt, sundry treatises were published by sir Humphrey Gilbert, Mr. Richard Wilkes, &c. built mostly upon the romantic reports of certain ancient and some more modern authors, without any solid probability: yet, upon such slight grounds, and encouragement of friends, captain Forbisher made his second attempt in 1577, with one of the queen's own ships, two barks, and one hundred and forty persons, some of whom were gentlemen. He again entered the streights he had named after himself in his former attempt, where he found store of glittering stones and sand, which he had seen in his last voyage, and with which he now loaded his vessels, returning home the same year, with his imaginary treasure, which, upon farther trial proved good for nothing. However, this served to give rise to the third and last fruitless attempt, by the same sea-commander, in the ensuing year, to find out a north-west passage to China.

In the same year, 1578, Hakluyt gives us an account of the Newfoundland fishers from Europe, in the preceding year, viz. "One hundred ships from Spain; fifty from Portugal, one hundred and fifty from France, and fifteen from England: that the English had the best ships, and therefore gave law to the rest, being in the bays, and protectors of others; for which it was then, and had been of old a custom to make them some sort of acknowledgement as admirals, such as a boat-load of salt for guarding them from pirates and other violent invaders, who frequently drove them from a good harbour," &c. He says, "the fishery of the English at Iceland was the reason that we had not then such numbers of ships at Newfoundland; that the Spaniards, next to the English, had the best ships there; that there were then also twenty or thirty ships from Biscay, to kill whales, for train-oil." (But here is no mention as yet of whale-fins, or whale-bone, of so great value in our days (which shews its use for women's stays, &c. was not then known.) His friend, in a letter from Newfoundland, is earnest for the English to settle at the island of Cape Breton, for the benefit of the fishery, and in another isle in the mouth of the great river of St. Laurence. Hakluyt was in those times a most indefatigable enquirer after new trades and discoveries, and was undoubtedly of great use to our adventurers, by giving them much light into the nature and means of discoveries, and seems to have been a public blessing to England in those days.

We have, in the former part of the history of this reign, given an account of the circumnavigation of the terraqueous globe by sir Francis Drake, and therefore have no occasion to recapitulate the particulars of that transaction in this place; we shall therefore proceed to give a short account of the first establishment of, and charter granted to, the English Turkey company.

Queen Elizabeth having settled preliminaries at Constantinople, two years before, for her subjects to trade to Turkey, she now (viz. anno 1581) judged it reasonable to incorporate a number of eminent merchants for that end, sir Edward Osborn, an alderman of London, Thomas Smith, esq. Richard Staper, and William Garrett, merchants; in which charter of corporation the queen sets forth, "that the said sir Edward Osborn and Richard Staper, had, at their own great costs and charges, found out and opened a trade to Turkey, not heretofore, in the memory of any man living, known to be commonly used and frequented, by way of merchandize, by any merchants or other subjects of us or our progenitors, whereby many good offices may be done for the peace of Christendom, relief of Christian slaves, and good vent of the commodities of the realm, to the advancement of her honour and dignity, the increase of her revenue, and of the general wealth of the realm: her majesty therefore grants unto those four merchants, their executors and administrators, and to such Englishmen (not exceeding twelve in number) as the said sir Edward Osborn and Richard Staper shall appoint to be joined to them and the other two before-named persons, and their factors, servants, or deputies, for the space of seven years to trade to Turkey, in such manner as the said company shall agree between themselves. During which time, they may make bye-laws for their good government (not repugnant to the laws of the kingdom.) Nothing to be transacted without the consent of the governor for the time being (sir Edward Osborn being hereby appointed the first governor): the trade to Turkey to be solely to them, their factors and servants, during the said term: and any other subjects trading thither, either by sea or land, without this company's licence, to forfeit ships and goods; a moiety to the crown, the other moiety to this company. For the last six of the said seven years, this company shall export so much goods to Turkey as shall annually pay at least five hundred pounds custom to the crown (except in case of ship wreck, &c.) I. Proviso, that in case this exclusive grant shall hereafter appear to be inconvenient, the queen may revoke the same, upon one year's previous notice. II. Proviso, the queen, during the said term, may nominate two persons to be added to the said number of patentees, with the same privileges, &c. as the rest herein named. Lastly, that if, at the end of the said seven years these grantees desire it, the queen will grant other seven years to them, provided (as aforesaid) the said exclusive trade shall not appear to be unprofitable to the kingdom."

The queen's letters to the grand signor were received with much civility, being delivered to him by her ambassador, Hareborne, anno 1582, whom she empowered to settle consuls in the several ports, and to establish laws or rules to be observed by the English trading to Turkey.

With the first factor the indefatigable Hakluyt (vol. iii. p. 164, 165) sent excellent instructions for enquiring into the nature of dyeing stuffs; also what of those drugs might be produced in England; and how beneficial such new productions would have been to us, which he instances in that of saffron, first brought into England by a pilgrim; as also woad, originally from Thoulouse, in Languedoc: "that the damask-rose was first brought into England by Dr. Linacre, physician to king Henry VII. and king Henry VIII. Turkey fowls, about fifty years past (viz. about 1532): the artichoke in king Henry VIII's time; and of later times the musk-rose and several sorts of plums, by lord Cromwell, out of Italy: the apricot by king Henry VIII's French gardiner: (but there is no mentioned yet of peaches, nor of nectarines).

And now, within these four years (anno 1578) have been brought into England from Vienna, in Austria, divers kinds of flowers called tulips, and others procured thither a little before from Constantinople. And it is said, that since we traded to Zante (this must have been but lately), the plant that beareth the currant is also brought into this realm; and although it brings not fruit to perfection, yet it may serve for pleasure and for some use. (This shews it was then but just introduced.) Many other things have been brought in, that have degenerated by reason of the coldness of the climate: some things brought in, have, through negligence, been long lost; and archbishop Grindal brought the tamarisk plant from Germany, and many people have received great health by this plant."

On the commencement of the English trade to Turkey, the merchants having occasion to attend the queen and council, they had there great thanks and commendations for the ships they then built of so great burthen, with many encouragements to pursue the plan, for the kingdom's sake, says the author of Trade's Increase, who adds, that the ordinary returns of this trade, at the beginning, were three for one.

By England's entering at this time into a direct trade to Turkey, all the commodities of Greece, Syria, Egypt, Persia, and India, came home to us much cheaper. "And (says sir William Monson) when the Venetians served us with those rich eastern wares, by the way of the Red Sea, and down the Nile to Alexandria, and also by the way of caravans to Aleppo, they (i. e. the Venetians) also were then wont to take freight in their ships from port to port, whereas now (i. e. 1685) all strangers are more desirous to employ our own ships in that service."

Jacobs, in his Lex Mercatoria, alleges (upon what authority I know not), that the Barbary merchants were incorporated in king Henry VII's time; but that company decaying, out of their ruins arose the Levant or Turkey company, who first trading with Venice, and then with Turkey, furnished England that way with East Indian commodities, which till then were brought to us (mostly) by land, and to the Portuguese alone by long sea," &c.

The same year, 1582, the ship Sufan, of London, mounting thirty-four guns, carried over to Turkey the English ambassador, Hareborn, who now first settled peace with Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, which piratical states had taken many ships belonging to London, Bristol, &c. and Hareborn having established all the English factories in Turkey (maugre the spite and malice of the French and Venetians) returned over-land to England.

Sir Walter Raleigh, whose great genius much inclining him to new enterprizes and discoveries, had this year formed a society of gentlemen and merchants to subscribe a considerable sum of money towards forming a settlement on the continent of North America, and on Lady-day, 1584, queen Elizabeth granted them a charter for that purpose. Amidas and Barlow, with two vessels, were accordingly sent thither: but they sailed about a thousand leagues out of their way; for the short course to the northern parts of America not being as yet known to us, they steered the wonted course of the Spaniards, by the Canary Islands, and thence into the trade-winds to the Caribbee Islands, thence sailing through the Gulph of Florida, they anchored at a part of what is now called Virginia, where, making some insignificant trade with the natives, exchanging toys for their furs, they returned home with gain (as they said), and greatly magnified the richness of the country. For encouraging a second adventure, they brought home some pearls and tobacco (the first of that sort that had been seen in England.) The wise queen seemed fond of this design, and either she herself, or sir Walter Raleigh, gave the country the name of Virginia, which they judiciously represented to be a pleasant country, abounding in fine woods, deer, hares, wild fowl, fish, vines, currants, &c.

Raleigh therefore obtained queen Elizabeth's patent to himself, &c. for the possessing such remote heathen lands, not then inhabited by Christians, as they should discover for six years, of which they thereby had the property granted to them for ever, reserving to the crown the fifth part of all gold and silver ore found therein, with power to seize to their proper use all ships, with their merchandize, that shall, without leave, plant within two hundred leagues of this intended settlement, excepting, however, the queen's subjects and allies, fishing at Newfoundland, &c. She also grants free denization to the planters and their posterity residing there: powers are also granted to the patentees for making bye-laws there, not repugnant to those of England.

It is observable, that in this, and some other patents of those times, there were no distinct place, longitude, or latitude, fixed or limited for such plantation, although undoubtedly North America was the country intended.

In the next year, 1585, captain John Davis, with two barks from Dartmouth, first sailed into the streights since called by his name, in the country called Old Greenland, and returned home the same year, as all others have done, without making any useful discovery. At this time we find they knew the use of somewhat like the harpoon, with which they killed a porpoise; but though many whales fell in their way, they knew not yet the right method of killing them.

This same year the gallant sir Richard Grenville sailed for Virginia by the old round-about course, above described, with seven ships, laden with arms, ammunition, and provisions, and with settlers for planting a colony. He began with planting at Roanoke Island, lying about five leagues from the continent, in eighty-six degrees north latitude. There he left one hundred and eight men: it is a truly melancholy consideration, that those poor creatures were left to shift for themselves in so wild a country, for above a year; who, so eager to discover gold and silver mines (now never like to be found there), whilst they neglected to prepare their provisions in due season, and going up the country in quest of those mines (for golden dreams were then universal), most of them were either destroyed by the natives, or perished for want; and the few who survived were taken up by sir Francis Drake, coming now again upon the coast from harraffing the Spanish West Indies, who took them all home with him, even although they had sown corn there, which was very near ripe, sufficient for two years sustenance; sustenance; and they were but just gone, when a ship, fitted out at the sole expence of sir Walter Raleigh, arrived there with all sorts of conveniences, as did sir Richard Grenville soon after, with three other ships, bringing a farther supply: but finding the places quite desolate where the English planters had settled, they all returned home. In those accounts there appears to be some confusion, with respect as well to the identical year, as to the names of persons engaged therein, which is owing to the inaccuracy of writers and transcribers in those days, which, however is of very little consequence at present.

Sir Walter Raleigh had his mind so intensely set upon a plantation in North America, that he again sent out three ships, with an hundred and fifty persons of both sexes. These planters Raleigh's superintendant settled in the isle of Roanoke, where he found the second colony had been destroyed by the natives. Here he rebuilt the fort and houses, calling it the city of Raleigh in Virginia: he left one hundred and fifteen men in this new settlement, and returned home, where he remained three years before he could obtain the necessary supplies, which he had promised to bring in the year after he had left the colony, where he arrived in 1590, with these supplies both of men and stores, in three ships. It seems, such of the colony as had remained alive had removed to a place on the continent called Croatoan, that word being carved upon the trees; to this place they intended to sail in search of the colony, but a storm unfortunately arising, the ships lost their anchors and cables, and provisions also failing, they agreed to return home, leaving that miserable colony to perish, to the shame of that age; for although Raleigh was in trouble about this time, yet surely the queen and nation ought to have shewn some compassion to the poor people left in a wilderness amongst savages.

Thus was this scheme of a plantation in Virginia quite laid aside during all the rest of queen Elizabeth's reign, and all the great expence of Raleigh and the other adventurers utterly thrown away, besides the loss of many mens lives.

It was in the year 1591 that the first voyage from England to East India was undertaken with three ships; but it was rather a privateering adventure, than a proper mercantile voyage, for they took several ships in their way to India. They had lost so many men by sickness near the cape of Good Hope, that they were obliged to send one of their ships home, and proceeded with only two to India: moreover, in a storm beyond the Cape they lost company with captain Raymond in the principal ship, which was never heard of more; so that only captain Lancaster's ship arrived in India, which also met with many grievous misfortunes; and, on her return, sailing to the West Indies, whilst the captain and the rest of the men went on shore to seek provisions on an uninhabited island, six of the sailors ran away with the ship; and at the end of three years this unfortunate officer was brought home, several of his men having perished for want at that place.

Some English ships now made a voyage to Cape Breton, at the entrance of the Bay of St. Laurence, in North America, some for morse-fishing and others for whale-fishing (says Hakluyt), which is the first mention we find of the latter fishery by any English; and although they met with no whales there, they found on an island eight hundred whale-fins, where a Biscay ship had been lost three years before. This too is the first mention of whale fins or whale-bone by the English. How the ladies stays were made before this commodious material in them was discovered, does not appear; probably slit pieces of cane, or of some other tough and pliant wood, might have been in use before.

By the trade to Archangel the English became well acquainted with the northern seas at this time, where also they at first carried on a great fishing, or hunting rather, for morse (as the Russians call them, the English call them sea-horses, and the Dutch and French, sea-cows) on Cherry Island, beyond the North Cape, so called from alderman Cherry, but called by the Dutch Bear Island: but it seems those amphibious animals became so shy, that the moment they saw any man, they ran into the sea. The English thereupon fell into the whale-fishery, though not quite so early as this time.

Grotius tells us, that the Hollanders, about this time built two thousand ships every year; a thing almost incredible, considering their new existence as an independent state, did it not proceed from so illustrious and respectable an author, and their own countryman.

Our own Turkey merchants first, and the Dutch East India company next (for they had got the start of us in the East India trade) keeping up the price of pepper and other spices to a high rate, we being at war with Spain, and so could not get spices from Lisbon at first-hand, queen Elizabeth now determined to enter her people directly on a commerce to East India.

Accordingly, on the thirty-first of December, 1600, she granted a charter to George, earl of Cumberland, and two hundred and fifteen knights, aldermen, and merchants, "that, at their own costs and charges they may set forth one or more voyages to the East Indians, in the countries and parts of Asia and Africa, and to the islands thereabout, divers of which countries, islands, &c. have long since been discovered by others of our subjects; to be one body politic and corporate, by the name of the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the East Indies: to have succession: to purchase lands (without limitation): to have one governor, and twenty-four persons, to be elected annually, who shall be called Committees, jointly to have the direction of the voyages, the provision of the shipping, and the management of all other things belonging to the said company. Sir Thomas Smith, alderman of London, was to be the first governor: and a deputy-governor to be elected in a general court: both the governors, and all the committees to take the oath of fidelity; as also every member shall take an oath, before being admitted to traffic as a freeman of this company. The company, their sons (at twenty-one years of age), their apprentices, servants, and factors, in India or elsewhere, may, for fifteen years, from Christmas last, freely and solely trade (by such ways and passages as are already found out, or which shall hereafter be discovered) into the countries and ports of Asia and Africa, and into and from all the islands, ports, towns, and places of Asia, Africa, and America, or any of them, beyond Cape Bona Esperanza to the Straights of Magellan, where any traffic of merchandize may may be used, and to and from every of them, in such manner as shall from time to time be limited and agreed on, at any general court of the company; any statute, usage, diversity of religion or faith, or any other matter to the contrary notwithstanding, so as it be not any country already possessed by any Christian potentate in amity with her majesty, who shall declare the same to be against his or their good liking. Either the governor or deputy governor must always be one in the general assemblies, when they may make all reasonable constitutions, &c. agreeable to the laws of England, for their good government, by plurality of voices; and may punish, by fines and imprisonment, the offenders against their laws. The queen grants the company an exemption from paying any customs for the first four voyages; and for the customs which shall afterwards be payable for merchandize from India, the company shall be allowed to give their bonds, payable one half in six months and the other half in six months after: for merchandize lost at sea, outward-bound, the customs shall be allowed to the company out of the next cargo shipped off. Indian merchandize that shall have paid the customs, may, at the end of thirteen months, be re-exported by any subjects, without paying for their customs. The company may export, in their first voyage, now preparing, thirty thousand pounds in foreign coin, or bullion, so that at least six thousand pounds thereof be first coined in the queen's mint; and the like for the subsequent voyages; provided the company first import at least so much foreign coin or bullion, in gold or silver, into this realm, of which six thousand pounds shall be coined as aforesaid. The company may send yearly to East India six good ships and six pinnaces, with five hundred mariners, unless the navy-royal goes forth. None of the queen's subjects, but the company, their servants, or assigns, shall resort to India, without being licenced by the company, upon pain of forfeiting ships and cargoes, with imprisonment till the offenders give one thousand pounds bond to the company not to trade thither again. Nevertheless, for the encouragement of merchants strangers, and others, to bring in commodities to the realm, the queen gives power to the company to grant licences to trade to East India; and she promises not to grant leave to any others to trade thither, during the company's term, without their consent. The majority of any general meeting of the company may admit apprentices, servants, factors, &c. to the fellowship or freedom of the said company. The silver to be exported shall only be shipped at the ports of London, Dartmouth, and Plymouth, and shall be duly entered by the custom-house officers, without paying any custom for the same. Gold and silver, imported by the company, shall be entered before the landing of the same. Provided, that, in case this charter shall hereafter appear not to be profitable to the crown and realm, then, upon two years notice to the company, their charter shall cease and determine: but if otherwise, then the queen promises, at the end of the said fifteen years, upon the company's suit, to grant them a new charter for fifteen years longer."

This is the very same East India company which, through many various vicissitudes, existed under the same denomination until the year 1708, when it was absorbed by the present United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies. The original shares subscribed were fifty pounds each.

To close this account of the rise and first proceedings of our East India company, we shall remark, that the company's ships in their homeward bound passage took possession of the island of St. Helena, then uninhabited; though, according to the custom of the Portuguese, well stocked with goats, hogs, and poultry, that they might be supplied therewith when obliged at any time to stop there. Here our East India company planted and fortified, and held it till the year 1673; as will be shewn in the course of this history. This island is all a high rock, whose surface is covered with about twelve inches of earth. As the winds blow constantly at south-east, from the Cape of Good Hope to this island (which is about twenty-two miles in circuit), it is sailed in about three weeks, without handing the sails, and the moderate gale renders the voyage very pleasant. On the contrary, it is extremely difficult to find this island in sailing from Europe, because of the said constant south-east wind; for which reason, when a ship is sent from England thither, they are obliged to sail directly to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence take their course to St. Helena, as already described. The great and only benefit our shipping receive from this island, is the fresh water and provisions they there meet with in their return from India, whereby above two hundred families are there supported and employed.

The very last day of the XVIth century having thus given birth and form to the first English East India company, the members thereof immediately raised seventy-two thousand pounds, though not in one joint-stock, or common capital, as in succeeding times, there having been no joint-stock in this company till the year 1613. They this year, 1601, sent out their first fleet for India, commanded in chief by captain James Lancaster, having one ship of six hundred tons, one of three hundred tons, two of two hundred each, and one of one hundred and thirty, as victualler to the whole fleet, carrying four hundred and eighty men and twenty seven thousand pounds in money and goods, the remainder of the said seventy-two thousand pounds being entirely expended in the purchase of those ships, and for artillery, ammunition, provisions, &c. But queen Elizabeth did not live to see the return of this voyage. At Acheen, in the island of Sumatra, they loaded pepper for some of their ships, but not meeting with a sufficiency, and sailing from thence for the Streights of Malacca, they completed their lading by the capture of a Portuguese ship of nine hundred tons, laden with calicoes and other goods. Sailing thence to Bantam, they delivered queen Elizabeth's letter and presents to the king, as they had before done to the king of Acheen; and from both those kings they received letters and presents for queen Elizabeth; they also obtained privileges for the company from those monarchs. Having settled factories at Bantam, they sailed homewards, and arrived in the Downs in September, 1603, having prosperously made their first voyage in two years and seven months.

In the year 1601, we have a statute of the forty-third of queen Elizabeth (cap. xii.) for awarding commissioners to hear and determine policies of assurances made among merchants, in the preamble of which statute are the following words: "Whereas it hath been, time out of mind, an usage amongst merchants, both of this realm and of foreign nations, when they make any great adventure (especially into remote parts, to give some consideration of money to other persons (which is commonly in no small number) to have from them assurance made of their goods, merchandizes, ships, and things adventured, or some parts thereof, at such rates, and in such sort as the party assurers and party assured can agree, which course of dealing is commonly termed a Policy of Assurance; by means of which it cometh to pass, upon the loss or perishing of any ship, there followeth not the undoing of any man, but the loss lighteth rather easily upon many, than heavily upon few, and rather upon them that adventure not, than upon those that adventure; whereby all merchants, especially of the younger sort, are allured to venture more willingly, and more freely: and whereas heretofore such assurers have used to stand so justly and precisely on their credit, as few or no controversies have arisen thereupon; and if any have grown, the same have, from time to time, been ended and ordered by certain grave and discreet merchants, appointed by the lord-mayor of London; until of late years, that divers persons have withdrawn themselves from that arbitrary course, and have sought to draw the parties assured to seek their moneys in her majesty's courts, to their great charges and delay. For remedy whereof, it is now enacted, that the lord-chancellor (or keeper) do award one general or standing yearly commission for the determining of causes on policies of assurance, such as now are, or hereafter shall be entered within the office of assurance within the city of London, this commission to consist of the judge of the admiralty, the recorder of London; two doctors of the civil law, two common lawyers, and eight discreet merchants, or to any five of them: which commission shall have authority to determine all causes concerning policies of assurance, in a summary way; who shall summon the parties, examine witnesses upon oath, and imprison disobeyers of their decrees. They shall meet weekly at the office of assurance, on the west side of the Royal Exchange, for the execution of their commission, without fee or reward. And any such as may think themselves aggrieved by their determinations, may, in two months, exhibit his bill in Chancery, for a re-examination of such decree; provided the complainant do first lay down to the said commissioners the sum awarded; and that the lord-chancellor, or keeper, may either reverse or confirm the first decree, according to equity. Lastly, no commissioner shall be an assurer, or assured."

This law sufficiently demonstrates, that at this time there was a great increase of foreign commerce in England.

Assurance, or insurance, of ships and merchandize on the seas, is of great antiquity, even as far back as the reign of the emperor Claudius Cæsar.

The sea-laws of Oleron, as far back as the year 1194, treat of it.

It seems to have been in use in England upon the revival of commerce, somewhat earlier than on the continent; and Antwerp, though in its meridian glory, learned it from England: "whereas (says Molineux's Lex Mercatoria, the meetings of merchants in London were held in Lombard-street (so called because certain nations of Lombardy kept there a pawn-house, or Lombard, long before the Royal Exchange was built), all the policies of assurance at Antwerp, which then were, and now (1622) yet are made, do make mention, that it shall be in all things concerning the said assurances, as was accustomed to be done in Lombard-street in London; which is imitated also in other places of the Low Countries."

As the gradual increase of the suburbs of London does in great measure keep pace with the gradual increase of the general commerce of England, and as it is, moreover, a curious and entertaining part of history, to mark the gradual advances of both, I therefore have no need of an apology for laying before my readers whatever falls in my way of that kind, during the period now before us.

We find by an act of the fourteenth and fifteenth of Henry VIII. (cap. ii.) for limiting foreign artificers as to their journeymen and apprentices, that the jurisdiction of the London corporations was to extend two miles from the city, viz. within the town of Westminster, the parish of St. Martin in the Fields, and of Our Lady in the Strand, St. Clement Danes without Temple-bar, St. Giles in the Fields, St. Andrew in Holborn, the town and borough of Southwark, Shoreditch, White-chapel parish, St. John's street (i. e. Clerkenwell), and Clerkenwell parish, St. Botolph without Aldgate, St. Catherine's (near the Tower of London), and Bermondsey-street." This is an authentic view of the several suburbs of London in the year 1524. Nevertheless we are not to imagine that all those suburbs were contiguous to each other, or joined, as at present to the great contiguity; for there were then, and long after, sundry large breaks, or interruptions, where no buildings were; not only the street (now so well built) called the Strand, then chiefly taken up with the capital dwellings of the nobility, with their large adjoining gardens, but also a great part of St. Martin's parish, were still literally in the Fields: the like may be said of St. Giles in the Fields (then styled the town of St. Giles), and of the upper part of St. Andrew's in Holborn, much of all which, and also of Westminster, Clerkenwell, Shoreditch, White chapel, and Southwark, was literally Fields, even so late as the reign of queen Elizabeth, as appears by a map of London and its suburbs, still extant, first published in the year 1560.

By a statute 24 Henry VIII. the streetway between Charing-cross and Strand-cross (i. e. that is near where Somerset-house is now situated) in the suburbs of London, was directed "to be sufficiently paved and maintained, at the charge of the owners of the land adjoining." This shews that the Strand was not yet built into a continued street.

In the following year, 1534, the high-street between Holborn-bridge and Holborn-bars, at the west end thereof, was directed to be paved; as were also the streets of Southwark; and that every one should maintain the said pavements before his own ground, or forfeit to the king six pence for every yard square.

In the thirty-second of the said king's reign, viz. anno 1541, the following streets or ways in London were ordered to be paved, viz. 1. The street leading from Aldgate to White-chapel church: 2. the upper part of the lane called Chancery-lane: 3.

the way leading from Holborn-bars, westward, towards St. Giles in the Fields, as far as any habitation is on both sides of the said street: 4. Gray's Inn lane: 5. Shoe-lane: and, 6. Fetter, now called Fetter-lane; the two last being thoroughfares and passages from Fleet-street into Holborn." The part of Chancery-lane now to be paved is thus described, viz. "from the bars beside the Rolls, lately set up by the lord privy-seal, into the said highway in Holborn." These passages shew the age of the Rolls-office in Chancery-lane; and also that all Holborn, above the city-bars, remained unpaved till now; nor was it at this time all built on both sides (nor a considerable time later) as appears by the map before mentioned, drawn in queen Elizabeth's reign: all these six ways now directed to be paved, are therein described as "very foul, and full of pits and sloughs, very perilous and noxious (noisome) as well for all the king's subjects on horseback as on foot and with carriages." Yet three of these, viz. Shoe-lane, Fetter-lane, and Chancery-lane, are now in the very center of the present immense contiguity; and all the rest are likewise well built and inhabited. So vast is the increase and improvement of London since those times. By a statute of 34 and 35 Henry VIII. cap. xii. the streets named White-cross-street, Chiswel-street leading from White-cross-street into the highway leading to Moor-gate; the lane called Golding-lane, and street called Grub-street, in the parish of St. Giles without Cripple-gate; the street called Goswell-street, in the parish of St. Botolph without Aldersgate; Long-lane, in the parish of St. Botolph aforesaid and of St. Sepulchre without Newgate; the street called St. John's-street, leading from the Bars of Smithfield up to the Pound at the corner of the wall extending along the high way to Islington; and also the street leading from the said Bars to Cow-cross: the lane called Water-lane, in Fleet-street, leading down to the Thames; the way leading without Temple-bar, westward, by and unto St. Clement's Inn gates and New Inn gates to Drury-place, in the county of Middlesex (this shews that this way was not built on); and also one little lane stretching from the said way to the sign of the Bell at Drury-lane end; and the common way leading through a certain place called Petit France, from the bars at the west end of Tottenham-street, Westminster, unto the uttermost part of the west end of the said place called Petit France: the street or highway leading from Bishopsgate-street to and above Shoreditch-church; and the bridge called Strand-bridge, and the way leading from the said bridge towards Temple-bar, and the lane called Foskue-lane from the garden and tenement of the bishop of Lichfield, and the garden and tenement called the Bell and Proctors, down to Strand-bridge (those names are now unknown), be very foul and full of pits and sloughs, very perilous and noxious, and very necessary to be kept clear, for the avoiding of corrupt favours, and avoiding of pestilence: for the amendment and reformation whereof, all who have any lands or tenements adjoining to the aforesaid streets, lanes, and ways, unto the midst of them, in length and breadth as his land and tenement do lie or extend, in like manner and form as the streets in the city of London be paved, with causeys or channels in the midst of the same streets, and shall yearly maintain the same."

James Howel, in his Londinopolis, published in folio, anno 1657, gives us many particulars of the vast increase of the suburbs of London towards the close of queen Elizabeth's reign, which more plainly points out the vast increase of England's commerce, than a whole volume of speculative reasoning could do alone. It was not material to make different sections thereof, and therefore we have brought them altogether, whether a little before or after this year.

"It seems, that about this time the ground called Spital-fields, began gradually to be built upon for weavers; as had also Hog-lane, in that part which had (within sixty years from the date of his said book) had fair rows of elm-trees all along, now turned into houses on both sides, from Hound-ditch to White-chapel church.

"As to Wapping (says Howel), it is yet within the memory of man, that there was never a house from St. Catherine's to Wapping: but now (i. e. anno 1657) there is a continued street towards a mile from the Tower, all along the river, almost as far as Radcliffe; which proceeded from the increase of navigation, mariners, and traffick." This shews that Wapping was originally a village, or place detached from London, though now part of the great contiguity thereof. "Radcliffe also (continues he) is much increased in buildings, and also Nightingale-lane.

"Northward, London's suburbs have been less increased than on the east and west sides; yet there was an increase, about this time, on that side also. Where the buildings on the west side of Smithfield stand, was formerly a very large pond of water; and where the place called the Sheep-pens is, was a field with growing elms, and the place of execution for criminals. Afterwards (in king Henry VI's reign) they began to build the space between the said pond and river of Wells (now Turnmill-brook) which runs into Fleet-ditch; and afterwards that pond was drained, and built upon, and so down that street now called Cow-lane; and also Chick-lane and Hosier-lane, &c. So that the buildings there are so increased, that now remaineth not one tree there."

Some other additions were made about Clerkenwell, about or near this time, where the fields, gardens, and avenues of the great priory of St. John of Jerusalem, and also the convent on the north side of Clerkenwell-green, stood.

Westward, without Newgate, the great street named Holborn, and its contiguity, have been gradually built quite up to the village of St. Giles in the Fields: but as the greatest increase thereabout was chiefly in the next century, we must refer thereto.

From the year 1512, the fourth of Henry VIII. we may properly date the commencement of what may be called an English royal navy. i. e. a number of stout ships of war, actually belonging to, and permanently kept on foot by, the English crown, for national defence, king Henry VIII. being the first English monarch who effectually pursued this plan, and for that end established a royal navy-office, with commissioners, &c. nearly as at present. He must indeed be allowed (amidst all his wild dissipations) to have employed great sums of money on his marine affairs, as well for the construction of ships for war, as of dock-yards, wharfs, store-houses, &c. Before his time there was no fixed permanent royal navy; but, on ordinary occasions, the Cinque Ports (as already fully seen) supplied the crown with a determined number of sorry ships as they had in those old times; and on great emergencies we also have seen that all the maritime towns of the kingdom were bound, on reasonable notice to send their quota of ships and mariners, for a determined time; commanded either by the king or his admiral; such as was the fleet of king Edward III. at the siege of Calais, anno 1347, and other capital expeditions.

Moreover (bishop Gibson, in his Additions to Camden's Britannia) observes that king Henry VIII. in the said fourth year of his reign, for the advancement and benefit of navigation and commerce, erected a corporation for the business of examining, licensing, and regulating of pilots; for ordering and erecting of beacons, light-houses, buoys, &c. which is styled the Corporation of the Trinity-house of Deptford Strand, and has proved of great benefit for accomplishing the ends of its founder. Another society, for the like good purposes, he also erected at Hull, by the name of the Trinity-house at Hull; and also another at Newcastle upon Tyne (anno 1537): "Which three establishments (says Hakluyt) were in imitation of that which the emperor Charles V. had erected at Seville, in Spain; who, observing the many shipwrecks in voyages to and from the West Indies, occasioned by the ignorance of seamen, established, at the Contraction-house, lectures upon navigation; and a pilot major, for the examination of other pilots and mariners: he also directed books to be published on that subject, for the use of his mariners." The king, by his charter, confirmed to the Deptford Trinity-house society, all the ancient rights, privileges, &c. of the shipmen and mariners of England, and their several possessions at Deptford: whereby it appears plainly, that they had been a society long before, though nowhere recorded how long. This corporation (whose powers, &c. have been since confirmed and augmented by succeeding kings) have also the power of appointing pilots for the king's ships, and for examining and fixing their wages, and certifying their qualifications, and those of the masters of the ships of war; also of clearing and deepening the Thames by ballast hoys, with which ballast they supply the shipping. They have also the examination of the forty mathematical boys of Christ's Hospital. They have likewise power to hear and determine complaints of officers and sailors in the merchants service: so that this corporation more especially is eminently of great utility to the nation.

Henry also made Deptford, near London, a magazine to the royal navy, which has gradually increased to the flourishing state we now see it in. And, considering how far the river of Thames was exposed to insults from foreign enemies, he caused a fortification to be erected at Gravesend, and another opposite to it on the Essex shore, where Tilbury fort now stands. And having lost his fine ship Regent, of one thousand tons, he caused another to be built; such a one (says Hall) as had never been seen in England, and named it the Henry Grace de Dieu.

We have in a treaty of peace between Henry VIII. and Lewis XII. of France, made anno 1514, a recital of implements for a naval war, such as cannon, gunpowder, stones (for they had not yet the use of iron bullets), darts, &c. And in the same year the Chronicon Pretiosum makes a master shipwright's daily pay, with his diet, five pence, and without diet seven pence per diem; an hewer, with diet four pence, without diet six pence; and an able clencher the same. Note, that living was then twice as cheap as in our days.

In the year 1523, according to lord Herbert's History of Henry VIII. in the attempts of the English and French courts to gain Scotland to their respective interests, at the death of king James V. the English ministers, among other arguments, asserted "that the English were masters of the seas, and thereby were able to stop and interclude all succour that should come to them (the Scots) from any other place." And as in the replication of the partizans of France that assertion is not contradicted, the point seems to have been admitted.

The reigns of Edward VI. and Mary furnish no improvements in navigation worthy our notice; but Elizabeth, very early in her reign, put naval affairs upon a better footing than they had been under her predecessor, both by building some ships of her own, and by encouraging the merchants to build large trading vessels, which on occasion, were converted into ships of war. In 1582, the seamen of England were computed at fourteen thousand two hundred and ninety-five, and the number of vessels twelve-hundred and thirty-two, of which there were not above two hundred and seventeen above eighty tons. Monson computes that, though the navigation decreased in the first year of James I. by the practices of the merchants, who carried on their trade in foreign bottoms, yet before 1640, the number of seamen was treble in England.

The navy which the queen left at her decease appears considerable, when we consider only the number of vessels, which were forty-two; but when we reflect, that none of these ships carried above forty guns, that four only came up to that number, that there were but two ships of a thousand tons, and twenty-three below five hundred, some of fifty, and some even of twenty tons; that the whole number of guns belonging to the fleet were seven hundred and seventy-four; we must entertain a very contemptible idea of the English navy, compared with the force it hath now attained. In the year 1588 there were not above five vessels equipped by the noblemen and sea-ports, which exceeded two hundred tons.

In this famous year (1588) what is called the Chest at Chatham was first erected, being a contribution for the benefit and relief of maimed and superannuated English mariners (out of which pensions are paid to such for their lives) by the advice of sir Francis Drake, sir John Hawkins, &c. It was first only a voluntary monthly contribution of the mariners out of their pay, for the succour of their then wounded brethren, but was afterwards made perpetual by queen Elizabeth. By an act of the rump-parliament, anno 1649 (cap. xxiv.) for abolishing deans and chapters, and of their lands, we find this chest had been usually kept at what is called the Hill House, at Chatham, which, with its gardens, &c. belonged to the dean and chapter of Rochester. Until the foundation of Greenwich hospital by king William III. this was the only charity of that kind for distressed sailors.

PUBLIC REVENUE.

It is difficult to compute exactly queen Elizabeth's ordinary revenue, but it certainly fell much short of five thousand pounds a year. In 1590 she raised the customs from fourteen thousand pounds a year to fifty thousand pounds, and obliged sir Thomas Smith, who had farmed them, to refund some of his former profits. This improvement of the revenue was owing to the suggestions of one Caemarden, and was extremely opposed by Burleigh, Leicester, and Walsingham: but the queen's perseverance overcame all their opposition. The great undertakings which she executed with so narrow a revenue, and with such small supplies from her people, prove the mighty effects of prudence and œconomy. She received from the parliament, during her whole reign, only twenty subsidies and thirty-nine fifteenths. It is not easy to compute the amount of those supplies, because the value of a subsidy was continually falling; and in the end of her reign it amounted only to eighty thousand pounds, which in the beginning had been an hundred and twenty thousand. If we suppose that the whole supplies granted to Elizabeth, during a reign of forty-five years, amounted to three millions, we shall not probably be much wide of the truth. This sum makes only sixty-six thousand six hundred and sixty-six pounds a year; and it is surprising that while the queen's demands were so moderate, and her expences so well regulated, she should ever have found any difficulty of getting a supply from the parliament, or be reduced to make sale of the crown-lands: but such was the extreme, I had almost said absurd, parsimony of the parliaments during that period; they valued nothing in comparison of their money. The members had no connection with the court, and the very idea which they conceived of the trust committed to them, was to refuse the demands of the crown, and to grant as few supplies as possible. The crown, on the other hand, considered the parliament in no other light than a means of supply. Queen Elizabeth made a merit to her people of seldom assembling parliaments: no redress of grievances was expected from these assemblies; they were supposed to meet for no other purpose than to impose taxes.

Before queen Elizabeth's reign, the English princes had always recourse to the city of Antwerp for voluntary loans; and their credit was so low, that besides the exorbitant interest of ten or twelve per cent. they were obliged to make the city of London join in the security. Sir Thomas Gresham, that great and enterprising merchant, one of the chief ornaments of this reign, engaged the company of Merchant-adventurers to grant the queen a loan; and as the money was regularly paid, her credit by degrees established itself in the city, and she shook off this dependence on foreigners.

In 1559, the queen employed Gresham to borrow two hundred thousand pounds at Antwerp, in order to enable her to reform the coinage, which was at that time extremely debased. She was so impolitic as to make herself an innovation in the coin, by dividing a pound of silver into sixty-two shillings, instead of sixty, the former standard. This is the last time that the coin has been tampered with in England.

The splendor of a court was, during this age, a great part of the public charge; and as Elizabeth was a single woman, and expensive in no species of magnificence, except cloaths, this circumstance enabled her to perform great things by her narrow revenue. She is said to have paid four millions of debt left on the crown by her father, brother, and sister; an incredible sum for that age*. The states of the United Provinces, at the time of her decease, owed her about eight hundred thousand pounds; and the king of France four hundred and fifty thousand: though that prince was extremely frugal, and, after the peace of Vervins, was continually amassing treasure, the queen never could, by the most pressing remonstrances, prevail on him to make payment of those sums which she had so generously advanced him during his greatest distresses; one payment of twenty thousand crowns, and another of fifty thousand, were all she could obtain by the strongest representations she could make of the difficulties to which the rebellion in Ireland had reduced her. The queen expended in the war with Spain, between the years 1589 and 1593, the sum of one million three hundred thousand pounds, besides the double subsidy, amounting to two hundred and eighty thousand pounds, granted to her by parliament. In the year 1599, she spent six hundred thousand pounds in six months, in the service of Ireland. Sir Robert Cecil affirmed, that in the space of ten years Ireland cost her three millions four hundred thousand pounds. She made the earl of Essex a present of thirty thousand pounds, upon his departure to take upon him the government of that kingdom. Lord Burleigh computed, that the value of the gifts conferred on that favourite, amounted to three hundred thousand pounds; a proof of her strong affection to him. It was a common saying during this reign, that the queen paid bountifully, though she rewarded sparingly.

* D'Ewes, p. 473. I think it is impossible to reconcile this account of the public debts with that given by Strype, Eccles Mem. vol. ii. p. 344. that in the year 1553, the crown owed above three hundred thousand pounds. I own that this last sum appears a great deal more likely. The whole revenue of queen Elizabeth would not in ten years have paid four millions. Hume's History of the Tudors, vol. ii. p. 729.

An Historical Deduction of the VALUE of our ENGLISH SILVER and GOLD COIN, but particularly those of the former, from the CONQUEST. Extracted from Mr. Anderson, Bishop Fleetwood, and others; together with some Observations on the Present State of our SILVER MONEY.

WE shall close our remarks upon this period with a view of the state of our coinage, from the accession of William the Norman to that of Elizabeth inclusive, when the value of our money was nearly settled on the same footing as at present. This is a matter very necessary to be properly understood, for by this alone we shall be enabled to form a suitable judgment of the true rate in cheapness of provisions and all other necessities of life through their different variations and periods, the pay of artificers, labourers, soldiers, sailors, &c. a subject frequently brought into conversation, and as frequently misunderstood.

The ancient Britons, when first invaded by the Romans, had no other kind of money but iron and tin plates and rings (copper not being then, nor long after, found in our island); these might well enough answer, with barter, the purposes of the inconsiderable transactions in those rude times, when they had neither arts nor manufactures of any kind. The necessity, however, of an universal medium in commerce, which we call Money, was in much earlier times discovered in the more eastern parts of the world, and both gold and silver money were thence soon after introduced into Carthage and Greece; from Greece it was brought to Rome, and thence gradually westward into all the Roman provinces.

Silver, on account of its cleanness and moderate plenty, was, by the general consent of all civilized nations, deemed the most proper for an universal medium of commerce, though at first, and for many ages, by weight only, till at length, for greater convenience, princes and states fell upon the expedient of coins, by stamping pieces of the metal of a determined weight and fineness, to pass current by their authority.

Gold had, indeed, all the properties of silver for such a general medium, even in a higher degree; it was less diminishable by fire, more ductile, more beautiful; but its much greater scarcity, more especially in Europe, rendered it unfit for an universal medium of commerce.

On the other hand, copper, by reason of its fouler and baser nature, and its great plenty, could not be so well used in large transactions, though extremely useful in small ones.

Whilst the Romans held Britain, they coined here gold, silver, and copper; of all which coins, as well as of those brought from Rome itself, many have been dug up, in various parts of this island.

When the Saxons first conquered a part of England, in the middle of the Vth century, they were little better than savages, and probably had no sort of coins in their own country of Germany; but when they became more civilized, they coined silver money, of which some pieces are still to be found in the cabinets of the curious.

As far as certainly appears, the largest silver coin in England, not only before, but for some centuries after the Norman ingression, was denominated a Penny; which, till the reign of king Edward III. contained as much silver as about three pence of our money; and as this penny was, in their manner of coining, cut almost through cross-wise, it could with ease be divided into half-pence and farthings, or fourthlings. Thus in England, from the time of our first Norman king, William I. called the Conqueror, the silver coins were thrice the value of the modern, till the eighteenth year of king Edward III. A. D. 1344; and from thence to the time of king Henry VIII. it was not only farther lessened, but in his reign, and in the first five years of his son, Edward VI. shamefully debased; but in the last year of that hopeful young monarch its purity was restored, and its weight reduced to the state it is in at this present time. But to be more particular:

From the before-mentioned year, 1344, to the eighth year of Henry V. anno 1420, the English silver penny, on an average, weighed very near two pence half-penny of our money.

From the ninth year of Henry V. anno 1421, to the first year of Henry VIII. anno 1509, the silver penny, on an average, was worth near two pence of our modern money.

From the second year of king Henry VIII. anno 1510, to his thirty-third year, anno 1542, a pound of fine silver was coined into forty-five shillings, being three shillings and nine pence per ounce; so that their nine pence was equal to our shilling. But,

In the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth years of Henry VIII, annis 1543, 1544, the silver coin began to be debased to ten ounces of fine silver and two ounces alloy per pound, troy weight, out of which pound they coined forty-eight shillings; yet still four pence of their coin was equal to five pence of our money.

But in the following year, 1545, that king suffered his silver coin to be debased so far as to six ounces fine and six ounces alloy, in such sort that eight pence of their money was but equal to five pence of our's.

And in the three following years, 1546, 1547, 1548, the coin was still farther debased to four ounces fine and eight ounces alloy, and they coined forty-eight shillings of this base metal in the pound; so that their shilling, or twelve pence, was worth but five pence of our modern money, whereby they made the people pay after the rate of twelve shillings for an ounce of pure silver.

In the third year of Edward VI. anno 1549, the coin was brought back to the fineness of the year 1545, viz. six ounces fine and six ounces alloy, so that their eight pence (as above) was equal to our five pence.

Yet they still remained infatuated, as if foreigners as well as our own people would, in bills of exchange, and other money transactions with us, of the church took up the pen, and answered some pamphlets: a proclamation was issued for executing the laws against nonconformists, and some of the principal dissenters were suspended, deprived, and imprisoned. The severities exercised against them were chiefly attributed to archbishop Parker, who suspected them of practices against his person. He had always been a bitter enemy to their opinions, and now, perceiving they were countenanced by persons of high rank, he complained that the church had no friend at court but the queen herself. She ordered the lord high-treasurer Burleigh to make a severe speech in the council against nonconformity: she declared against the religious exercises of the dissenters, and seemed at this juncture inclined to a persecution; for ten Dutchmen and one woman were condemned to the stake for heresy, though the sentence was afterwards mitigated into banishment; yet two persons of the same nation were actually burned in Smithfield.

Hitherto the papists in England had lived free from persecution, nay they were even indulged with the liberty of solemnizing their own rites within their private houses, though against the laws then in being; but when that hot haughty prelate, pope Pius V. in the year 1569, fulminated his bull against Elizabeth, by which he deprived her of her crown, and absolved her subjects from their obedience and allegiance to her, the government, well knowing what vast swarms of missionaries were then in England, thought it necessary to redouble its circumspection upon the popish party. Many gentlemen of the inns of court were brought before the archbishop of Canterbury, and not giving a satisfactory account of their principles, were sent to prison. The gentlemen in the commission of peace all over England were obliged to sign an instrument, professing their conformity to, and belief in, the established religion; and in the next parliament, which sat in the year 1571, the law was enacted against those who brought into, or offered to publish in England, any bulls or mandates from the pope, &c. already mentioned in the civil history of this reign†: yet, for six whole years together, after this law was made, it was not executed upon any papist, till Cuthbert Mayne, a priest, and an obstinate maintainer of the pope's authority over that of the queen, was executed at Launceston, in Cornwall; and a country gentleman who had harboured him, had his goods confiscated, and himself adjudged to perpetual imprisonment.

Archbishop Parker dying in 1575, was succeeded in the see of Canterbury by Grindal, of York, a prelate of great moderation towards the puritans. In his first convocation, some articles for the regulation of the clergy were agreed upon; and in the summer after he made a metropolitanical visitation. The articles of his injunctions manifest a becoming concern for the doctrines and worship of the church; but appearing too zealous for the puritans, the members of the Star-chamber, by virtue of their ecclesiastical commission, confined him to his house, and suspended him for six months from his jurisdiction. At length, however, he was restored to his functions, which he exercised until, finding himself pressed with age and infirmities, he resigned his archbishopric in 1583, and retired to Croydon, where he soon after died.

He was succeeded by Dr. John Whitgift, bishop of Worcester, a divine who had already distinguished himself by his learning and regard for the church of England. The beginning of his administration was pestered with the sect of Brownists, so called from their founder, Robert Brown, an English gentleman of Rutlandshire, who refused to join the congregation in any public office of worship, and out-did all the other puritans in railing against the church. Brown having written some pamphlets that were obnoxious to the ministers of the state and Gospel, Elias Thacker and John Copping, who had dispersed some of them, were prosecuted by the government, and executed for their crime. As to Brown himself, he was a poor unsteady wrong-headed man; he was saved from the gallows by being kinsman to the lord Burleigh; he next conformed, and then relapsed, and conforming again, had a benefice given him: at last he died in jail, into which he had been thrown for the breach of the peace: his sect, however, continued very numerous. But Whitgift was a prelate of great resolution, and pressed conformity as vigorously as the queen could wish him: finding the dissenters, among other things, had confined the queen's supremacy to a temporal jurisdiction, he took occasion to represent them to Elizabeth as agreeing with the papists on that head. Elizabeth could not brook the least opposition of this kind, and finding Whitgift to be a prelate according to her own mind, she remitted all ecclesiastical businesses to him, that she might be free from the importunities of the great patrons of the dissenters.

The first thing, therefore, that Whitgift did, was to press the clergy of his own diocese to subscribe to the following articles, which had been declared lawful by the civilians and judges of England.

"I. That the bishop, but no other inferior judge, may punish any person, ecclesiastical or lay, by a pecuniary mulct, for an ecclesiastical crime or offence, especially if he sees the party more afraid of such a penalty than the church censures.

"II. By the ecclesiastical law, the ordinary may set a pecuniary punishment upon such as absent themselves from divine service without reasonable excuse, especially when his absence proceeds from contempt.

"III. Some canonists affirm, that a bishop may make an ordinance, that an excommunicated person shall pay ten thousand pounds for every month he stands excommunicated out of contempt."

The pressing those articles raised such a storm of calumny against the archbishop as must have crushed him, had he not been powerfully supported by Elizabeth. After various tentatives to reclaim the dissenters, Whitgift at last gave the heads of them a meeting at Lambeth, in presence of the earl of Leicester and other ministers, who, though puritanically inclined, could not help deciding in his favour. Nevertheless, in the next parliament, a strong party in the house of commons joined in a petition to the upper house in favour of the nonconformists; but they were baffled by the vigilance of the archbishop, who prevailed upon the queen to quash all objections from the house of commons, and inflict farther severities on the dissenters; they were subjected to the oath "ex officio," as often as it should be administered, on pain of imprisonment. Cartwright was sent to the Fleet for refusing it; Udal, one of their preachers, was condemned to death; and Penry was executed for having written some satirical libels.

The other ecclesiastical occurrences of this reign are very inconsiderable; I shall therefore only observe, that the dissenters, who, like all other sects, increased under persecution, now swarmed all over England; and at last they disputed the legality of the ecclesiastical commission under which they had suffered so great severities, and the matter was solemnly argued at the bar, in an action brought by one Caudrey, a deprived minister: many learned arguments were produced on each side the question;

but the judges came to a resolution, that if the act of supremacy had never been made, the king or queen of England, for the time being, might establish such an ecclesiastical commission as was then in force, by the ancient prerogative and law of England. Some time after this, one John Greenwood, a priest, and Henry Barrow, a gentleman, were, to the shame of Christianity, executed for not thinking like the queen and her council; but Cartwright, relenting in his opposition, had some indulgence shewn him: and, in the latter part of Elizabeth's reign, the farther execution of the more sanguinary laws against dissenters were, for reasons of state, judged proper to be remitted.

OF LEARNING and LEARNED MEN in the XVth CENTURY.

LEARNING, on its revival, was held in great estimation by the English princes and nobles; and as it was not yet prostituted by being too common, even the great deemed it an object of ambition to attain a character for literature: the four successive sovereigns, Henry, Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, may be, on one account or other, admitted into the class of authors. Queen Catherine Parr translated a book; lady Jane Grey, considering her age, her sex, and her station, may be regarded as a prodigy of literature; sir Thomas Smith was raised from being professor at Cambridge, first to be ambassador to France, and afterwards secretary of state. The dispatches of those times, and among others those of Burleigh himself, are frequently interlarded with quotations from the Greek and Latin classics: even the ladies of the court valued themselves on knowledge; lady Burleigh, lady Bacon, and their two sisters, were mistresses of the ancient as well as the modern languages, and valued themselves more on their erudition than on their rank and quality. But to be more particular:

Cardinal Wolsey may be said to have been the father of revived learning in England, in this century. He had before him the fame which Leo X. the finest gentleman of his age, had acquired by restoring more than an Augustan age. In Italy, Bembo, Vida, Sannazarius, and more great poets and writers than ever appeared in any one nation at any one time, all found encouragement and protection, either from the bounty or through the example of his holiness. Painting, sculpture, and architecture, now started at once to that height from which they have been ever since declining. Wolsey had a soul exquisitely susceptible of the glory arising from a patronage, that gives surer immortality than power or titles can communicate. The learning of the English in general, at this time, was equally useless and heavy, and their taste none. Wolsey saw this, and had the virtue to attempt to improve the one, and introduce the other. He had himself as much learning as was sufficient for a gentleman, and more than was useful for a statesman. Mr. Guthrie, in his History of England, has favoured us with a letter of this great man, addressed to the masters of a school he founded at Ipswich, which does great honour to his style, his taste, and his judgment: it contains the method of teaching and education that was to be observed in that school; and it is no small reproach to English literature, that this piece, the most perfect of its kind that we know of, must have been utterly lost here, had it not been preserved in a foreign grammar, which, by great accident, fell into the hands of a late laborious antiquary.

I am pleased that I can here introduce the reader to some acquaintance with this curious piece, as it fully confirms the character of the cardinal's taste and learning. It is drawn up as a scholar, and at the same time as a gentleman would express himself, were it not perhaps in too princely a style: it is prefaced by a letter to his two schoolmasters, where he pays great compliments to their functions, and exhorts them strongly to the faithful discharge of their duty. He then lays down the method of education to be observed in his school, and orders the boys to be divided into eight classes; he orders those in the first class to be instructed in the eight parts of speech, and to be taught to pronounce the Latin in a full, open, elegant manner. The second class is to practise the speaking of Latin: every boy is to have a note-book, and being well grounded in his rudiments, he is to be exercised in translating some quick, witty, pertinent saying from English into Latin: they are in this class to read no author but their rudiments; though the masters are at liberty to teach them, if they pleased, Lily's Carmen Monitorium, or Cato's Distichs: "Nimirum (says the cardinal) formandi oris gratia." To the third class his eminency recommended the reading of Æsop, for the improvement of their ordinary style, because of that author's pure, neat, polite, and pleasant language: along with this study he recommends the learning of Lily upon Nouns, but without enjoining it. The fourth class is to read Virgil, that prince of poets, as the cardinal calls him; and he orders the masters to make the boys read the majesty of his verse aloud, in full sonorous tone. There is something so genteely expressed by the cardinal, when he comes to speak of the fifth class, that I cannot help transcribing and translating it: "Imprimis hoc unum admonendum censuerimus, ut neque plagis severioribus, neque vultuosis minis, aut ulla tyrannidis specie tenera pubes afficiatur. Hac enim injuriâ ingenii alacritas, aut extingui, aut magnâ ex parte obtundi solet."—"In the first place, I think it proper to put you upon your guard, that tender youth is not to be treated with severe whippings, or blustering threatenings, nor with the least appearance of tyranny; for by such usage a forward genius is commonly either quite crushed, or at least in a great measure blunted." After this preface, he recommends to the fifth class Cicero's Select Epistles, as being, in his opinion, the best book for obtaining the richness and copiousness of style. The sixth class are appointed to read books of history, such as Sallust, or Cæsar's Commentaries; and, by the bye, he recommends it to the masters to teach the students in this class, the knowledge of defective, anomalous, and heteroclite verbs, out of Lilly. The seventh class are enjoined to read the Epistles of Horace, with Ovid's Metamorphoses and Fasti; they are likewise to be taught composition of verses and epistles; to reduce verse to prose, and prose to verse; and to have always in the morning some specimen of their composition ready: and the cardinal concludes his directions to this class in the following amiable manner: "Interdum laxandus est animus, intermiscendus lusus at liberalis tamen et literis dignus. In ipsis studiis sic voluptas est intermiscenda, ut puer ludum potius discendi quam laborem existimet. Cavendum erit ne immodicâ contentione ingenia discantium obruantur, aut lectione prælongâ defatigentur. Utrâque enim juxta offenditur." In the mean time the mind is to be relaxed, and labour to be mixed with diversions, but such diversions as may become a gentleman, and a man of letters. Pleasure is even to be mingled with study itself, that the boy may think learning rather an amusement than a toil. Particular care is to be taken not to hurt the genius of a boy by over-stretching it, nor to fatigue him by too long lessons: both extremities are hurtful." I cannot withstand the temptation of translating the whole of the section relating to the eighth and last class: "Lastly (says his eminence), when the youths, by such exercises, have attained to some knowledge of the language, let them then proceed to the higher rules of grammar, such as the figures, as they are laid down by Donatus Valla, upon elegance, and several ancient writers who treat upon the Latin tongue. In reading those works, we particularly recommend it to you, to endeavour to make yourselves masters of every passage requiring immediate explanation: as, for instance, suppose you were to give the plan of one of Terence's comedies, you are to preface it with a short account of the author's life, his genius, and his manner of writing; you are next to explain the pleasure and profit that attends the reading of comedies; you are then, in a clear but succinct manner, to explain the signification and etymology of the word, to give a summary of the fable, and also an exact description of the nature of the verse; you are afterwards to construe it in its natural order; lastly, you are carefully to mark out to your pupils every striking elegance of style, every antiquated expression, every thing that is new, every grecified turn, every thing that is obscure, every etymology, derivation, or composition, that may arise, whatever is harsh or confused in the arrangement of the sentence: you are to mark every orthography, every figure, every graceful ornament of style, every rhetorical flourish, whatsoever is proverbial, all passages that ought to be imitated, and all that ought not. Besides, you are to take care in school, that your pupils speak as correctly as possible; you are to applaud the excellent, and you are to mend the incorrect; sometimes you ought in the English language to throw out a short ground-work for an essay; but let it be somewhat that is excellent: if you please, you are to lay before them certain short rules, by which they may more conveniently handle the subject assigned them.

To his zeal for the improvement of youth, the cardinal added all the qualities of a fine gentleman and a polite courtier. Erasmus, one of the best judges of wit and good-manners that ever wrote, in several of his epistles takes particular notice of his politeness and affability: he says, that his manners betrayed nothing of his birth; and that the public was not in greater admiration of his exalted fortune, than of his generous disposition. But it was not for Wolsey to confine his love for learning and the Muses to his own example and munificence, without planting those seminaries, which, in succeeding ages, were productive of many of the noblest fruits of learning. He searched for men of genius and letters, as the lord of a soil does for a rich mine: he employed no ministers but such as were scholars; and under his administration, the dignities of the law, the church, and of the state, were filled with men who had nothing but merit to recommend them. Dr. Clark and Dr. Knight were through him made bishops; Dr. Taylor was made master of the Rolls; Dr. Pace, one of the principal secretaries of state; Dr. Gardiner, who had a very fine turn for letters, was employed in several embassies; not to mention Cromwell and others, who by his means rose to the highest offices in the state, with a vast number of other promotions, equally just and generous.

Wolsey's house, like Cicero's Tuscullanum, was a retreat to all men of letters, without distinction; they were welcome to his purse, to his library, and to his table. The study of the liberal arts, says the great author I have already quoted, when decayed and degenerated, was by him revived and renewed. Learning, whilst struggling with the patrons of ancient ignorance, was encouraged by his countenance, protected by his authority, embellished by his splendor, and cherished by his munificence. Whenever he heard of a learned foreigner, he settled on him a handsome salary, suitable to his merit, and invited him to England. He employed agents through all countries for making up a library which might vie with that of Ptolemy Philadelphus himself; and revived the study of the three learned languages, the Hebrew, the Greek, and the Latin, without which, to use his own expression, learning itself was but lame.

No mechanic ever worked with more labour in his profession, than the cardinal did with assiduity to adorn England with the luminaries of learning: he brought Matthias Calphurnius, one of the best Greek scholars of his time, from Greece, to teach that language at Oxford; and I am apt to believe it is owing to his labours that England can shew more great men than any other nation can in that language: though Erasmus differed from him greatly, both in political and religious matters, yet he allowed him a large appointment, and offered to provide provide for him, if he would come to England, either in the church or state: he was the patron of Ludovicus Vives, another learned foreigner, perhaps the best critic of his time, who lived some time in England at the cardinal's invitation: he appointed Lavinius, a pupil and relation of Erasmus, to be his private secretary, and gave him an education worthy his merit. I should tire the reader were I to enumerate all the other instances of Wolsey's regard for the polite arts; I shall therefore close this account of the cardinal with observing, that he did a thousand generous acts for the benefit of learning, for which his memory deserves all the immortality the pen can bestow.

There were many other persons of note in the literary walk during this reign; but it would too much swell our work to enumerate all their names and writings: we must not, however, pass unnoticed Dr. John Collet, dean of St. Paul's, and founder of the school there; nor William Lilly, born at Odiham, in Hampshire, who was first master of St. Paul's school, and composed a grammar of the Latin tongue, which goes by his name, and is still in use in several of our schools; John Leland, that famous searcher of antiquities, flourished also in Henry's time.

The short reign of his successor, Edward VI. furnished very few persons of note, either as swordsmen or scholars. Edward Hall, a barrister at law, wrote a chronicle of the union of the two houses of York and Lancaster, which was well received; and Thomas Sternhold, born at Southampton, turned into English metre the Psalms of David, as we now hear them sung in most of our churches.

During the reign of Mary, bloody and tumultuous as it was, we find several learned men, the chief of whom were John Rogers, a clergyman of Lancashire, who translated the Bible into English, with notes; and Henry, lord Stafford, son to Edward, duke of Buckingham, who, amongst other works he wrote, translated a book out of Latin into English, entitled, "Utriusque potestatis differentia," which book, as some think, was first composed by Edward Fox, bishop of Hereford: John Hopkins also translated several of the Psalms into English metre, which, with those of Sternhold, still continue to be sung in the church.

Revived and improved literature made one of the principal glories of Elizabeth's reign; England under her saw an Augustan age! Elizabeth herself translated several books, and was familiarly acquainted with the Greek as well as Latin tongue. It is pretended that she made an extempore reply in Greek to the university of Cambridge, who had addressed her in that language: it is certain that she answered in Latin without preparation, and in a very spirited manner, to the Polish ambassador, who had been wanting in respect to her; when she had finished, she turned about to her courtiers, and said, "God's death! my lords (for she was much addicted to swearing), I have been forced this day to scour up my old Latin that hath lain long rusting." Elizabeth, after she was queen, did not entirely drop the ambition of appearing as an author: and, next to her desire of admiration for beauty, this seems to have been the chief object of her vanity: she translated Boethius Of the Consolation of Philosophy, in order, as she pretended, to allay her grief for Henry IV's change of religion. As far as we can judge from Elizabeth's compositions, we may pronounce, that, notwithstanding her application and excellent parts, her taste in literature was very indifferent; she was inferior to her successor in this particular, who was himself far from being a just model of eloquence.

Unhappily for literature, at least for the learned of this age, the queen's vanity lay more in shining by her own learning, than in encouraging men of genius by her liberality: this province she left to Leicester, &c.

During this reign England produced a number of excellent poets, such as Spencer, Sidney, Donne, Johnson, Shakespeare, Beaumont, and Fletcher: Fairfax translated Tasso with great ease and elegance, and Harrington translated Ariosto with tolerable accuracy; Bacon acquired immortal renown by his philosophical writings; Camden excelled as an antiquary and historian. In this reign we owe to the patronage of the illustrious great who composed the English court, the strength of Jewell's reasoning, the inimitable style of Hooker, with the extent and variety of Raleigh's learning; it was under Elizabeth that Hobbes formed his first notions; and, towards the latter end of her reign, Cromwell drew his first breath, as if (says a modern author) it had been the will of Heaven, that she should not leave the world without bequeathing to it a spirit equal to her own.

HENRY VIII.

THIS king's first parliament sat on the twenty-first of January, 1510, at Westminster. Its laudable design seems to have been chiefly pointed towards relieving the people from the dreadful yoke under which they groaned, through the infamous revival of the penal statutes by Empson and Dudley. Among other statutes, it was now enacted, "that untrue inquisitions found in the reign of king Henry VII. by the procurement of Richard Empson and Edmund Dudley, entitling the king to tenures in capite, may be traversed by the parties, though they have had liveries: and that their livery should be no conclusion." By another act, all assurances made by Emp-son and Dudley of lands to the use of others, were made void, and their joint feoffees stood seised of the whole. The penal laws against clothworkers were likewise repealed, or mitigated. But the most important act of this parliament, was that determining that all actions for the king, upon any penal statute, should be taken within three years after the offence was committed; and actions for any other person, within one year: this act wisely foreclosed the field of litigation, by ripping up or reviving past offences, since no benefit for a forfeiture could accrue three years after the offence charged or committed.

There likewise passed in this parliament a repeal of that statute made in Henry VII's time giving authority to justices of assize and justices of the peace, peace, in their sessions, to hear and determine all offences and contempts committed against any statutes in force, saving treason, murder, and felony. A law was likewise made for obliging coroners to do their duty without having the thirteen shillings and four pence advanced to them as a fee; since the meaning of the law was, that the fee should accrue from the estate of the murderer, but not in cases of death by accident or misadventure.

On the fourth of February, 1512, the parliament sat again, when the following acts were passed: That every person carrying beyond seas money, plate, or jewels, should forfeit double the value. This had been a favourite measure in the English government, though it was often broke through for conveniency; but as the English were now upon the eve of a war with France, it was absolutely necessary to enforce it. By another act it was ordained, "That all sorts of men, under the age of forty years, excepting judges and clergymen, should make use of bows and arrows, and practise shooting." This act was occasioned by the experience of the decay of military discipline in England. The use and conveniency of fire-arms bade fair to enervate the bodies of the English, who, by the practice of archery and strength of their arms in drawing the bow, had rendered themselves the terror of Europe; it was therefore provided by the parliament, that those exercises should be revived, not only to improve the natural strength of Englishmen, but because the long-bow and arrow was still a more formidable weapon than any of the small fire-arms that were yet carried to the field. In consequence of this principle, that bodily exercise in the people is absolutely necessary for the defence of the state, another act was made in this parliament, in confirmation of a statute passed in the nineteenth of the late reign, against shooting with cross-bows, and retracting all licences which allowed such exercise.

Two other acts which passed in this parliament, relate entirely to the expedition which was now on foot against France: the first was a kind of extension of the law made in Henry VII's time, and which we have already taken notice of, for empowering all those who followed the king to the wars, to alienate their lands; for it was now provided, that who is or shall be in the king's wars beyond the sea, or on the sea, shall have a protection of "Profecturus, or Moraturus cum clausula volumus;" and he may alien his lands holden in capite, without licence: and if he die in that service, his heirs, within age and ward, his executors, feoffees, or assigns, shall have the wardship and marriage towards the performance of his will.

The other act related to false musters, and to penalties upon captains using the same, or defrauding the soldiers of their pay: desertion was made felony without benefit of clergy, and was cognizable by the justices of the peace of that county where the offender was apprehended.

By another act it was provided, "That no person within the city of London, or within seven miles of the same, should practise physic or surgery without being first examined by the bishop of London, or the dean of St. Paul's, who were to be assisted by expert physicians and surgeons. The same provisions were to extend throughout all the other counties in the kingdom, but with this difference, that the number of assistants to be called in by the bishop there, was left undetermined; and the practitioners approved of at London were not to undergo any second examination: but all this was with a saving clause to the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge of all their rights and privileges.

In the winter of the following year, 1513, an act passed for taking away benefit of clergy from all who committed murder or felony in any consecrated place, or upon the king's highway, or in their houses.

In 1514, the parliament passed an act relating to surgeons, by which they were exempted from serving all constabships and wardships, bearing of arms, and sitting on all juries and inquests, by reason of the continual service and attendance they give day and night, and at all times, to their patients. This privilege is still enjoyed by all persons of that profession.

The parliament of the year 1515, passed many salutary acts; among others, a sumptuary law was enacted against the excessive expence of apparel; and the dress of every degree among the laity was regulated. Another act confirmed and made perpetual the statute of the third of this reign, concerning the maintenance of archery and shooting in long-bows. I am inclined to believe, with lord Herbert, that this precaution chiefly tended to exercise the common people, whom the conveniency of calivers, or hand-guns, then in use, was apt to render idle and effeminate. Another act was made for regulating the wages of artificers and farmers servants; and another for encouragement of husbandry. Another act was made, for regulating the manner of manufacturing woollen cloth, and a severe penalty imposed upon any person that should export Norfolk wool out of the kingdom. Those acts concerning the woollen trade were at this time absolutely necessary, because of the disreputation which the faults in that trade had brought upon English cloths in foreign countries.

But the most remarkable act of this parliament was for remedying an abuse become frequent, from the great hurry the members of the house of commons were generally in for returning into the country before the close of the sessions: it was therefore provided, that such members who shall, without leave from the house, absent themselves from their duty, shall forfeit all their wages to which they are entitled from their constituents. From this act it appears, that the practice of paying wages, viz. four shillings to a knight of the shire, and two shillings at least to a burgess, a day, besides travelling expences, was still continued, and punctually observed. But it is remarkable we know of no coercive power upon the face of this act, which the house of commons before this time had over its own members; and the act itself establishes no other penalty against those who should absent themselves even without leave from the house, besides the loss of their wages. This, however, is no argument that the house might not exercise a compulsory power, by ordering such members into custody; though it is a very strong reason for thinking, that the payment of their wages was then by law so much a debt from the constituents, that, let the behaviour of the representative, after chosen, be what it would, it might be levied by him.

The parliament of 1523 took the state of the coinage into consideration. It was found that the

the increase of trade demanded a greater circulation of money, than the current specie of that time could effect; it was therefore enacted, "That coiners who make money in any mint in England, should coin of every hundred pounds of gold, twenty pounds into half angels, or pieces of forty pence; and of every hundred pounds worth of bullion, plate, or silver, a certain portion into groats, two-pences, pence, and farthings: the farthings to have a different make from the half-penny; that they who bring less than one hundred pounds in bullion, or plate, to the mint, shall have the tenth part thereof in half-pence or farthings; and yet this shall not extend to the mint-masters of York, Durham, or Canterbury." By another statute it was enacted, "That all in the king's service in war, might alienate their lands for the performance of their wills; and if any of them died in the king's service in war, his feoffees or executors should have wardship of his heirs and lands." This gave a new blow to what still remained of the feudal institution, as it left the barons and great tenants at farther liberty to indulge their full enjoyment, at the expence of their estates, of all the luxuries now introduced by the extension of commerce and the increase of coin. Thus many of those great possessions, which, ever since the Conquest, or soon after, had gone from father to son in the same descent, came now into the hands of commoners, and thereby the system of property was almost daily and hourly altered.

The parliament which sat in the year 1530, passed several acts relating to the clergy, which we have mentioned in their proper places; besides which, several acts passed of a civil nature; in particular one act, by which all servants embezzling goods to the value of forty shillings and upwards, within their masters houses, were adjudged to be guilty of felony; and the goods, after conviction, were ordered to be returned to the rightful owners. Another act was made for prohibiting the exportation of brass; probably with a view to encourage the making of great guns. Several regulations about foreign tradesmen likewise passed in this parliament, and they were subjected to the same taxes and duties with natural-born subjects.

In 1532, the twenty-fourth of this king, it was enacted by the parliament, that none should have the benefit of his recourse to his ordinary, excepting those in holy orders, and even they were to give security for their good behaviour. The act, however, did not extend to those, who, being attainted of felony or murder, are afterwards admitted to the benefit of clergy, and so delivered to the ordinary; but the ordinary, having such a person in his custody, might, if he pleased, discharge himself of the same, by degrading him, and sending him to the King's Bench.

By another act in the same session, the places where jails ought to be built and kept, were pointed out: the justices of the peace, in their respective counties, had the power of taxing the inhabitants towards building the jail, and of appointing collectors for raising the money for the same. Another act was made against false verdicts, by which a writ of attainder was followed against every juror giving such verdict; and the jury, if found guilty, was each man to forfeit twenty pounds, one half to go to the king, and the other to the party that sueth.

Another act provided for the importation of all French wines by the king's natural subjects, English, Irish, or Welsh; and that no such wines should be imported between the last day of September and the second day of February: it was farther enacted, that no person should retail French wine for above one penny the pint, and malmsey and sack for one shilling the gallon. Another excellent act was made, extending the statute of the staple (which was before confined between merchant and merchant, and only for the merchandize of the staple) to the rest of the king's subjects: and this, says lord Herbert, not only enlarged contracts, but strengthened the sinews of them.

By another act, another terrible grievance which the subjects laboured under from the clergy's power, was removed. It seems (as the preamble of the act recites) that it had been a common practice to cite people, upon fictitious and surmised causes, from the most distant parts of the kingdom, to the Arches, Audience, and other high courts of the archbishops; and upon their not attending, to lay them under excommunication, or suspension from divine service; it was therefore provided, that no such citation should take place, but in cases specified by the statute.

Another act declared all feoffments of lands to the use of the church, to be void; and that all assurances of lands to churches, communities, or companies of any kinds, were as prejudicial to the lords superiors of such lands, as if they were alienated in mortmain.

Several other acts passed in this parliament, equally beneficial, though not so extensive, in their nature: which were all allowed of by Henry, that he might strengthen his own power against the clergy, and strike the greater terror into the court of Rome.

In 1534, the parliament passed an act, giving power to the chancellor to settle the price of victuals; and all exportation of corn or cattle was prohibited, excepting to the English dominions abroad. By another act, all those who, being regularly indicted, shall stand mute to prevent the course of law, are deprived of the benefit of clergy. Another act was made to prevent the abuse of converting tillage into pasturage, especially for sheep: in the preamble of the act, great complaints are made against this practice, which raised the rents, and enhanced the prices of every thing; it was therefore enacted, "that no man should have in his farmed lands above two thousand sheep; yet that every temporal person may keep upon his inheritance as many as he will: secondly, that no man shall take and hold above two farms at once; and those to be in the same parish, upon certain penalties there set down."

By another act it appears, that the legislature thought it became them to take into consideration the state of printing: an act had been made so far back as the reign of Richard III. for importing books, both printed and manuscript; according to the preamble of this act, made in Henry's reign, there were but few printers within this realm in the reign of Richard III. who were cunning and expert in the said science and craft of printing; but there being now great numbers of that kind, the said act of Richard III. was repealed; and, for the encouragement both of printers and book-binders, it was provided that no man should buy books which were brought from beyond seas to sell again, if they were bound: that no man shall buy books by retail, brought from beyond seas; and that the prices of books, increased to a miserable rate, were to be qualified by the king's great officers of state, or the justices, or any two of them. Several other acts, not relating to the business of the Reformation, were likewise passed for the benefit of the subject, but are too immaterial to be mentioned here.

The parliament of 1536, undertook and brought about the union of England with Wales, in the manner we have related in the history of this reign; and, in order to introduce a general uniformity, justices of the peace, with like powers as they have in England, were appointed by the lord chancellor of England in the county-palatine of Chester, and the other counties already mentioned. By another, the inhuman forest-laws were taken away. By another, it was enacted, that no person, from the first of July, 1536, should have power and authority to pardon or remit treasons, murders, manslughters, or any felons, or their accessaries, in any part of England, Wales, or the Marches of the same: that likewise none should make justices of oyer, justices of assize, justices of peace, or justices of jail-delivery; but they should be made by the king's letters patent; and that all original writs, and all manner of indictments of treason, felony, and trespass, and all manner of trespass, should be made in the king's name; and things done against the king's peace, should be supposed to be done against the king's peace, and not against the peace of any other person. But, notwithstanding the generality of those acts, a great many privileges still continued to the proprietors of lordships.

It appears that there was as yet in England no determined method established by the municipal law for the trial of pirates, who were left to the forms of the civil law, which did not admit any one to be put to death without first confessing their offences, and required more strict proof of the fact than the nature of the offence would admit of: by this means great numbers of offenders had escaped; and those who were convicted, were often put to the torture for confession: but it was now enacted, that they should be judged by commissioners appointed by the king, and in the same manner as if their offences had been committed on land; and that no benefit of clergy should be allowed the criminal: the act, however, very properly made a distinction between pirates, and those who took things through necessity, upon the sea; the said things, viz. provisions, materials, or utensils for navigating the ship, to be paid for, if taken on this side the streights of Morocco (Gibraltar, I suppose) in four months; and if on the other side, in twelve. Another act was made in favour of the breed of English horses; and a penalty imposed upon those who, having parks, did not keep mares thirteen hands, and stallions fourteen hands high. Several regulations were likewise made concerning the form for suing for the gifts and grants made under the king's sign manual. The king, likewise, in this session, carried, in part, his former design of voiding private deeds made in prejudice of the right of wardship: it was likewise enacted, that no lands should pass by bargain and sale, but that which was by writing indented, sealed, and enrolled.

We have now the title of the first law ever made in England relating to bankrupts, in the thirty-fourth year of Henry VIII. viz. "the lord-chancellor, treasurer, &c. shall take order with bankrupts bodies, lands, and goods, for the payment of their debts." But there was a farther regulation made in this act by the thirteenth of Elizabeth.

We now come to the time when interest, or use for money lent, and in those days always known by the name of Usury, was first settled in England by law. It was a statute of 37 Henry VIII. cap. ix. entitled, "How offenders in usury shall be punished." Before this time (says the judicious Josiah Child) there was no law for limiting the rate of interest; there was little trade, and as little money, in the nation, wherefore every man took such an interest for what money he could put out, as he could get; which in sundry instances (to be found in history here and there) was, before this time, higher than ten per cent. as partly appears from the strong expressions in this law, the preamble of which says, "that sundry statutes have been made for the avoiding and punishing of usury, being a thing unlawful [and yet, with the same breath, these lawgivers established it; for this was the church's opinion in those times, though never uniformly put in practice], of other corrupt bargains, shiefts, and chevifances; which statutes are so obscure and dark in intent [so framed on purpose to leave room to avoid the penalties; whilst, in general words (to please the clergy), it was declared sinful], and are of so little force, that by reason whereof little or no punishment hath ensued to the offenders of the same; for reformation whereof (says this preamble gravely), be it enacted, that all former statutes concerning usury, shiefts, &c. all forfeitures and penalties concerning the same be henceforth utterly void.

TAXES in the Reign of HENRY VIII.

In his fourth year, in a parliament at Westminster, were granted to the king two fifteenths of the temporalty, and two tenths of the clergy; and head-money, of every duke ten marks, an earl five pounds, a baron four pounds, a knight four marks, and every man valued at eight hundred pounds in goods, to pay four marks, and so after that rate till him that was valued at forty shillings, and he paid twelve pence; and every man and woman of fifteen years and upwards, four pence.

In his sixteenth year a parliament was holden, wherein divers subsidies were granted to the king, towards the charges of his wars in France.

In his fourteenth year, order was taken by cardinal Wolsey, that the true value of all men's substance might be known, and would have had every man sworn to give an account of his worth, and required a tenth part thereof towards the king's charges in the then war, as the spirituality had granted a fourth part: this the Londoners thought very hard, and thereupon were excused taking an oath, and were allowed to bring in their bills upon their honesties. But when all was done, after much labouring by the cardinal, the clergy granted one half of their yearly spiritual revenues for five years; and the temporalty, two shillings in the pound, from twenty pounds and upwards; and from forty shillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty shillings twelve pence; and under forty shillings, of every head, of sixteen years and upwards, four pence, to be paid in every two years.

In his sixteenth year, the cardinal, of his own head, attempted by commission to draw the people to pay the sixth part of every man's substance in plate or money; but this was generally opposed, and caused insurrections in several counties, which coming to the king's knowledge, he utterly disavowed it, and blamed the cardinal extremely for attempting it.

In his twenty-fourth year, in a parliament then held, a fifteenth was granted to the king, towards his charges in erecting fortifications against Scotland.

In his thirty-first year, a subsidy of two shillings in the pound upon lands, and twelve upon goods, with four fifteenths, were granted to the king, towards his charges in making bulwarks.

In his thirty-fifth year, a subsidy was granted, to be paid in three years; every Englishman being worth, in goods, twenty shillings and upwards to five pounds, to pay four pence of every pound; from five pounds to ten pounds, eight pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, sixteen pence; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound two shillings: strangers, as well denizens as others, being inhabitants, to pay double. And for lands, every Englishman paid eight pence of the pound, from twenty shillings to five pounds; from five pounds to ten pounds, sixteen pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, two shillings; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound three shillings: strangers double. The clergy, six shillings in every pound of benefices; and every priest having no benefice, but an annual stipend, six shillings and eight pence yearly, during three years.

EDWARD VI.

A Very necessary statute was made the second and third of Edward VI. cap. xv. "for restraining the sellers of all manner of provision in England, from combining together not to sell but at a fixed price; and also for restraining workmen and labourers not to make or do their work but at a fixed price; or to do but a certain work in a day, or not to work but at certain hours." A clause, wisely intended, was added to this act, licensing all manner of workmen relating to building of houses, &c. to follow their occupation in all cities and towns corporate, although they did not live therein, nor were free of such corporations: but this clause was repealed by a statute of the third and fourth of this king, cap. xx. plainly (as appears) by the interposition of the city of London, who represented "that being the king's chamber and most ancient city of this realm, the artificers and craftsmen of the arts, crafts, and mysteries aforesaid, were at great costs and charges, as well in bearing and paying taxes, tallages, subsidies, scot, lot, and other charges, as well to the king's majesty as to the said city, and to many and sundry triumphs and other times for the king's honour; and that if foreigners [i. e. non-freemen] should come and work among them within the liberties of the said city, contrary to their ancient privileges, the same should be a great decay of learning, and the impoverishment and driving away of the freemen, being artificers of the crafts and mysteries aforesaid, within the said city; for reformation whereof, the said clause is hereby repealed entirely." So that the reasons for this repeal are expressed as above only in respect to London, yet the repeal being general, took in all other corporations, cities, and towns; and so it remains to our own times, contrary to the opinion of most wise and judicious men. By cap. iii. of the said second and third year of king Edward VI. for regulating the purveyors for the king's household, post-horses are therein fixed at one penny per mile.

In the third and fourth of king Edward VI. there was an act of parliament passed (cap. ii.) with many well-contrived clauses for preventing of frauds in the woollen manufactures in England, such as for the clothier's seal on his cloth, against over-stretching the cloths, for the well drying of cloth, also for the well dyeing of wool to be converted into cloth, or into hats or caps; also for preventing the putting any deceitful thing upon cloth, such as flocks, chalk, flour, starch, &c. nor to use iron cards in the rowing of cloths; also for just measuring of cloths: for all which purposes overseers are directed to be annually appointed, not only in corporation-towns, by the chief magistrates, jointly with the wardens, &c. of the clothworkers, but in towns, villages, and hamlets not incorporated, by the justices of the peace, jointly with the clothworkers; which overseers shall, at least once in every quarter of a year, or as often as they think needful, visit clothiers, drapers, dyers, and presers houses, shops, &c. to which overseers one moiety is hereby given of all the forfeitures and penalties of this act, and the other to the king, &c. All which evidently shews the care of the legislature for that manufacture, and also that it was at this time universally spread all over the kingdom, and in a flourishing condition.

Notwithstanding all which favourable laws for regulating the English woollen manufacture, we have another statute, anno 1552 (5 and 6 Edward VI.) for the very same ends and purposes, to which we refer the curious reader.

We have seen, under the year 1515, a statute for ascertaining the length, breadth, and weight of certain English woollen cloths; as also another more ample statute, anno 1549, for more fully regulating the different kinds of them: in this year, 1552, we have another still more extensive law for the same purpose (5 and 6 Edward VI. cap. vi.) wherein the woollen manufactures of all the different counties of England and Wales are ascertained with respect to length, breadth, weight, &c. whereby all former statutes concerning this subject are repealed. Yet, as perfect as this statute might then be thought, there were many more subsequent ones made on the same subject, not only for ascertaining the true dimensions and weight of those cloths, but for discovering and restraining many frauds and irregularities therein; the full recital of which would be both tiresome and unprofitable to the generality of readers; such as are desirous of perusing them, may consult the statute-books.

By cap. xxiv. of the said 5 and 6 Edward VI. there is another monopolizing act relating to the making of felt hats and thrummed hats, coverlets, and dornecks (i. e. diaper linen), though somewhat more moderate than that in favour of the city of York; for whereas, by the statute made in the year 1544, the manufacture of coverlets was absolutely confined to that city alone, exclusive of all other parts whatever of that county, this law now before us only confines the making of the above-named four kinds of goods to the city of Norwich, and to corporate or market-towns of that county.

By a statute of the seventh and last year of king Edward VI. cap. v. "I. The prices of wines are fixed thus; Gascony and Guienne at eight pence per gallon; and Rochelle wine at four pence per gallon; nor should any other wines be sold at an higher price than twelve pence per gallon, on forfeiture of five pounds. This statute is said, in the preamble, to be enacted for the avoiding of many inconveniences, much evil rule, and common resort of misruled persons, used and frequented in many taverns, of late newly set up in back lanes, corners, and suspicious places, both in London and other towns and villages.

"II. The next clause enacts, that none but such as can spend a thousand marks, or else, lastly, shall be the son of a duke, marquis, earl, viscount, or baron of the realm, shall have in his house any vessel of the said wines, for his family's use, exceeding ten gallons, on forfeiture of ten pounds.

"III. Nor shall any person keep a tavern retailing of the said wines, unless licensed, and that only in cities, towns-corporate, boroughs, port-towns, or market-towns, or in the towns of Gravesend, Sitting-bourn, Tuxford, and Bagshot, on the forfeiture of ten pounds: and there shall be but two taverns for retailing wines in every city or town, except in London, which may have forty taverns, in York eight taverns, in Norwich four, in Westminster three, in Bristol six, in Lincoln three, in Hull four, in Shrewsbury three, in Exeter four, in Salisbury three, in Gloucester four, in Westchester four, in Hereford three, in Worcester three, in Southampton three, in Canterbury four, in Ipswich three, in Winchester three, in Oxford three, in Cambridge four, in Colchester three, in Newcastle upon Tyne four. By this limitation it may be thought a pretty near guess may be made at the comparative magnitude of cities and towns, allowances being made for towns situated on very public roads; yet this matter is nevertheless still very uncertain.

"IV. None of the said taverns shall retail wines to be spent or drank within their respective houses.

"V. Merchants may use in their own houses (but not to sell) such wines as they shall import; also high-sheriffs, magistrates of cities and towns, and inhabitants of fortified towns, may keep vessels of wine for their own consumption only."

As extraordinary as several parts of this statute may appear to some of us at this time, they may be pretty well accounted for, not only from the sobriety, poverty, and simplicity of that age, compared with ours, but also from the unsettled and tumultuous disposition of a great part of the people, those especially who adhered to the old religion, and those also who excited commotions in most counties against inclosures; yet, with respect to the limited number of taverns, in several of the fore-named towns, we cannot now perhaps altogether clearly judge or determine the proportion of the magnitude of those places therefrom; for instance, Cambridge is allowed four and Oxford but three taverns; nor some other points relating to this act.

TAXES in the Reign of EDWARD VI.

In no king's reign were ever more parliaments for the time, nor fewer subsidies. The greatest was in his last year, when there was but one subsidy, with two fifteenths and tenths, granted by the temporality, and a subsidy by the clergy. And indeed, to shew how loth this king was to lay impositions upon his people, this may be a sufficient argument, that, though he was much in debt, yet he chose rather to negotiate a loan of money from the people of the Low Countries, at the interest of fourteen per cent. per ann. But his way of raising money was by selling the chantry-lands and religious houses, granted him by parliament; and by enquiring after all church goods, either remaining or embezzled, as jewels, gold and silver chalices, ready money, copes, and other vestments, reserving to every church one chalice and one covering for the communion-table, the rest to be applied to his own benefit. He also raised money by enquiring after offences of officers in great places: on enquiry one Beaumont, master of the Rolls, being convicted of many crimes, surrendered all his offices, lands, and goods, into the king's hands. Also one Whalley, receiver of Yorkshire, being found a delinquent, surrendered his office, and paid a great fine besides. Also the lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, conscious that he had sold the king's lands and timber woods without commission, and had applied the king's stores to his own use, for these and other offences, surrendered his office, and was fined four thousand pounds, which he paid in hand. One thing more was done in his time, for raising of money; twenty thousand pounds weight of bullion was appointed to be made so much baser, that the king might gain thereby one hundred and forty thousand pounds.

M A R Y.

WE have seen, under the year 1285, that the first statutes made in England for widening the roads between market-towns, was made purely for the prevention of robberies, without the least hint therein of the benefit to arise thereby to carriages, on account of commerce, of which there was but very little at that time.

From that time we meet with nothing relating to that subject (except the paving the suburbs about London, &c.) till king Henry VIII's reign, in which there are four statutes, viz. two for the altering or removing certain roads (annis 14 & 15, cap. vi.) in the Weald of Kent, and (anno 26, cap. vii.) in the deep ways of Suffex; both which have been already taken notice of, under the year 1524; a third, for mending a lane near Chester; and a fourth for the repair of bridges, and highways at the ends of bridges; neither of which two did we think worthy of animadversion. But commerce beginning to increase considerably in the reign of his daughter Mary, whereby the old roads became much more frequented by heavy carriages, an act, of 2 and 3 Philip and Mary, anno 1555 (cap. viii.) takes notice, "that the highways were then very noisome and tedious to travel in, and dangerous to all carriages; wherefore it was now enacted (and is still in force), that every parish should annually elect two surveyors of the highways, to see that the parishioners, according to their lands, abilities, farms, &c. send their carts, horses, men, tools, &c. four days in every year, for mending the roads." So that this is properly the first general statute made for mending the roads, extending extending to all England and Wales, by the labour and expence of each respective parish alone; and on that bottom alone we find in all six statutes relating to this subject in queen Mary's reign, nineteen in queen Elizabeth's, and one in king James I's reign; after which there were none of this kind till king Charles II's Restoration. The said parochial means for keeping the roads in repair were found, in most cases, tolerably effectual, till after the Restoration of Charles II. when the vast increase of the nation's commerce and manufactures, and of the capital city of London, with the concomitant increase of luxury, brought in such a number of heavy-wheeled carriages on our roads, as rendered it by degrees impracticable in most cases for parishes entirely to keep their own part of the roads in tolerable condition, more especially in the counties near London, and in the manufacturing counties. This has introduced the more equitable and effectual method of tolls payable at numberless toll-gates (called turnpikes) by the identical wearers of those roads alone: and many subsequent local statutes have been made for those ends, and also several general ones for limiting the weight of waggon-loads, the breadth of wheel-rims, called fellies, the number of horses, &c. And thus much we thought sufficient to serve for a summary history of the laws relating to the roads of England, so as not to have much occasion to name them any more in this work.

What we have here said, concerning a summary history of the keeping the roads or highways of England in repair, may also be partly applied to the subject of deepening rivers, and meliorating havens or harbours on the sea-coasts. With respect to the former, we have seen that the first instance thereof in the statute book, is that of the third of Henry VI. (cap. v.) for deepening the river Lea from the town of Ware to London, an. 1424; and that in his ninth year (cap. ix.) for the same end: after which we find none, either for rivers or for havens, till the reign of Henry VIII. who repaired and fortified several harbours; for that of 4 Henry VII. for preserving the river Thames, relates merely to the fishing therein; and that of the eleventh of the same king, for removing weirs and engines from Southampton harbour, was for the like purpose; but we find no more statutes of either kind till queen Elizabeth's reign, some of which, as also subsequent ones, we may perhaps think it necessary to take a more particular notice of, in their respective places; as also for bridges over rivers.

TAXES in the Reign of Queen MARY.

Queen Mary began with a rare example, for in the first year of her reign, she remitted, by proclamation, the subsidy of four shillings in the pound of land, and two shillings in the pound of goods granted in the last parliament of king Edward VI.

In her second year, in a parliament then holden, was granted to the king and queen a subsidy of the laity, from five pounds to ten pounds, of eight pence in the pound; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, of twelve pence in the pound; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of sixteen pence in the pound; all strangers to pay double: and the clergy, six shillings in the pound. If this were all, then, upon the matter, in all her time there came no new charge upon her people: for one subsidy remitted, and one received, made but even.

In her last year she borrowed twenty thousand pounds of the city of London, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum.

ELIZABETH.

IN the fifth year of Elizabeth (cap. iii.) was the first statute enacted in England for the relief of the poor: for whereas all other acts of parliament were only on the foot of voluntary contributions for the poor, resting or depending upon the charitable devotion of the people, which method had not answered the intended purpose, or prevented common beggars from multiplying every where, it was now therefore found necessary to go a step farther. It is certain that the suppression of the convents had not a little increased this disorder; those houses having been a great relief to the poor of their own lands, and in their neighbourhood, to whom not only their kitchens, but their granaries, were ever open, more especially in times of dearth; when, therefore, the church-lands were sold by Henry VIII. at very easy purchases, it was then declared to be for enabling the buyers to keep up that wonted hospitality, which, however, they greatly neglected to do; yet still there was no compulsory law till now. This act, therefore, after "directing poor and impotent persons of every parish to be relieved of that which every person will, of their charity, give weekly, to be gathered by collectors, and distributed to the poor, so as none of them shall go, or sit, openly begging; (now comes the compulsory clause) and if any parishioner shall obstinately refuse to pay reasonably towards the relief of the said poor, or shall discourage others, then the justices of the peace, at their quarter-sessions, may tax him at a reasonable weekly sum; which if he refuses to pay, they may commit him to prison: yet, where the parishioners have more poor than they can relieve, the justices may licence so many of their poor as they shall think proper, to beg in one or more hundreds of their respective counties. Lastly, beggars in any other place than where legally licenced, were to be punished according to the laws of vagabonds."

The next statute of the same session of parliament (viz. cap. iv.) entitled "A repeal of so much of former statutes as concern the hiring, keeping, departing, working, or order of servants, labourers, &c. and a declaration who shall be compelled to serve in handicrafts, and whom in husbandry, and their several duties, &c." gives the substance of many former laws, with their imperfections, contrariety, and remarks, and observes that the wages ascertained in many of those acts of parliament were now become insufficient, by reason of the advanced prices of all necessaries since those times; yet, large and comprehensive as this act is (and too much of it is still in force) there are sundry subsequent statutes, both in this and succeeding reigns, for the regulation of disputes between masters and their servants, apprentices, and labourers, concerning their wages, time of labour, &c.

The next law (cap. v.) of that year, entitled "Constitutions for the maintenance of the navy, &c." contains many good clauses for encouraging our own shipping and mariners: as "I. By permitting herrings, and other fish caught upon our coasts, to be exported duty-free. II. That no foreign ships shall carry any goods coastwise, from any one English port to another. III. Wines and woad shall be imported from France in English shipping alone (with some inconsiderable exceptions.) IV. That, as well for the maintaining of shipping, the increase of fishermen and mariners, and the repairing of port-towns, as for the sparing and increase of the flesh victuals of this realm, it shall not be lawful for any to eat flesh on Wednesday and Saturdays, on the penalty of three pounds for each offence, excepting cases of sickness; and also those by special licences to be obtained [this purely political fasting from flesh meat was partly altered by cap. ii. 27 Eliz. by leaving out Wednesday; yet the victuallers were to utter no flesh in Lent, nor on Fridays and Saturdays]; for which said licence obtained by peers, they were to pay one pound six shillings and four pence to the poor's box of the parish; knights and their wives, thirteen shillings and four pence; and others, six shillings and eight pence each: but no licence was to extend to the eating of beef [on these days] at any time of the year [this shews, that in those days, black cattle were deemed scarce]; nor to the eating of veal, in any year, from Michaelmas to the first day of May. "But because (adds the statute) no person shall misjudge the intent of this statute, be it enacted, that whosoever shall, by preaching, teaching, writing, or open speech, notify that any eating of flesh, or forbearing of flesh, mentioned in this statute, is of any necessity for saving the soul of man, or that it is the service of God, otherwise than as other polite laws are and be, then such persons shall be punished as spreaders of false news ought to be."

In the following year the parliament, assembled at Westminster, among others, passed the following acts, viz. I. An act against holding or maintaining the authority of the bishop of Rome. II. That no one shall procure a false witness, upon the penalty of forty pounds; nor any one be a false witness, upon the penalty of twenty pounds, and six months imprisonment. III. An act making the clipping and wasting of coin treason. IV. That any person who shall be seen or found in the company of Egyptians [gypsies], shall be deemed felons. V. An act for the due execution of the act "De excommunicato capiendo." VI. An act for translating the Bible and Common Prayer Book into Welsh. VII. An act to establish and confirm the queen's supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs. The work of Reformation, which, with several interruptions, had been carrying on above thirty years, was in a great measure completed, and the articles of the church of England settled by the convocation, and reduced to the number of thirty-nine, as they stand at this day.

The parliament which was dissolved on the twenty-second of January, 1567, made the following acts: I. An act declaring the making and consecrating of bishops within this realm, to be good, orderly, and lawful. II. That no man shall send any rams, sheep, or lambs, alive, out of the realm, upon pain, for the first offence, of forfeiture of all his goods, and one year's imprisonment; and for the second, of being declared a felon. III. That cut-purses and pickpockets shall not have benefit of clergy. IV. Whereas there was but one sheriff for Surry and Suffex, one for Essex and Hertfordshire, one for Somerset and Dorsetshire, one for Warwick and Leicestershire, one for Nottingham and Derbyshire, one for Oxford and Berkshire; it was ordered that, for the future (the year 1567 being the first), each of these counties should have a sheriff respectively.

In the year 1571, the fourteenth of Elizabeth's reign, was passed the famous act for the maintaining the queen's title, of which we have given the substance, in our history of that reign*. The other acts made in this parliament are little worth notice, if we except one relating to the clergy, by which it is enacted, "that no ecclesiastical person shall be admitted to any benefice with cure, except he be twenty-three years of age at least, and shall first subscribe the articles of religion, in presence of the ordinary, and, within two months after induction, read the same in his parish-church, in the time of common prayer, and declare his unfeigned assent thereunto, and all this upon pain of deprivation. That no one shall retain a benefice with cure, being under the age of twenty-one years, or without a testimonial of his honest life, nor unless he is able to render to the ordinary an account of his faith in Latin."

In the eighteenth year of her reign, an act was passed, making it treason to impair, diminish, or falsify the coin of the realm.

The parliament of 1585 enacted several severe laws against papists: it was also declared, "that no person should be returned to serve upon juries, but who has an estate of freehold lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to the clear yearly value of four pounds at least."

The parliament which met in February, 1593, passed a very rigid statute against all non-conformists, which equally affected papists and protestants. In the preamble to this act it is said, "that this act was made for preventing and avoiding such great inconveniences and perils as might happen and grow by the wicked and dangerous practices of seditious sectaries and disloyal persons." The act ran, "that if any person above the age of sixteen years, shall refuse to repair to some church, or refuse to do the same for the space of one month, shall be committed to prison, there to remain, without bail or mainprize, until they shall conform, and make such open submission and declaration of their conformity, as by this act is appointed." The offenders against this statute, who refused to make the submission, were to abjure the realm, and not to return without her majesty's licence, under the penalty of suffering as felons, without benefit of clergy. This bill met with great opposition in the house of commons, as may be seen in d'Ewe's Journal, p. 474, &c. where the speeches on both sides are inserted. There was an act also made against popish recusants, by which they were confined within five miles of their respective dwellings, on forfeiture of all their goods and chattles, together with lands, during life. By another act all the abbey-lands were confirmed to the crown and grantees.

The parliament which met at Westminster on the twenty-fourth of October, 1597, and was dissolved on the ninth of February, 1598, made the following acts: "I. An act for the punishment of rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars: by this statute all the following persons are to be adjudged rogues and vagabonds: people who go about begging as poor scholars, or on the pretence of loss by fire or shipwreck; collectors for jails, or persons delivered out of jail and begging for their fees; such as use any subtle craft or unlawful games, fortune-tellers, gypsies, fencers, bear-wards, common players, and minstrels, jugglers, lurkers, pedlars, and petty-chapmen, fellows not working for reasonable wages when they are able, and the like: their punishment is, to be whipped and sent from parish to parish, by the officer in each, the next straight way to the parish where they were born, or last dwelt for the space of a whole year. II. An act for erecting hospitals, houses of correction, and workhouses for the poor. III. One for the increase of mariners, and maintenance of navigation. IV. An act against lewd and wandering persons, pretending to be soldiers or mariners, and travelling without testimonials from justices of the peace.

In the last parliament of this reign, holden at Westminster, on the twenty-seventh of October, 1601, the following statutes were passed. I. An act for the relief of the poor, appointing the choosing of overseers, and the manner of raising money for the relief of the poor. II. That every parish in England shall pay a weekly sum for the relief of the sick, hurt, and maimed soldiers and mariners. III. An act to redress the misemployment of lands, goods, &c. given to charitable uses. IV. That persons cutting and carrying away corn growing, robbing of orchards, breaking or cutting up hedges, poles, &c. and digging or pulling up fruit-trees, cutting or spoiling wood or underwood, not being felony by law, shall be obliged to make satisfaction or be whipped.

TAXES in the Reign of Queen ELIZABETH.

In the parliament holden in the first year of her reign, a subsidy was granted, of two shillings and eight pence in the pound on goods, and four shillings on lands, to be paid at two several payments, by every person, spiritual and temporal.

In her sixth year, in a parliament held at Westminster, one subsidy was granted by the clergy, and another by the laity, together with two fifteenths and tenths.

In her eighth year, at a parliament then held, there were offered to her four subsidies, upon condition she would declare a successor; but she refused their offer, and directly remitted the fourth subsidy which they had granted, saying, "that it was all one, whether the money was in her subjects coffers or in her own."

In her thirteenth year, in a parliament then held, towards her charges of repressing the Northern rebellion, there was granted her a subsidy of six shillings in the pound, by the clergy; and by the temporality, two fifteenths, and a subsidy of two shillings and eight pence in the pound.

In her six-and-thirtieth year a parliament was holden, in which two subsidies were granted by the clergy, and by the laity three, besides six fifteenths and tenths; but it was put in this act, that this contribution, the like whereof had not been known in former ages, should not be drawn into example.

In her fortieth year, in a parliament at Westminster were granted her by the clergy three entire subsidies, and by the laity as many, with six fifteenths and tenths.

In her forty-second year, to furnish her with money towards the Irish war, she delegated certain commissioners to confirm the crown-lands to the possessors that held any of controverted titles, and to take money for the confirmation, thereby to take away the trouble by contractors, who were at this time very busy.

ARTS and SCIENCES, MANNERS and CUSTOMS, in the XVIth Century.

IF there is a satisfaction, says a modern historian, in viewing in painting and sculpture the features of our ancestors, it must be equally so to read in the page of history their manners and dispositions. We have already shewn how great encouragement learning and the polite arts received from Wolsey, in the beginning of this period; neither were the English wanting all this time in cultivating and cherishing new-born arts and discoveries. One Owen is noted as being the first who, about the year 1536, cast brass cannon in England, some specimens of which are said to be still preserved in the Tower of London. The art of printing had also before this time been imported, and had been brought to as great perfection in England as in any neighbouring country. Music and painting had met likewise with encouragement, Henry himself having some taste for those arts, as appears from several letters patent in favour of their professors, especially to the famous Hans Holbein.

Archbishop Nicholson, in his English Historical Library, speaking of the state of geographical knowledge at or about this period, observes, "that since the beginning of king Henry VIII's reign, our eldest general geographer or antiquary is said to have been Thomas Sulmo, a Guernsey man, who died at London in the year 1545. The year following, a much greater man of the profession, sir Thomas Elliot, one of king Henry's ambassadors, and sir Thomas More's friends, died also. Cotemporary with those two was George Lily (son of William, the famous grammarian), who lived some time at Rome with cardinal Pole, and published the first exact map that ever was, till then, drawn of this island."

In the year 1521 was first introduced the use of hand-guns or musquets, whereby, in process of time the practice of bows and arrows in war was quite laid aside.

About the year 1535, glasses were first begun to be made in England: the finer sort was made in Crutched-friars, London; the fine flint-glass, little inferior to that of Venice, was first made in the Savoy-house, in the Strand, London; but the first glass-plates for looking-glasses and coach-windows, were made about the year 1673, at Vauxhall, near Lambeth, by the encouragement of the duke of Buckingham. The English have improved this manufacture so greatly, as to surpass every other nation in Europe in this useful branch of business.

The ingenious author of the Present State of England, printed in 1683, acquaints us, that the first manufacture of knives in England was begun in 1562, by Thomas Matthews, on Fleet-bridge, London.

London. How strangely are things altered since those times! for now London excels all the earth in this article, and supplies many other nations therewith in great quantities.

Mr. Anderson, in his most elaborate and useful work, lately published, concerning the Origin of Commerce, to which I acknowledge myself greatly indebted for many curious extracts, tells us that he has in his possession the first work ever published in England on the art of Italian book-keeping, or merchants-accounts by double-entry; it is a folio, printed at London, anno 1569, in a black letter, the author James Peele. The style (says Mr. Anderson) is obsolete, yet he has sufficiently testified that he understood the true grounds and principles of double-entry accounts full as well as some who have written much later.

In all probability, this art of double-entry accounts had its rise, or at least its revival, amongst the mercantile cities of Italy: possibly it might be first known at Venice, about the time that numeral algebra was taught there, from the principles of which science double-entry, or what we call merchants-accounts, seem to have been deduced, viz. about the middle of the XVth century, though it did not reach England till our commerce, about this time, began to be considerable. It is said that Lucas de Burgo, a friar, was the first European author who published his algebraic work at Venice, anno 1494.

In the year 1589, William Lee, M. A. of St. John's college, Cambridge, invented an engine or steel-loom, called the Stocking-frame, for knitting or weaving of stockings. This was but twenty years after we had first learned from Spain the method of knitting them with wires or needles. Mr. Lee's invention has proved of considerable benefit to the stocking manufacture, by enabling England, in after times, to export vast quantities of silk stockings to Italy, &c. where, it seems (by sir Josiah Child's excellent Discourse on Trade, first published in the year 1678), they had then not got the use of the stocking-frame, though little short of one hundred years after its invention: yet Dr. Howell, in his History of the World (vol. iii. p. 222.) makes this invention eleven years after, 1600; and adds, that Mr. Lee not only taught his art in England and in France, but his servants did the same in Spain, Venice, and Ireland.

We have the best authority for fixing the date of the first manufacturing of sail-cloth in England to the year 1599, being the preamble to an act of parliament of king James I. cap. xxiii. reciting, that "whereas the cloths called Mildernix, and Powl Davies, whereof sails and other furniture for the navy and shipping are made, were heretofore altogether brought out of France, and other parts beyond sea, and the skill and art of making and weaving the said cloth was never known or used in England till about the thirty-second year of the reign of the late queen Elizabeth (i. e. 1590.), about which time the skill and art of making and weaving was attained to, and since practised and continued in this realm to the great benefit and commodity thereof," &c.

As we still excel all nations upon earth both in naval power and maritime commerce, every thing relative to either should (as far as is practicable) come to us at the first hand; yet, though it may seem somewhat strange, that a nation in those days very far from being eminent in shipping, should have so long supplied us with this great article, it ought to be considered, that they were in those days (and long before we fell into it) eminent for the manufacture of many kinds of excellent cloths, made both of flax and hemp; and that perfection (in almost every art) is not to be arrived at but by very slow degrees.

In or about the same year was the invention of the telescope or spying-glass discovered, being justly esteemed one of the most useful and excellent discoveries of modern times; though it was, it seems, produced by mere chance. The common account is, that two children of one Janssen, a spectacle-maker at Middleburgh, in Zealand, being at play in their father's shop, and looking through two pieces of glass between their fingers, which were at some small distance from each other, the weather-cock of the church-steeple appeared to them unusually large, and much nearer; of this they instantly told their father, who, surprized also at first, made the experiment of fixing two such pieces of glass in brazen circles, or cylinders, so as they might be placed nearer or farther, at pleasure. Janssen very soon improved this discovery so much, that he presented a telescope, twelve inches long, to prince Maurice, and another to the archduke Albert. Mr. Wotton (in his Reflections on ancient and modern Learning) relates, "that prince Maurice, conjecturing this might be of great use in war, desired him to conceal his secret, and for that reason his name was so little known, that neither Des Cartes nor Gerard Vossius had ever heard any thing of him, when they attributed this invention to one Jacobus Metius, of Alkmaar." None of these first telescopes, however, were above eighteen inches long, neither were they properly framed for astronomical observations, until Galileo, astronomer to the grand-duke of Tuscany, hearing of this discovery for bringing objects nearer, made such great improvements therein, as to have gained him, in the opinion of many, the honour of the invention itself, by giving to the telescope the appellation of Galileo's Tube. Some, indeed, make this noble invention to have happened some years later, and that J. Baptista Porta, a Neapolitan, was the first inventor; but the general belief is as above. Our incomparable sir Isaac Newton was the inventor of the reflecting telescope, consisting of specula, or mirrors, instead of lenses, which has been since much improved, and is much more exact than reflecting ones. The microscope, which magnifies the smallest objects so as to be distinctly viewed, was discovered in the year 1621; and it is said this happened both at Naples and Holland at the same time. Mezeray makes this invention eighteen years later; yet he adds, that even the ancients must have known the use of them, if what Roger Bacon says be true, viz. "that Julius Cæsar being on the Belgic shore, opposite Britain, did, with certain great burning-glasses, discover the posture and disposition of the British army, and all the coasts of that country."—Which whoever please, may believe!

By the telescope, astronomy is brought to such a degree of perfection, as it was impossible for the ancients to arrive at. Navigation, and consequently commerce, is likewise much assisted, from a more perfect discovery of the heavenly bodies:

and many volumes have been published of the wonderful and amazing discoveries made by the microscope.

About this time flourished the famous Danish astronomer, Tycho Brahe, who made some astronomical discoveries and improvements, which proved very beneficial to navigation and maritime commerce. He deceased anno 1601.

The progress which the fine arts made in England since the death of their patron, Wolsey, was next to nothing. The English poetry, indeed, seemed to have risen amongst us complete, and is the only art that, since the days of Shakespeare and Spencer, has been on the declining hand. Architecture came, towards the middle and close of this century, to be more sumptuous; but its style was barbarous. Painting has, in England, been always of foreign growth, and when transplanted hither, has been but just kept alive by the bounty of the great; nor could England, during the successive reigns of Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, produce a patron like Wolsey, or an artist like Holbein, who in the likeness could draw the character.

The progress made in the mathematical art was confined to the studies of Dee and one or two more, who were patronized by Burleigh. In natural philosophy the nation was excessively ignorant, insomuch that we read in the year 1577, some of the greatest men about court suffered themselves to be bubbled out of considerable sums by impostors, who pretended to the secret of transmuting metals: we are sorry to find the name of that great and able man Burleigh, in the list of those dupes of a senseless credulity. The queen's own example revived a taste for music, both vocal and instrumental; and even dancing was not void of elegance.

Although the nobility of this age preserved great remains of the ancient customs, yet they were by degrees acquiring the taste of elegant luxury, and many edifices in particular were built by them, neat, large, and sumptuous, to the great ornament of the kingdom, says Camden, but to the no less decay of the glorious hospitality of the nation. It is, however, more reasonable to think, that this new turn of expence promoted arts and industry, while the ancient hospitality was the source of real disorder and sedition, idleness. Among the other species of luxury, that of apparel began much to increase during this age, and the queen thought proper to restrain it by proclamation. Her example was very little conformable to her edicts; as no woman was ever more conceited of her beauty, nor more desirous of making impressions on the hearts of beholders; no one ever went to greater extravagance in apparel, nor studied more the variety and richness of her dress; she appeared almost every day in a different habit, and tried all the several modes by which she hoped to make herself agreeable: she was likewise so fond of her cloaths, that she never would part with any of them; and at her death she had in her wardrobe all the different habits, to the number of three thousand, which she had ever worn in her life-time. The retrenchment of the ancient hospitality, and the diminution of retainers, was ever favourable to the prerogative of the sovereign, and, by disabling the great noblemen from resistance, promoted the execution of the laws, and extended the authority of the courts of justice.

OF COMMERCE, HUSBANDRY, NAVIGATION, PUBLIC REVENUES, &c. in ENGLAND during the XVth Century.

THE English had not the same splendor of success with the Spaniards, nor such influence in other courts, nor did they possess that great power which rendered Spain so dangerous to her neighbours; but they acquired a new kind of glory from the ocean, and the extensive maritime trade they carried on: they knew their true element, and that alone made them more happy than all the foreign conquests and possessions of their ancient kings, and they became a powerful, civilized, industrious, laborious, and enterprising nation. The improvements made by the Spaniards in navigation excited their emulation, and they undertook three successive voyages to discover a north-west passage to Japan and China: Drake and Cavendish sailed round the globe, attacking in all places those very Spaniards who had extended their conquest and trade to both ends of the world: the famous sir Walter Raleigh established the colony of Virginia, and afterwards assisted in that expedition wherein the English fleet went and insulted Philip II. upon his own coasts, destroying his ships, and burning the rich city of Cadiz: at length, grown more formidable, they, in 1602, defeated the first fleet Philip III. sent to sea, and from that time acquired a superiority at sea, which they have ever since maintained.

From the first beginning of Elizabeth's reign they applied themselves to manufactures. The Flemings, being persecuted by Philip II. removed to London, bringing with them an increase of inhabitants, industry, and riches. This capital, which enjoyed the blessings of peace under Elizabeth, cultivated likewise the liberal arts, which are the badges and consequences of plenty: in a word, London was enlarged, civilized, and embellished, and in a short time one half of the little island of Great Britain was able to counterbalance the whole power of Spain.

The English now figured as the second nation in the world in industry, as in liberty they were the first. They began early to establish a navy-royal; they commenced a great fishery on the Banks of Newfoundland, a whale-fishery in the North Seas, and a trade to Russia; and, by means of an important discovery of a passage by sea to that country, round the north cape of Lapland, opened an extensive field for other discoveries, and new branches of commerce; they also commenced their Turkey trade; and in the very last year of this century incorporated the East India company.

Agriculture now began to be considered in England as the chief riches of the state, while in Spain they began to neglect this real good for ideal treasures: the gold and silver trade of the new world enriched the king of Spain, but in England the subject was benefited by the sale of the natural commodities. A private merchant of London, sir

Thomas Gresham, was at that time rich enough to build the Royal Exchange at his own expence, and to found and endow the college which bears his name; and several other citizens founded hospitals and public schools. Such, says Mr. de Voltaire, in his Essay on General History, were the glorious effects produced by industry in this kingdom, that private persons could do what kings at present can only effect, during the most happy administration.

Thus much in general: I shall now proceed to point out the most remarkable gradations, by which the several articles under our consideration tended to perfection during this period.

Nothing material of discovery had been made from England since Cabot's voyage to the coast of America, in the year 1496. In 1525, king Henry VIII. sent two ships towards the same coasts, one of which was cast away in the Gulph of St. Laurence, and the other returned home the same year, but without any material discovery. One Robert Thorn is said to have put Henry upon this voyage, in hopes of finding a north-west passage to the Moluccas.

In our review of the state of Commerce, &c. at the end of the reign of Henry VII. we have shewn the state of husbandry in England at that time; it seems the evil then complained of, was now grown to a greater height, for, in the twenty-fifth of Henry VIII. a law was made (cap. xiii.) which represents "the custom of engrossing great numbers of sheep in one man's hands, and for that end keeping many farms in the same man's hands, as a practice which has not been but within a few years past, putting such lands as they can get into pasture, and not to tillage; whereby they have not only pulled down churches and towns [quære, how this could be], and enhanced old rates and rents, or else brought them to such excessive fines, that no poor man is able to meddle with them; but also have enhanced all manner of corn, cattle, wool, pigs, geese, hens, chickens, eggs, &c. by reason whereof a marvellous multitude of people be not able to provide meat, cloaths, &c. for themselves and families. One of the greatest occasions why those covetous people do keep such great quantities of lands in their hands from the occupying of the poor husbandman, and do use it in pasture and not in tillage, is only the great profit that cometh by sheep, now got into few persons hands in respect to the whole number of the king's subjects, that some have twenty-four thousand, some twenty thousand, some ten thousand to five thousand sheep, whereby a good sheep, that used to be sold for two shillings and four pence, or three shillings at most, now sold for six, five, or four shillings at the least; and a stone of wool, which used to be sold for eighteen pence and twenty pence, is now sold for four shillings or three shillings and four pence at least, &c. which things tend to the decay of hospitality, the diminishing of the people, and the let of cloth-making, whereby many poor people have been accustomed to be set to work. For the remedy whereof, it was in substance enacted, I. That none shall keep above two thousand four hundred sheep (exclusive of lambs) at any one time, unless it be on his own land of inheritance, in which case he is not hereby limited, nor any spiritual persons. II. No man shall hold above two farms, in the

The increase of the woollen manufacture increasing the demand for wool, gave rise to this practice of engrossing farms, and turning them into sheep-walks, which undoubtedly can be managed by much fewer hands than tillage-farms can be, whereby depopulation must necessarily ensue.

In the year 1536, the twenty-seventh of Henry VIII. the king gave encouragement to certain merchants to send out two ships on discovery to the north coast of America, where they visited Cape Breton and Newfoundland; and being in great distress for want of provisions there, they returned home in October the same year; and although this voyage proved unfavourable to their main intent of finding a north-west passage to India, yet it gave rise to the very beneficial fishery of the English on the Banks of Newfoundland, on which barren island one Mr. Hoar, of London, merchant, attempted a settlement at this time, though he met with much misfortune in that unsuccessful attempt.

We find that the English merchants of Southampton and London traded to Brasil in the years 1540 and 1542, and so it seems at those times to have been permitted, and until the year 1580, when the king of Spain got possession of Portugal.

About this time the state of shipping, even in the port of London, was very low, compared with the present time. If we may give credit to Wheeler's Treatise of Commerce, who wrote in 1601, he expressly asserts, that about sixty years before he wrote, there were not above four ships, besides those of the royal navy, that exceeded one hundred and twenty tons burthen, within the river of Thames.

In the year 1553, the last of Edward VI. a very great cosmographical as well as mercantile discovery was made by the enterprising genius of a certain Englishman, who (whether reading Othier's account of the situation of the lands and seas about Norway, &c. delivered to the great king Alfred, anno 887, or whether from any informations lately received from the Norway people, with whom we now constantly traded) about this time discovered a passage by sea to Russia, along the north end of Norway and Russian Lapland, and down into the sea or rather great bay, since termed the White Sea, in which is situated the noted port of Archangel. Sir Hugh Willoughby, as commander in chief, with three ships, had begun this voyage just before the death of Edward VI. being supported by a society or company of gentlemen and merchants for the discovery of unknown countries. It seems to have been the scheme of the famous Sebastian Cabot, who was chosen governor of that company, and who well deserved the pension already noted to have been settled on him by Edward VI. and that the wars of Sweden with Russia by the way of Norway, in some degree obliged the English to attempt this new passage to Russia by the Northern Ocean. This undertaking was supported by a subscription of six thousand pounds, divided into twenty-four shares, twenty-five pounds each share. With those ships went letters from king Edward to all kings, princes, &c. for their protection. It was intended chiefly as a shorter and easier passage (as they imagined) to Cathay (a name then used for that country which is now called China.) Sir Hugh Willoughby being tossed up and down down for a long time as far as seventy-two degrees north latitude, was compelled, by the sudden approach of winter, to run into an obscure harbour in Russian Lapland, called Arcaia Keca, where he and the crew of two of his three ships (seventy in number) were frozen to death, and where some Russian fishermen, in the summer following, found him sitting in his cabin, with his diary and other papers before him: it being the custom of those Laplanders to frequent the sea-coasts in summer for the benefit of the fishery, but when winter approaches, to withdraw into the Calmarisle and parts, which occasions those stormy shores to be desolate in winter. Richard Chancellor however, in the third ship, accidentally fell into the bay of St. Nicholas, or White Sea, on the Russian coast, where no European, nor any other ships, had ever been seen before: here he landed at the abbey of St. Nicholas, near Archangel, then only a castle, determining to wait on the czar John Basilowitz, at that time engaged in the Livonian war; which war having greatly interrupted the Eastland trade, that prince was the more inclinable, by Chancellor's interposition, to grant the English considerable privileges at Archangel, &c. The Russians before those times having no sea-ports nor shipping on the Baltic shores, the rich furs, hemp, &c. were carried to other parts of Europe, from the ports of Livonia lately possessed by the Teutonic knights of St. Mary of Jerusalem. Thus (as in general is noted in our introduction), although we failed in our principal aim of arriving at China by this supposed north-east passage, we however made a useful and profitable discovery of a trade by sea to Russia: and this same discovery moreover pointed out likewise to the English the way to the whale-fishery at Spitzbergen, soon after put in practice.

Chancellor, from Archangel, by the governor's leave and assistance, travelled on sledges to the czar's court at Moscow, of whom (overjoyed at the new opening of a maritime commerce with Europe) he obtained privileges from the English merchants, and letters to king Edward VI. who, however, died before the arrival of Chancellor.

Thus, by the encouragement of this excellent young prince, for making discoveries northward, a beginning was made for a trade to Russia; but Edward dying before he had executed a very ample charter to those adventurers, it was the said first and second of Philip and Mary (February 6, 1554) that the first charter of incorporation was granted to the Russia company (as it has since been usually called), but then by the name of the Merchants Adventurers for the Discoveries of Lands, Countries, Isles, &c. not before known or frequented by any English. The preamble to this charter, and the substance of the whole it sets forth, is, that the marquis of Winchester, then lord high-treasurer, the earl of Arundel, lord high-steward of the queen's household, the earl of Bedford, lord privy-seal, and the earl of Pembroke, the lord Howard of Effingham, lord high-admiral, &c. had already fitted out ships for discoveries northward, north-eastward, and north-westward, not as yet frequented by other Christian monarchs in friendship with us, to have one governor (the first to be Sebastian Cabot, for life), and twenty-eight of the most sad (i. e. sedate), discreet, and honest of the said fellowship, four of whom to be called Consuls, and the other twenty-four to be called Assistants; the governor and two consuls (or three consuls in the governor's absence), and twelve assistants to be the quorum of a court. This corporation might purchase lands to the yearly value of sixty pounds thirteen shillings and four pence, to have perpetual succession, a common-seal, may plead and be impleaded, may impose mulcts, forfeitures, &c. on offenders against the company's privileges, and may admit persons from time to time to be free of the company; may make conquests of lands of infidels, so to be discovered by them. And whereas one of the said ships (i. e. Chancellor's) set forth last year (1553) arrived safe, and wintered, in the dominions of our cousin and brother, lord John Basilowitz, emperor of all Russia, who entertained them honourably, &c. and granted them letters to us, with free licence to traffick into his country, with other privileges, under his signet; wherefore we grant this corporation liberty to resort, not only to all parts of that emperor's dominions, but to all other parts not known to our subjects; none of whom but such as shall be free of, or licenced by, this company, shall frequent the parts aforesaid, under forfeiture of ship and merchandize, one half to the crown and the other half to the company."

It seems the Bristol merchants had gotten into the Russia trade soon after its discovery, being encouraged thereto by sir Sebastian Cabot.

Much the like complaints in relation to the English woollen manufacturers as have been made in the present time, were we find made above two hundred years ago, as appears by the statute of the second and third of Philip and Mary (cap. xi.) entitled, "Who shall use the trade of weaving," viz. "that whereas the rich clothiers do oppress the weavers, some by setting up and keeping in their houses divers looms, and maintaining them by journeymen and persons unskilful; some by engrossing looms into their hands, and letting them out at such unreasonable rents as the poor artificers are not able to maintain themselves by, and much less their wives and families, some again by giving much less wages for the workmanship of cloths than in times past, whereby they are forced utterly to forsake their occupations, &c. wherefore it is enacted, I. That no clothier, living out of a city, borough, or market-town, shall keep above one loom in his house, nor let out any loom for hire. II. That no woollen weaver, living out of a city, borough, or market-town, shall keep more than two looms, nor more than two apprentices. III. No weaver (whilst such) shall have a tucking-mill, nor be a tucker, fuller, nor dyer. IV. No tucker or fuller (whilst such) shall keep any loom in his house. V. That no person who hath not heretofore been a cloth-maker, shall hereafter make or weave any kind of broad white woollen cloths, but only in a city, borough, town corporate, or market-town, or else in such places where such cloths have been used to be commonly made for ten years preceding this act. [This clause was probably well intended, that the searchers might be the better enabled to see the goodness of this manufacture.] VI. No person shall set up as a weaver, unless he hath previously served an apprenticeship of seven years to that business. Lastly, that nothing in this act is to extend or be prejudicial to the inhabitants of the counties of York, Cumberland, and Westmoreland; but they

After England had held the town and port of Calais (with its dependent garrisons of Guisnes and Ham) for two hundred and eleven years (the only part of the continent of France held by England) during which time it was not only a door always open for the invasion of France, over which, for that reason, England had no small influence; but (which is more to our purpose) was extremely well situated for a staple port, to disperse, in more early times, the wool, lead, tin, and, in later times, the woollen manufactures of England, into the inland countries of the Netherlands, France, and Germany; the loss of this important place (in the year 1558) to the French, most shamefully and negligently, in the midst of winter, was undoubtedly a considerable prejudice to commerce, and not a little to the honour and influence of England. Hereupon the staple of wool, &c. was removed to Burges, to the great benefit of that city, which had been for some time declining from its ancient opulence and grandeur.

That most diligent agent for the Russian company, Mr. Anthony Jenkinson, did, in the year 1557, first set on foot a new channel of trade, through Russia into Persia, for raw silk, &c. He sailed down the great river Volga to Nisi, Novogorod, Casan, and Astracan, and thence crossed the Caspian sea to Persia. At Boghar, a goodly city, he found merchants from India, Persia, Russia, and Cathay or China, from which last-mentioned country it was nine months journey to Boghar. Jenkinson returned the same way to Colmizro, in the bay of St. Nicholas, anno 1560, and so home the same year to England. On his return he published the first map of Russia, that had ever been made. This voyage, it seems, he performed seven different times; yet so promising a prospect for that company was dropped some few years afterwards, and remained as if it had never been, until the reign of king George II. anno 1744, when it was revived by an act of parliament, enabling the Russia company to trade thence into Persia; upon which considerable quantities of raw silk were brought home by the very same way that Jenkinson took from Persia to Russia, and thence to England: yet the continual troubles and ravages in Persia have since suspended the good effects of this law.

We are now arrived (November 17, 1558) at the commencement of the most illustrious female reign, and of the longest duration, which probably ever existed in the world, viz. that of the truly great Elizabeth, queen of England, it is not now either our present province or intention to draw her character at length, which has already been done; we shall therefore, at this entrance on her glorious government, confine ourselves to this one brief remark, viz. that, to her immortal honour and her kingdom's immense benefit, her reign was supplied with more important articles for commercial history, and more beneficial to the kingdom (even whilst she was surrounded by foreign and domestic enemies) than perhaps all the preceding reigns jointly, since the time of her great predecessor king Edward III. We shall here only in general remark, that, on her now succeeding to the crown, she found the balance of power and wealth already got into the hands of the commons, or people, she prudently conducted her measures accordingly; though now and then she would exert her prerogative as far (though with more prudence) as did some of her less wise successors.

In the year 1560, the second of Elizabeth, she by her charter confirmed all former charters of privileges to the company of merchant-adventurers of England, and likewise granted them two other ample charters, viz. one in the sixth, and the other in the twenty-eighth year of her reign, in the former of which they had first the designation of Merchant-adventurers given them.

The English Russian company which had been incorporated in the first and second of Philip and Mary, anno 1554, had now the noble sanction of an act of parliament, in the eighth year of Elizabeth's reign.

Martin (afterwards sir Martin) Frobisher or Forbisher made now his first voyage for discovering a north-west passage to the East Indies. Captain Luke Fox, in his book, in quarto, entitled The North-west Fox, printed anno 1535, says, "that Mr. Forbisher was fifteen years in noting and bringing up the adventure, before he did attempt the same, which was brought to pass by the help of Ambrose Dudley, earl of Warwick." He set out with two barks, of twenty-five tons each, and one pinnace, of ten tons, and entered the streights going into the great bay (since called Hudson's Bay), which he named Forbisher's Streight; he also gave the following names to places there, viz. Queen Elizabeth's Foreland, Cape Labrador, Gabriel's Island, Prior's Sound, and sundry other islands, capes, and bays, by which names the same places are known to this day. He brought home one of the savages, and also a kind of bright stone, which being tried by the London goldsmiths, it was given out by them, that it held gold in it very richly, and are said to have promised great matters, if any quantity thereof could be obtained; which flattering hopes produced a second voyage, ten years after, although no north-west passage was found.

Mr. John Hawkins, assisted by the subscriptions of sundry gentlemen, now fitted out three ships, and having learned that Negroes were a very good commodity in Hispaniola, he sailed to the coast of Guinea, took in Negroes, and sailed with them for Hispaniola; where he sold his slaves and English commodities, and loaded his three vessels with hides, sugar, and ginger, and also many pearls, returning home anno 1563, after making a prosperous voyage. This seems to have been the very first attempt from England for establishing a Negro trade.

The English genius was not to be discouraged by former unsuccessful attempts for finding a passage to China and the East Indies, without interfering with the Portuguese by the Cape of Good Hope south-eastward, nor with the Spaniards south-westward by the Streights of Magellan: and as they had attempted in vain a passage north-eastward, there seemed now only the north-westward passage to be explored, which we have seen had been in part already attempted by Forbisher. The Portuguese and Spanish chart-makers and cosmographers were, it seems, expressly enjoined by their sovereigns, not to give any kind of light to any other nation, in this respect, because they were greatly apprehensive left, if there were any such north-west passage, it would prove a much shorter course to India and China than theirs, either by the south-east or south-west passage. For encouraging the English in this attempt, sundry treatises were published by sir Humphrey Gilbert, Mr. Richard Wilkes, &c. built mostly upon the romantic reports of certain ancient and some more modern authors, without any solid probability: yet, upon such slight grounds, and encouragement of friends, captain Forbisher made his second attempt in 1577, with one of the queen's own ships, two barks, and one hundred and forty persons, some of whom were gentlemen. He again entered the streights he had named after himself in his former attempt, where he found store of glittering stones and sand, which he had seen in his last voyage, and with which he now loaded his vessels, returning home the same year, with his imaginary treasure, which, upon farther trial proved good for nothing. However, this served to give rise to the third and last fruitless attempt, by the same sea-commander, in the ensuing year, to find out a north-west passage to China.

In the same year, 1578, Hakluyt gives us an account of the Newfoundland fishers from Europe, in the preceding year, viz. "One hundred ships from Spain, fifty from Portugal, one hundred and fifty from France, and fifteen from England: that the English had the best ships, and therefore gave law to the rest, being in the bays, and protectors of others; for which it was then, and had been of old a custom to make them some sort of acknowledgement as admirals, such as a boat-load of salt for guarding them from pirates and other violent invaders, who frequently drove them from a good harbour," &c. He says, "the fishery of the English at Iceland was the reason that we had not then such numbers of ships at Newfoundland; that the Spaniards, next to the English, had the best ships there; that there were then also twenty or thirty ships from Biscay, to kill whales, for train-oil." (But here is no mention as yet of whale-fins, or whale-bone, of so great value in our days (which shews its use for women's stays, &c. was not then known.) His friend, in a letter from Newfoundland, is earnest for the English to settle at the island of Cape Breton, for the benefit of the fishery, and in another isle in the mouth of the great river of St. Laurence. Hakluyt was in those times a most indefatigable enquirer after new trades and discoveries, and was undoubtedly of great use to our adventurers, by giving them much light into the nature and means of discoveries, and seems to have been a public blessing to England in those days.

We have, in the former part of the history of this reign, given an account of the circumnavigation of the terraqueous globe by sir Francis Drake, and therefore have no occasion to recapitulate the particulars of that transaction in this place; we shall therefore proceed to give a short account of the first establishment of, and charter granted to, the English Turkey company.

Queen Elizabeth having settled preliminaries at Constantinople, two years before, for her subjects to trade to Turkey, she now (viz. anno 1581) judged it reasonable to incorporate a number of eminent merchants for that end, sir Edward Osborn, an alderman of London, Thomas Smith, esq. Richard Staper, and William Garrett, merchants; in which charter of corporation the queen sets forth, "that the said sir Edward Osborn and Richard Staper, had, at their own great costs and charges, found out and opened a trade to Turkey, not heretofore, in the memory of any man living, known to be commonly used and frequented, by way of merchandize, by any merchants or other subjects of us or our progenitors, whereby many good offices may be done for the peace of Christendom; relief of Christian slaves, and good vent of the commodities of the realm, to the advancement of her honour and dignity, the increase of her revenue, and of the general wealth of the realm: her majesty therefore grants unto those four merchants, their executors and administrators, and to such Englishmen (not exceeding twelve in number) as the said sir Edward Osborn and Richard Staper shall appoint to be joined to them and the other two before-named persons, and their factors, servants, or deputies, for the space of seven years to trade to Turkey, in such manner as the said company shall agree between themselves. During which time, they may make bye-laws for their good government (not repugnant to the laws of the kingdom.) Nothing to be transacted without the consent of the governor for the time being (sir Edward Osborn being hereby appointed the first governor): the trade to Turkey to be solely to them, their factors and servants, during the said term: and any other subjects trading thither, either by sea or land, without this company's licence, to forfeit ships and goods; a moiety to the crown, the other moiety to this company. For the last six of the said seven years, this company shall export so much goods to Turkey as shall annually pay at least five hundred pounds custom to the crown (except in case of ship wreck, &c.) I. Proviso, that in case this exclusive grant shall hereafter appear to be inconvenient, the queen may revoke the same, upon one year's previous notice. II. Proviso, the queen, during the said term, may nominate two persons to be added to the said number of patentees, with the same privileges, &c. as the rest herein named. Lastly, that if, at the end of the said seven years these grantees desire it, the queen will grant other seven years to them, provided (as aforesaid) the said exclusive trade shall not appear to be unprofitable to the kingdom."

The queen's letters to the grand signor were received with much civility, being delivered to him by her ambassador, Hareborne, anno 1582, whom she empowered to settle consuls in the several ports, and to establish laws or rules to be observed by the English trading to Turkey.

With the first factor the indefatigable Hakluyt (vol. iii. p. 164, 165) sent excellent instructions for enquiring into the nature of dyeing stuffs; also what of those drugs might be produced in England; and how beneficial such new productions would have been to us, which he instances in that of saffron, first brought into England by a pilgrim; as also woad, originally from Thoulouse, in Languedoc: "that the damask-rose was first brought into England by Dr. Linacre, physician to king Henry VII. and king Henry VIII. Turkey fowls, about fifty years past (viz. about 1532): the artichoke in king Henry VIII's time; and of later times the musk-rose and several sorts of plums, by lord Cromwell, out of Italy: the apricot by king Henry VIII's French gardiner: (but there is no mentioned yet of peaches, nor of nectarines).

And now, within these four years (anno 1578) have been brought into England from Vienna, in Austria, divers kinds of flowers called tulips, and others procured thither a little before from Constantinople. And it is said, that since we traded to Zante (this must have been but lately), the plant that beareth the currant is also brought into this realm; and although it brings not fruit to perfection, yet it may serve for pleasure and for some use. (This shews it was then but just introduced.) Many other things have been brought in, that have degenerated by reason of the coldness of the climate: some things brought in, have, through negligence, been long lost; and archbishop Grindal brought the tamarisk plant from Germany, and many people have received great health by this plant."

On the commencement of the English trade to Turkey, the merchants having occasion to attend the queen and council, they had there great thanks and commendations for the ships they then built of so great burthen, with many encouragements to pursue the plan, for the kingdom's sake, says the author of Trade's Increase, who adds, that the ordinary returns of this trade, at the beginning, were three for one.

By England's entering at this time into a direct trade to Turkey, all the commodities of Greece, Syria, Egypt, Persia, and India, came home to us much cheaper. "And (says sir William Monson) when the Venetians served us with those rich eastern wares, by the way of the Red Sea, and down the Nile to Alexandria, and also by the way of caravans to Aleppo, they (i. e. the Venetians) also were then wont to take freight in their ships from port to port, whereas now (i. e. 1685) all strangers are more desirous to employ our own ships in that service."

Jacobs, in his Lex Mercatoria, alleges (upon what authority I know not), that the Barbary merchants were incorporated in king Henry VII's time; but that company decaying, out of their ruins arose the Levant or Turkey company, who first trading with Venice, and then with Turkey, furnished England that way with East Indian commodities, which till then were brought to us (mostly) by land, and to the Portuguese alone by long sea," &c.

The same year, 1582, the ship Susan, of London, mounting thirty-four guns, carried over to Turkey the English ambassador, Hareborn, who now first settled peace with Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, which piratical states had taken many ships belonging to London, Bristol, &c. and Hareborn having established all the English factories in Turkey (maugre the spite and malice of the French and Venetians) returned over-land to England.

Sir Walter Raleigh, whose great genius much inclining him to new enterprizes and discoveries, had this year formed a society of gentlemen and merchants to subscribe a considerable sum of money towards forming a settlement on the continent of North America, and on Lady-day, 1584, queen Elizabeth granted them a charter for that purpose. Amidas and Barlow, with two vessels, were accordingly sent thither: but they sailed about a thousand leagues out of their way; for the short course to the northern parts of America not being as yet known to us, they steered the wonted course of the Spaniards, by the Canary Islands, and thence into the trade-winds to the Caribbee Islands, thence sailing through the Gulph of Florida, they anchored at a part of what is now called Virginia, where, making some insignificant trade with the natives, exchanging toys for their furs, they returned home with gain (as they said), and greatly magnified the richness of the country. For encouraging a second adventure, they brought home some pearls and tobacco (the first of that sort that had been seen in England.) The wise queen seemed fond of this design, and either she herself, or sir Walter Raleigh, gave the country the name of Virginia, which they judiciously represented to be a pleasant country, abounding in fine woods, deer, hares, wild fowl, fish, vines, currants, &c.

Raleigh therefore obtained queen Elizabeth's patent to himself, &c. for the possessing such remote heathen lands, not then inhabited by Christians, as they should discover for six years, of which they thereby had the property granted to them for ever, reserving to the crown the fifth part of all gold and silver ore found therein, with power to seize to their proper use all ships, with their merchandize, that shall, without leave, plant within two hundred leagues of this intended settlement, excepting, however, the queen's subjects and allies, fishing at Newfoundland, &c. She also grants free denization to the planters and their posterity residing there: powers are also granted to the patentees for making bye-laws there, not repugnant to those of England.

It is observable, that in this, and some other patents of those times, there were no distinct place, longitude, or latitude, fixed or limited for such plantation, although undoubtedly North America was the country intended.

In the next year, 1585, captain John Davis, with two barks from Dartmouth, first sailed into the streights since called by his name, in the country called Old Greenland, and returned home the same year, as all others have done, without making any useful discovery. At this time we find they knew the use of somewhat like the harpoon, with which they killed a porpoise; but though many whales fell in their way, they knew not yet the right method of killing them.

This same year the gallant sir Richard Grenville sailed for Virginia by the old round-about course, above described, with seven ships, laden with arms, ammunition, and provisions, and with settlers for planting a colony. He began with planting at Roanoke Island, lying about five leagues from the continent, in eighty-six degrees north latitude. There he left one hundred and eight men: it is a truly melancholy consideration, that those poor creatures were left to shift for themselves in so wild a country, for above a year; who, so eager to discover gold and silver mines (now never like to be found there), whilst they neglected to prepare their provisions in due season, and going up the country in quest of those mines (for golden dreams were then universal), most of them were either destroyed by the natives, or perished for want; and the few who survived were taken up by sir Francis Drake, coming now again upon the coast from harrassing the Spanish West Indies, who took them all home with him, even although they had sown corn there, which was very near ripe, sufficient for two years sustenance; sustenance; and they were but just gone, when a ship, fitted out at the sole expence of sir Walter Raleigh, arrived there with all sorts of conveniences, as did sir Richard Grenville soon after, with three other ships, bringing a farther supply: but finding the places quite desolate where the English planters had settled, they all returned home. In those accounts there appears to be some confusion, with respect as well to the identical year, as to the names of persons engaged therein, which is owing to the inaccuracy of writers and transcribers in those days, which, however is of very little consequence at present.

Sir Walter Raleigh had his mind so intensely set upon a plantation in North America, that he again sent out three ships, with an hundred and fifty persons of both sexes. These planters Raleigh's superintendant settled in the isle of Roanoke, where he found the second colony had been destroyed by the natives. Here he rebuilt the fort and houses, calling it the city of Raleigh in Virginia: he left one hundred and fifteen men in this new settlement, and returned home, where he remained three years before he could obtain the necessary supplies, which he had promised to bring in the year after he had left the colony, where he arrived in 1590, with these supplies both of men and stores, in three ships. It seems, such of the colony as had remained alive had removed to a place on the continent called Croatoan, that word being carved upon the trees; to this place they intended to sail in search of the colony, but a storm unfortunately arising, the ships lost their anchors and cables, and provisions also failing, they agreed to return home, leaving that miserable colony to perish, to the shame of that age; for although Raleigh was in trouble about this time, yet surely the queen and nation ought to have shewn some compassion to the poor people left in a wilderness amongst savages.

Thus was this scheme of a plantation in Virginia quite laid aside during all the rest of queen Elizabeth's reign, and all the great expence of Raleigh and the other adventurers utterly thrown away, besides the loss of many mens lives.

It was in the year 1591 that the first voyage from England to East India was undertaken with three ships; but it was rather a privateering adventure, than a proper mercantile voyage, for they took several ships in their way to India. They had lost so many men by sickness near the cape of Good Hope, that they were obliged to send one of their ships home, and proceeded with only two to India: moreover, in a storm beyond the Cape they lost company with captain Raymond in the principal ship, which was never heard of more; so that only captain Lancaster's ship arrived in India, which also met with many grievous misfortunes; and, on her return, sailing to the West Indies, whilst the captain and the rest of the men went on shore to seek provisions on an uninhabited island, six of the sailors ran away with the ship; and at the end of three years this unfortunate officer was brought home, several of his men having perished for want at that place.

Some English ships now made a voyage to Cape Breton, at the entrance of the Bay of St. Laurence, in North America, some for morse-fishing and others for whale-fishing (says Hakluyt), which is the first mention we find of the latter fishery by any English; and although they met with no whales there, they found on an island eight hundred whale-fins, where a Biscay ship had been lost three years before. This too is the first mention of whale fins or whale-bone by the English. How the ladies stays were made before this commodious material in them was discovered, does not appear; probably slit pieces of cane, or of some other tough and pliant wood, might have been in use before.

By the trade to Archangel the English became well acquainted with the northern seas at this time, where also they at first carried on a great fishing, or hunting rather, for morse (as the Russians call them, the English call them sea-horses, and the Dutch and French, sea-cows) on Cherry Island, beyond the North Cape, so called from alderman Cherry, but called by the Dutch Bear Island: but it seems those amphibious animals became so shy, that the moment they saw any man, they ran into the sea. The English thereupon fell into the whale-fishery, though not quite so early as this time.

Grotius tells us, that the Hollanders, about this time built two thousand ships every year; a thing almost incredible, considering their new existence as an independent state, did it not proceed from so illustrious and respectable an author, and their own countryman.

Our own Turkey merchants first, and the Dutch East India company next (for they had got the start of us in the East India trade) keeping up the price of pepper and other spices to a high rate, we being at war with Spain, and so could not get spices from Lisbon at first-hand, queen Elizabeth now determined to enter her people directly on a commerce to East India.

Accordingly, on the thirty-first of December, 1600, she granted a charter to George, earl of Cumberland, and two hundred and fifteen knights, aldermen, and merchants, "that, at their own costs and charges they may set forth one or more voyages to the East Indians, in the countries and parts of Asia and Africa, and to the islands thereabout, divers of which countries, islands, &c. have long since been discovered by others of our subjects; to be one body politic and corporate, by the name of the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the East Indies: to have succession: to purchase lands (without limitation): to have one governor, and twenty-four persons, to be elected annually, who shall be called Committees, jointly to have the direction of the voyages, the provision of the shipping, and the management of all other things belonging to the said company. Sir Thomas Smith, alderman of London, was to be the first governor: and a deputy-governor to be elected in a general court: both the governors, and all the committees to take the oath of fidelity; as also every member shall take an oath, before being admitted to traffic as a freeman of this company. The company, their sons (at twenty-one years of age), their apprentices, servants, and factors, in India or elsewhere, may, for fifteen years, from Christmas last, freely and solely trade (by such ways and passages as are already found out, or which shall hereafter be discovered) into the countries and ports of Asia and Africa, and into and from all the islands, ports, towns, and places of Asia, Africa, and America, or any of them, beyond Cape Bona Esperanza to the Streights of Magellan, where any traffic of merchandize may may be used, and to and from every of them, in such manner as shall from time to time be limited and agreed on, at any general court of the company; any statute, usage, diversity of religion or faith, or any other matter to the contrary notwithstanding, so as it be not any country already possessed by any Christian potentate in amity with her majesty, who shall declare the same to be against his or their good liking. Either the governor or deputy governor must always be one in the general assemblies, when they may make all reasonable constitutions, &c. agreeable to the laws of England, for their good government, by plurality of voices; and may punish, by fines and imprisonment, the offenders against their laws. The queen grants the company an exemption from paying any customs for the first four voyages; and for the customs which shall afterwards be payable for merchandize from India, the company shall be allowed to give their bonds, payable one half in six months and the other half in six months after: for merchandize lost at sea, outward-bound, the customs shall be allowed to the company out of the next cargo shipped off. Indian merchandize that shall have paid the customs, may, at the end of thirteen months, be re-exported by any subjects, without paying for their customs. The company may export, in their first voyage, now preparing, thirty thousand pounds in foreign coin, or bullion, so that at least six thousand pounds thereof be first coined in the queen's mint; and the like for the subsequent voyages; provided the company first import at least so much foreign coin or bullion, in gold or silver, into this realm, of which six thousand pounds shall be coined as aforesaid. The company may send yearly to East India six good ships and six pinnaces, with five hundred mariners, unless the navy-royal goes forth. None of the queen's subjects, but the company, their servants, or assigns, shall resort to India, without being licenced by the company, upon pain of forfeiting ships and cargoes, with imprisonment till the offenders give one thousand pounds bond to the company not to trade thither again. Nevertheless, for the encouragement of merchants strangers, and others, to bring in commodities to the realm, the queen gives power to the company to grant licences to trade to East India; and she promises not to grant leave to any others to trade thither, during the company's term, without their consent. The majority of any general meeting of the company may admit apprentices, servants, factors, &c. to the fellowship or freedom of the said company. The silver to be exported shall only be shipped at the ports of London, Dartmouth, and Plymouth, and shall be duly entered by the custom-house officers, without paying any custom for the same. Gold and silver, imported by the company, shall be entered before the landing of the same. Provided, that, in case this charter shall hereafter appear not to be profitable to the crown and realm, then, upon two years notice to the company, their charter shall cease and determine: but if otherwise, then the queen promises, at the end of the said fifteen years, upon the company's suit, to grant them a new charter for fifteen years longer."

This is the very same East India company which, through many various vicissitudes, existed under the same denomination until the year 1708, when it was absorbed by the present United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies. The original shares subscribed were fifty pounds each.

To close this account of the rise and first proceedings of our East India company, we shall remark, that the company's ships in their homeward bound passage took possession of the island of St. Helena, then uninhabited; though, according to the custom of the Portuguese, well stocked with goats, hogs, and poultry, that they might be supplied therewith when obliged at any time to stop there. Here our East India company planted and fortified, and held it till the year 1673; as will be shewn in the course of this history. This island is all a high rock, whose surface is covered with about twelve inches of earth. As the winds blow constantly at south-east, from the Cape of Good Hope to this island (which is about twenty-two miles in circuit), it is sailed in about three weeks, without handling the sails, and the moderate gale renders the voyage very pleasant. On the contrary, it is extremely difficult to find this island in sailing from Europe, because of the said constant south-east wind; for which reason, when a ship is sent from England thither, they are obliged to sail directly to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence take their course to St. Helena, as already described. The great and only benefit our shipping receive from this island, is the fresh water and provisions they there meet with in their return from India, whereby above two hundred families are there supported and employed.

The very last day of the XVIth century having thus given birth and form to the first English East India company, the members thereof immediately raised seventy-two thousand pounds, though not in one joint-stock, or common capital, as in succeeding times, there having been no joint-stock in this company till the year 1613. They this year, 1601, sent out their first fleet for India, commanded in chief by captain James Lancaster, having one ship of six hundred tons, one of three hundred tons, two of two hundred each, and one of one hundred and thirty, as victualler to the whole fleet, carrying four hundred and eighty men and twenty seven thousand pounds in money and goods, the remainder of the said seventy-two thousand pounds being entirely expended in the purchase of those ships, and for artillery, ammunition, provisions, &c. But queen Elizabeth did not live to see the return of this voyage. At Acheen, in the island of Sumatra, they loaded pepper for some of their ships, but not meeting with a sufficiency, and sailing from thence for the Straights of Malacca, they completed their lading by the capture of a Portuguese ship of nine hundred tons, laden with calicoes and other goods. Sailing thence to Bantam, they delivered queen Elizabeth's letter and presents to the king, as they had before done to the king of Acheen; and from both those kings they received letters and presents for queen Elizabeth; they also obtained privileges for the company from those monarchs. Having settled factories at Bantam, they sailed homewards, and arrived in the Downs in September, 1603, having prosperously made their first voyage in two years and seven months.

In the year 1601, we have a statute of the forty-third of queen Elizabeth (cap. xii.) for awarding commissioners to hear and determine policies of assurances made among merchants, in the preamble of

of which statute are the following words: "Whereas it hath been, time out of mind, an usage amongst merchants, both of this realm and of foreign nations, when they make any great adventure (especially into remote parts, to give some consideration of money to other persons (which is commonly in no small number) to have from them assurance made of their goods, merchandizes, ships, and things adventured, or some parts thereof, at such rates, and in such sort as the party assurers and party assured can agree, which course of dealing is commonly termed a Policy of Assurance; by means of which it cometh to pass, upon the loss or perishing of any ship, there followeth not the undoing of any man, but the loss lighteth rather easily upon many, than heavily upon few, and rather upon them that adventure not, than upon those that adventure; whereby all merchants, especially of the younger sort, are allured to venture more willingly, and more freely: and whereas heretofore such assurers have used to stand so justly and precisely on their credit, as few or no controversies have arisen thereupon; and if any have grown, the same have, from time to time, been ended and ordered by certain grave and discreet merchants, appointed by the lord-mayor of London; until of late years, that divers persons have withdrawn themselves from that arbitrary course, and have sought to draw the parties assured to seek their moneys in her majesty's courts, to their great charges and delay. For remedy whereof, it is now enacted, that the lord-chancellor (or keeper) do award one general or standing yearly commission for the determining of causes on policies of assurance, such as now are, or hereafter shall be entered within the office of assurance within the city of London, this commission to consist of the judge of the admiralty, the recorder of London; two doctors of the civil law, two common lawyers, and eight discreet merchants, or to any five of them: which commission shall have authority to determine all causes concerning policies of assurance, in a summary way; who shall summon the parties, examine witnesses upon oath, and imprison disobeyers of their decrees. They shall meet weekly at the office of assurance, on the west side of the Royal Exchange, for the execution of their commission, without fee or reward. And any such as may think themselves aggrieved by their determinations, may, in two months, exhibit his bill in Chancery, for a re-examination of such decree; provided the complainant do first lay down to the said commissioners the sum awarded; and that the lord-chancellor, or keeper, may either reverse or confirm the first decree, according to equity. Lastly, no commissioner shall be an assurer, or assured."

This law sufficiently demonstrates, that at this time there was a great increase of foreign commerce in England.

Assurance, or insurance, of ships and merchandize on the seas, is of great antiquity, even as far back as the reign of the emperor Claudius Cæsar.

The sea-laws of Oleron, as far back as the year 1194, treat of it.

It seems to have been in use in England upon the revival of commerce, somewhat earlier than on the continent; and Antwerp, though in its meridian glory, learned it from England: "whereas (says Molineux's Lex Mercatoria, the meetings of merchants in London were held in Lombard-street (so called because certain nations of Lombardy kept there a pawn-house, or Lombard, long before the Royal Exchange was built), all the policies of assurance at Antwerp, which then were, and now (1622) yet are made, do make mention, that it shall be in all things concerning the said assurances, as was accustomed to be done in Lombard-street in London; which is imitated also in other places of the Low Countries."

As the gradual increase of the suburbs of London does in great measure keep pace with the gradual increase of the general commerce of England, and as it is, moreover, a curious and entertaining part of history, to mark the gradual advances of both, I therefore have no need of an apology for laying before my readers whatever falls in my way of that kind, during the period now before us.

We find by an act of the fourteenth and fifteenth of Henry VIII. (cap. ii.) for limiting foreign artificers as to their journeymen and apprentices, that the jurisdiction of the London corporations was to extend two miles from the city, viz. within the town of Westminster, the parish of St. Martin in the Fields, and of Our Lady in the Strand, St. Clement Danes without Temple-bar, St. Giles in the Fields, St. Andrew in Holborn, the town and borough of Southwark, Shoreditch, White-chapel parish, St. John's street (i. e. Clerkenwell), and Clerkenwell parish, St. Botolph without Aldgate, St. Catherine's (near the Tower of London), and Bermondsey-street." This is an authentic view of the several suburbs of London in the year 1524. Nevertheless we are not to imagine that all those suburbs were contiguous to each other, or joined, as at present to the great contiguity; for there were then, and long after, sundry large breaks, or interruptions, where no buildings were; not only the street (now so well built) called the Strand, then chiefly taken up with the capital dwellings of the nobility, with their large adjoining gardens, but also a great part of St. Martin's parish, were still literally in the Fields: the like may be said of St. Giles in the Fields (then styled the town of St. Giles), and of the upper part of St. Andrew's in Holborn, much of all which, and also of Westminster, Clerkenwell, Shoreditch, White-chapel, and Southwark, was literally Fields, even so late as the reign of queen Elizabeth, as appears by a map of London and its suburbs, still extant, first published in the year 1560.

By a statute 24 Henry VIII. the streetway between Charing-cross and Strand-cross (i. e. that is near where Somerset-house is now situated) in the suburbs of London, was directed "to be sufficiently paved and maintained, at the charge of the owners of the land adjoining." This shews that the Strand was not yet built into a continued street.

In the following year, 1534, the high-street between Holborn-bridge and Holborn-bars, at the west end thereof, was directed to be paved; as were also the streets of Southwark; and that every one should maintain the said pavements before his own ground, or forfeit to the king six pence for every yard square.

In the thirty-second of the said king's reign, viz. anno 1541, the following streets or ways in London were ordered to be paved, viz. 1. The street leading from Aldgate to White-chapel church: 2. the upper part of the lane called Chancery-lane: 3.

the way leading from Holborn-bars, westward, towards St. Giles in the Fields, as far as any habitation is on both sides of the said street: 4. Gray's Inn lane: 5. Shoe-lane: and, 6. Fetter, now called Fetter-lane; the two last being thoroughfares and passages from Fleet-street into Holborn." The part of Chancery-lane now to be paved is thus described, viz. "from the bars beside the Rolls, lately set up by the lord privy-seal, into the said highway in Holborn." These passages shew the age of the Rolls-office in Chancery-lane; and also that all Holborn, above the city-bars, remained unpaved till now; nor was it at this time all built on both sides (nor a considerable time later) as appears by the map before mentioned, drawn in queen Elizabeth's reign: all these six ways now directed to be paved, are therein described as "very foul, and full of pits and sloughs, very perilous and noxious (noisome) as well for all the king's subjects on horseback as on foot and with carriages." Yet three of these, viz. Shoe-lane, Fetter-lane, and Chancery-lane, are now in the very center of the present immense contiguity; and all the rest are likewise well built and inhabited. So vast is the increase and improvement of London since those times. By a statute of 34 and 35 Henry VIII. cap. xii. the streets named White-cross-street, Chiswel-street leading from White-cross-street into the highway leading to Moor-gate; the lane called Golding-lane, and street called Grub-street, in the parish of St. Giles without Cripple-gate; the street called Goswell-street, in the parish of St. Botolph without Aldersgate; Long-lane, in the parish of St. Botolph aforesaid and of St. Sepulchre without Newgate; the street called St. John's-street, leading from the Bars of Smithfield up to the Pound at the corner of the wall extending along the high way to Islington; and also the street leading from the said Bars to Cow-cross: the lane called Water-lane, in Fleet-street, leading down to the Thames; the way leading without Temple-bar, westward, by and unto St. Clement's Inn gates and New Inn gates to Drury-place, in the county of Middlesex (this shews that this way was not built on); and also one little lane stretching from the said way to the sign of the Bell at Drury-lane end; and the common way leading through a certain place called Petit France, from the bars at the west end of Tottenham-street, Westminster, unto the uttermost part of the west end of the said place called Petit France: the street or highway leading from Bishopsgate-street to and above Shoreditch-church; and the bridge called Strand-bridge, and the way leading from the said bridge towards Temple-bar, and the lane called Foskue-lane from the garden and tenement of the bishop of Lichfield, and the garden and tenement called the Bell and Proctors, down to Strand-bridge (those names are now unknown), be very foul and full of pits and sloughs, very perilous and noxious, and very necessary to be kept clear, for the avoiding of corrupt favours, and avoiding of pestilence: for the amendment and reformation whereof, all who have any lands or tenements adjoining to the aforesaid streets, lanes, and ways, unto the midst of them, in length and breadth as his land and tenement do lie or extend, in like manner and form as the streets in the city of London be paved, with causeys or channels in the midst of the same streets, and shall yearly maintain the same."

James Howel, in his Londinopolis, published in folio, anno 1657, gives us many particulars of the vast increase of the suburbs of London towards the close of queen Elizabeth's reign, which more plainly points out the vast increase of England's commerce, than a whole volume of speculative reasoning could do alone. It was not material to make different sections thereof, and therefore we have brought them altogether, whether a little before or after this year.

"It seems, that about this time the ground called Spital-fields, began gradually to be built upon for weavers; as had also Hog-lane, in that part which had (within sixty years from the date of his said book) had fair rows of elm-trees all along, now turned into houses on both sides, from Hound-ditch to White-chapel church.

"As to Wapping (says Howel), it is yet within the memory of man, that there was never a house from St. Catherine's to Wapping: but now (i. e. anno 1657) there is a continued street towards a mile from the Tower, all along the river, almost as far as Radcliffe; which proceeded from the increase of navigation, mariners, and traffick." This shews that Wapping was originally a village, or place detached from London, though now part of the great contiguity thereof. "Radcliffe also (continues he) is much increased in buildings, and also Nightingale-lane.

"Northward, London's suburbs have been less increased than on the east and west sides; yet there was an increase, about this time, on that side also. Where the buildings on the west side of Smithfield stand, was formerly a very large pond of water; and where the place called the Sheep-pens is, was a field with growing elms, and the place of execution for criminals. Afterwards (in king Henry VI's reign) they began to build the space between the said pond and river of Wells (now Turnmill-brook) which runs into Fleet-ditch; and afterwards that pond was drained, and built upon, and so down that street now called Cow-lane; and also Chick-lane and Hosier-lane, &c. So that the buildings there are so increased, that now remaineth not one tree there."

Some other additions were made about Clerkenwell, about or near this time, where the fields, gardens, and avenues of the great priory of St. John of Jerusalem, and also the convent on the north side of Clerkenwell-green, stood.

Westward, without Newgate, the great street named Holborn, and its contiguity, have been gradually built quite up to the village of St. Giles in the Fields: but as the greatest increase thereabout was chiefly in the next century, we must refer thereto.

From the year 1512, the fourth of Henry VIII. we may properly date the commencement of what may be called an English royal navy. i. e. a number of stout ships of war, actually belonging to, and permanently kept on foot by, the English crown, for national defence, king Henry VIII. being the first English monarch who effectually pursued this plan, and for that end established a royal navy-office, with commissioners, &c. nearly as at present. He must indeed be allowed (amidst all his wild dissipations) to have employed great sums of money on his marine affairs, as well for the construction of ships for war, as of dock-yards, wharfs, store-houses, &c. Before his time there was no fixed permanent manent royal navy; but, on ordinary occasions, the Cinque Ports (as already fully seen) supplied the crown with a determined number of sorry ships as they had in those old times; and on great emergencies we also have seen that all the maritime towns of the kingdom were bound, or reasonable notice to send their quota of ships and mariners, for a determined time; commanded either by the king or his admiral; such as was the fleet of king Edward III. at the siege of Calais, anno 1347, and other capital expeditions.

Moreover (bishop Gibson, in his Additions to Camden's Britannia) observes that king Henry VIII. in the said fourth year of his reign, for the advancement and benefit of navigation and commerce, erected a corporation for the business of examining, licencing, and regulating of pilots; for ordering and erecting of beacons, light-houses, buoys, &c. which is styled the Corporation of the Trinity-house of Deptford Strand, and has proved of great benefit for accomplishing the ends of its founder. Another society, for the like good purposes, he also erected at Hull, by the name of the Trinity-house at Hull; and also another at Newcastle upon Tyne (anno 1537): "Which three establishments (says Hakluyt) were in imitation of that which the emperor Charles V. had erected at Seville, in Spain; who, observing the many shipwrecks in voyages to and from the West Indies, occasioned by the ignorance of seamen, established, at the Contraction-house, lectures upon navigation; and a pilot major, for the examination of other pilots and mariners: he also directed books to be published on that subject, for the use of his mariners." The king, by his charter, confirmed to the Deptford Trinity-house society, all the ancient rights, privileges, &c. of the shipmen and mariners of England, and their several possessions at Deptford: whereby it appears plainly, that they had been a society long before, though nowhere recorded how long. This corporation (whose powers, &c. have been since confirmed and augmented by succeeding kings) have also the power of appointing pilots for the king's ships, and for examining and fixing their wages, and certifying their qualifications, and those of the masters of the ships of war; also of clearing and deepening the Thames by ballast hoys, with which ballast they supply the shipping. They have also the examination of the forty mathematical boys of Christ's Hospital. They have likewise power to hear and determine complaints of officers and sailors in the merchants service: so that this corporation more especially is eminently of great utility to the nation.

Henry also made Deptford, near London, a magazine to the royal navy, which has gradually increased to the flourishing state we now see it in. And, considering how far the river of Thames was exposed to insults from foreign enemies, he caused a fortification to be erected at Gravesend, and another opposite to it on the Essex shore, where Tilbury fort now stands. And having lost his fine ship Regent, of one thousand tons, he caused another to be built; such a one (says Hall) as had never been seen in England, and named it the Henry Grace de Dieu.

We have in a treaty of peace between Henry VIII. and Lewis XII. of France, made anno 1514, a recital of implements for a naval war, such as cannon, gunpowder, stones (for they had not yet the use of iron bullets), darts, &c. And in the same year the Chronicon Pretiosum makes a master shipwright's daily pay, with his diet, five pence, and without diet seven pence per diem; an hewer, with diet four pence, without diet six pence; and an able clencher the same. Note, that living was then twice as cheap as in our days.

In the year 1523, according to lord Herbert's History of Henry VIII. in the attempts of the English and French courts to gain Scotland to their respective interests, at the death of king James V. the English ministers, among other arguments, asserted "that the English were masters of the seas, and thereby were able to stop and interclude all succour that should come to them (the Scots) from any other place." And as in the replication of the partizans of France that assertion is not contradicted, the point seems to have been admitted.

The reigns of Edward VI. and Mary furnish no improvements in navigation worthy our notice; but Elizabeth, very early in her reign, put naval affairs upon a better footing than they had been under her predecessor, both by building some ships of her own, and by encouraging the merchants to build large trading vessels, which on occasion, were converted into ships of war. In 1582, the seamen of England were computed at fourteen thousand two hundred and ninety-five, and the number of vessels twelve-hundred and thirty-two, of which there were not above two hundred and seventeen above eighty tons. Monson computes that, though the navigation decreased in the first year of James I. by the practices of the merchants, who carried on their trade in foreign bottoms, yet before 1640, the number of seamen was treble in England.

The navy which the queen left at her decease appears considerable, when we consider only the number of vessels, which were forty-two; but when we reflect, that none of these ships carried above forty guns, that four only came up to that number, that there were but two ships of a thousand tons, and twenty-three below five hundred, some of fifty, and some even of twenty tons; that the whole number of guns belonging to the fleet were seven hundred and seventy-four; we must entertain a very contemptible idea of the English navy, compared with the force it hath now attained. In the year 1588 there were not above five vessels equipped by the noblemen and sea-ports, which exceeded two hundred tons.

In this famous year (1588) what is called the Chest at Chatham was first erected, being a contribution for the benefit and relief of maimed and superannuated English mariners (out of which pensions are paid to such for their lives) by the advice of sir Francis Drake, sir John Hawkins, &c. It was first only a voluntary monthly contribution of the mariners out of their pay, for the succour of their then wounded brethren, but was afterwards made perpetual by queen Elizabeth. By an act of the rump-parliament, anno 1649 (cap. xxiv.) for abolishing deans and chapters, and of their lands, we find this chest had been usually kept at what is called the Hill House, at Chatham, which, with its gardens, &c. belonged to the dean and chapter of Rochester. Until the foundation of Greenwich hospital by king William III. this was the only charity of that kind for distressed sailors.

PUBLIC REVENUE.

It is difficult to compute exactly queen Elizabeth's ordinary revenue, but it certainly fell much short of five thousand pounds a year. In 1590 she raised the customs from fourteen thousand pounds a year to fifty thousand pounds, and obliged sir Thomas Smith, who had farmed them, to refund some of his former profits. This improvement of the revenue was owing to the suggestions of one Caemarden, and was extremely opposed by Burleigh, Leicester, and Walsingham: but the queen's perseverance overcame all their opposition. The great undertakings which she executed with so narrow a revenue, and with such small supplies from her people, prove the mighty effects of prudence and œconomy. She received from the parliament, during her whole reign, only twenty subsidies and thirty-nine fifteenths. It is not easy to compute the amount of those supplies, because the value of a subsidy was continually falling; and in the end of her reign it amounted only to eighty thousand pounds, which in the beginning had been an hundred and twenty thousand. If we suppose that the whole supplies granted to Elizabeth, during a reign of forty-five years, amounted to three millions, we shall not probably be much wide of the truth. This sum makes only sixty-six thousand six hundred and sixty-six pounds a year; and it is supprising that while the queen's demands were so moderate, and her expences so well regulated, she should ever have found any difficulty of getting a supply from the parliament, or be reduced to make sale of the crown-lands: but such was the extreme, I had almost said absurd, parsimony of the parliaments during that period; they valued nothing in comparison of their money. The members had no connection with the court, and the very idea which they conceived of the trust committed to them, was to refuse the demands of the crown, and to grant as few supplies as possible. The crown, on the other hand, considered the parliament in no other light than a means of supply. Queen Elizabeth made a merit to her people of seldom assembling parliaments: no redress of grievances was expected from these assemblies; they were supposed to meet for no other purpose than to impose taxes.

Before queen Elizabeth's reign, the English princes had always recourse to the city of Antwerp for voluntary loans; and their credit was so low, that besides the exorbitant interest of ten or twelve per cent. they were obliged to make the city of London join in the security. Sir Thomas Gresham, that great and enterprizing merchant, one of the chief ornaments of this reign, engaged the company of Merchant-adventurers to grant the queen a loan; and as the money was regularly paid, her credit by degrees established itself in the city, and she shook off this dependence on foreigners.

In 1559, the queen employed Gresham to borrow two hundred thousand pounds at Antwerp, in order to enable her to reform the coinage, which was at that time extremely debased. She was so impolitic as to make herself an innovation in the coin, by dividing a pound of silver into sixty-two shillings, instead of sixty, the former standard. This is the last time that the coin has been tampered with in England.

The splendor of a court was, during this age, a great part of the public charge; and as Elizabeth was a single woman, and expensive in no species of magnificence, except cloaths, this circumstance enabled her to perform great things by her narrow revenue. She is said to have paid four millions of debt left on the crown by her father, brother, and sister; an incredible sum for that age*. The states of the United Provinces, at the time of her decease, owed her about eight hundred thousand pounds; and the king of France four hundred and fifty thousand: though that prince was extremely frugal, and, after the peace of Vervins, was continually amassing treasure, the queen never could, by the most pressing remonstrances, prevail on him to make payment of those sums which she had so generously advanced him during his greatest distresses; one payment of twenty thousand crowns, and another of fifty thousand, were all she could obtain by the strongest representations she could make of the difficulties to which the rebellion in Ireland had reduced her. The queen expended in the war with Spain, between the years 1589 and 1593, the sum of one million three hundred thousand pounds, besides the double subsidy, amounting to two hundred and eighty thousand pounds, granted to her by parliament. In the year 1599, she spent six hundred thousand pounds in six months, in the service of Ireland. Sir Robert Cecil affirmed, that in the space of ten years Ireland cost her three millions four hundred thousand pounds. She made the earl of Essex a present of thirty thousand pounds, upon his departure to take upon him the government of that kingdom. Lord Burleigh computed, that the value of the gifts conferred on that favourite, amounted to three hundred thousand pounds; a proof of her strong affection to him. It was a common saying during this reign, that the queen paid bountifully, though she rewarded sparingly.

* D'Ewes, p. 473. I think it is impossible to reconcile this account of the public debts with that given by Strype, Eccles Mem. vol. ii. p. 344. that in the year 1553, the crown owed above three hundred thousand pounds. I own that this last sum appears a great deal more likely. The whole revenue of queen Elizabeth would not in ten years have paid four millions. Hume's History of the Tudors, vol. ii. p. 729.

An Historical Deduction of the VALUE of our ENGLISH SILVER and GOLD COIN, but particularly those of the former, from the CONQUEST. Extracted from Mr. Anderson, Bishop Fleetwood, and others; together with some Observations on the Present State of our SILVER MONEY.

WE shall close our remarks upon this period with a view of the state of our coinage, from the accession of William the Norman to that of Elizabeth inclusive, when the value of our money was nearly settled on the same footing as at present. This is a matter very necessary to be properly understood, for by this alone we shall be enabled to form a suitable judgment of the true rate in cheapness of provisions and all other necessities of life through their different variations and periods, the pay of artificers, labourers, soldiers, sailors, &c. a subject frequently brought into conversation, and as frequently misunderstood.

The ancient Britons, when first invaded by the Romans, had no other kind of money but iron and tin plates and rings (copper not being then, nor long after, found in our island); these might well enough answer, with barter, the purposes of the inconsiderable transactions in those rude times, when they had neither arts nor manufactures of any kind. The necessity, however, of an universal medium in commerce, which we call Money, was in much earlier times discovered in the more eastern parts of the world, and both gold and silver money were thence soon after introduced into Carthage and Greece; from Greece it was brought to Rome, and thence gradually westward into all the Roman provinces.

Silver, on account of its cleanness and moderate plenty, was, by the general consent of all civilized nations, deemed the most proper for an universal medium of commerce, though at first, and for many ages, by weight only, till at length, for greater convenience, princes and states fell upon the expedient of coins, by stamping pieces of the metal of a determined weight and fineness, to pass current by their authority.

Gold had, indeed, all the properties of silver for such a general medium, even in a higher degree; it was less diminishable by fire, more ductile, more beautiful; but its much greater scarcity, more especially in Europe, rendered it unfit for an universal medium of commerce.

On the other hand, copper, by reason of its fouler and baser nature, and its great plenty, could not be so well used in large transactions, though extremely useful in small ones.

Whilst the Romans held Britain, they coined here gold, silver, and copper; of all which coins, as well as of those brought from Rome itself, many have been dug up, in various parts of this island.

When the Saxons first conquered a part of England, in the middle of the Vth century, they were little better than savages, and probably had no sort of coins in their own country of Germany; but when they became more civilized, they coined silver money, of which some pieces are still to be found in the cabinets of the curious.

As far as certainly appears, the largest silver coin in England, not only before, but for some centuries after the Norman ingression, was denominated a Penny; which, till the reign of king Edward III. contained as much silver as about three pence of our money; and as this penny was, in their manner of coining, cut almost through cross-wise, it could with ease be divided into half-pence and farthings, or fourthlings. Thus in England, from the time of our first Norman king, William I. called the Conqueror, the silver coins were thrice the value of the modern, till the eighteenth year of king Edward III. A. D. 1344; and from thence to the time of king Henry VIII. it was not only farther lessened, but in his reign, and in the first five years of his son, Edward VI. shamefully debased; but in the last year of that hopeful young monarch its purity was restored, and its weight reduced to the state it is in at this present time. But to be more particular:

From the before-mentioned year, 1344, to the eighth year of Henry V. anno 1420, the English silver penny, on an average, weighed very near two pence half-penny of our money.

From the ninth year of Henry V. anno 1421, to the first year of Henry VIII. anno 1509, the silver penny, on an average, was worth near two pence of our modern money.

From the second year of king Henry VIII. anno 1510, to his thirty-third year, anno 1542, a pound of fine silver was coined into forty-five shillings, being three shillings and nine pence per ounce; so that their nine pence was equal to our shilling. But,

In the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth years of Henry VIII, annis 1543, 1544, the silver coin began to be debased to ten ounces of fine silver and two ounces allay per pound, troy weight, out of which pound they coined forty-eight shillings; yet still four pence of their coin was equal to five pence of our money.

But in the following year, 1545, that king suffered his silver coin to be debased so far as to six ounces fine and six ounces allay, in such sort that eight pence of their money was but equal to five pence of our's.

And in the three following years, 1546, 1547, 1548, the coin was still farther debased to four ounces fine and eight ounces allay, and they coined forty-eight shillings of this base metal in the pound; so that their shilling, or twelve pence, was worth but five pence of our modern money, whereby they made the people pay after the rate of twelve shillings for an ounce of pure silver.

In the third year of Edward VI. anno 1549, the coin was brought back to the fineness of the year 1545, viz. six ounces fine and six ounces allay, so that their eight pence (as above) was equal to our five pence.

Yet they still remained infatuated, as if foreigners as well as our own people would, in bills of exchange, and other money transactions with us, put any greater value on our said coins than they actually contained of fine silver; for out of a pound of silver of the last-named fineness, they coined seventy-two shillings in the year 1550; whereby an ounce of fine silver was valued at twelve of their shillings, as in the years 1546, 1547, and 1548.

And, most scandalously for the nation (says bishop Fleetwood, in his Chronicon Pretiosum) in the fifth year of king Edward VI. anno 1551, the silver coin was debased so low as three ounces fine and nine ounces allay; and out of a pound thereof they coined seventy-two shillings of their coin per ounce: so that twelve pence of their money was not worth three pence of our's.

In the following year, 1552, Edward's ministers at length saw this their great error: wherefore they now restored the fineness of the silver coin to eleven ounces and one penny-weight fine; and coined sixty shillings out of the pound; nearly the same as in our days.

In the first year of queen Mary, anno 1553, they coined a pound of silver into sixty shillings, and a pound of gold into thirty-six pounds in silver, being sovereigns, of thirty shillings; and angels, of ten shillings; also half-sovereigns and half-angels: and so it continued to the second year of queen Elizabeth, when that princess coined sixty shillings out of a pound of silver, of eleven ounces and two penny-weight fine; and thus it has continued till now (i. e. 1706, when the bishop wrote.) So that the variation of the value of our silver coin, from the year 1552, down to the present time, has been so inconsiderable as not to be worth regarding.

In the last year of king Edward VI. anno 1553, silver crowns, half-crowns, shillings, and six-pences, were first coined in England (excepting only some few shillings which had been coined in 1504.) "I have weighed those crowns (says bishop Fleetwood) and found them of the same weight, and much the same fineness, as our's."

In the year 1561, queen Elizabeth coined six-pences, four-pences, three-pences, two-pences, pennies, three-farthings, and half-pence, all of silver (for there were then no national copper coins.) She at the same time called in all the base coin, and set our coin on the noble footing it now stands. There have been no silver farthings coined since the thirty-sixth year of Henry VIII. which were very bad, or otherwise they must have been too small for currency.

Queen Elizabeth coined in her whole reign, viz. from 1558 to 1602, in sterling silver money,

And in base money for Ireland (of three ounces fine)

And in gold

Total of silver and gold

In king Charles the II'd's reign, when milled money came first in use amongst us, and at which time I suppose standard silver all over Europe to be at or near five shillings and two pence per ounce, it was thought necessary to encourage the subject to bring his silver to the mint, that the coinage, which before was paid for, should be free (the crown being reimbursed that expence by a duty on foreign spirits), and to bring it as near as possible to that price of five shillings and two pence per ounce, the following prices, and the following weights, were what was to be returned them in lieu.

For every twelve ounces of silver, allowed by the assay-master of the mint, to contain twelve ounces two penny weights of fine silver and eighteen penny weights of base metal (or allay) and called standard; if in sixpences, one hundred and twenty-four of one penny-weight, twenty-two grains one half, each, (abating six grains upon the whole) which is the twelve ounces, and at five shillings per ounce, comes to the same at the tale, viz. three pounds two shillings.

If in shillings, sixty-two of three penny-weights twenty-one grains each, (abating six grains upon the whole) which is the twelve ounces, and at five shillings and two pence per ounce, comes to the same at the tale, viz three pounds two shillings.

If in half crowns, they had of them, at nine penny-weights fifteen grains one half, and shillings, &c. to make them up (for no certain number will weigh the twelve ounces), in the same proportion.

If in crowns also the same, nineteen penny-weights seven grains each, and in the same proportion.

This was executing the thing in as equal a proportion as human foresight could well distribute it; for years so it continued, and our coin answered the purpose intended; but as commerce extended her wings, and as silver became a main article in one of her very extensive flights, its value increased; yet we attended not to it; we still continued, and do still, to coin silver after the above rate. A nation so great in commerce and calculation to continue this error, nothing but the characteristic we are by foreigners stamped with, of mixing the greatest absurdities with the greatest good sense, can account for it. It is very clear from the above, that five shillings and two pence per ounce is the price our silver is coined at; which silver, to melt for these thirty years, except upon very particular occasions, hath been worth from five shillings and four pence, to five shillings and nine pence, to carry to India, or to work up into utensils, and the last fifteen years nearer the latter than the former. Surely could we, from the same circumstance, get at our neighbours silver to go to the market, at five shillings and two pence, instead of five shillings and four pence, five shillings and six pence, and five and ninepence per ounce, we should not miss the opportunity; and we have the greatest reason in the world, supported by our coin's disappearing, to assert we have not.

The consideration of this led a gentleman, who appeared to be perfectly master of his subject, to propose in the public papers, some few years ago, that, for the future, the subject should receive from the mint, for every twelve ounces of standard, one hundred and thirty-two six-pences of one penny-weight nineteen grains $\frac{2}{3}$ each, which is the twelve ounces, and at five shillings and six pence per ounce comes to the same as by tale, three pounds six shillings.

Sixty-six shillings of three penny-weights fifteen grains $\frac{2}{3}$ each, which is the twelve ounces, and at five shillings and six pence per ounces comes to the same as by tale, three pounds six shillings.

Crowns

Crowns and half crowns in proportion; the first eighteen penny-weights four grains $\frac{2}{3}$ each; the other nine penny-weights two grains $\frac{1}{3}$ each.

Which, if carried into execution, would bid fair to secure coin for our use at all times, for what shall be melted down above five shillings and six pence per ounce, would be recoin'd when silver is below; but we must guard against the ill use that may be made by persons coining large quantities, if silver should be under five shillings and six pence per ounce; to do which it need only be enacted, that no person should be obliged to take in payment above ten pounds in silver.

With respect to our gold coins, the standard of them in ancient times was twenty-three carats and three grains and an half of fine gold, and half a grain of allay (the allay being either silver or copper); the pound of gold being divided into twenty-four carats, and each carat into four grains.

The proportional values of gold and silver, in England, have always kept pace pretty nearly with each other; for the pound of gold, which in the year 1344, when gold was first coined in this kingdom, was worth thirteen, fourteen, to fifteen pounds in silver, is by degrees risen to forty-four pounds ten shillings, and the gold at present not so fine as then: now as a silver penny was then worth our three-pence, and twenty shillings then were worth sixty shillings, therefore gold and silver have kept pretty near the same proportion to each other. But as silver has always been more current in buying and selling than gold, because always more plenty and easy to come at, so the quantity of coin in our ounce of silver is more immediately for our purpose in estimating the different rates of living, than is that of gold coin.

The present proportion of gold to silver was not exactly effected till the reign of king James I. when a pound weight of gold was coined into forty-four pounds ten shillings by tale, viz. into pieces of five pounds value, of two pounds one shilling, and of ten shillings: and the pound weight of silver was coined into sixty-two shillings, viz. into pieces of five shillings, two shillings and six pence, one shilling, six pence, four pence, two pence, and one penny.

Whereas we meet with obolus, farthing, or farling of gold, in our old histories, it has always a reference to the integer, or higher denomination of some gold coin, as an angel, a noble, &c. so when, in the reign of king Edward III. nobles, oboluses (or half-pence), and farthings of gold were coined, the obolus is here half a noble, and the farthing a quarter of a noble; and the like of other gold coins. Crowns of gold are of great antiquity. There never were any silver coins named nobles or angels, florins nor ryals (or royals) sovereigns nor units, Britain-crowns, thistle-crowns, nor double-crowns (the three last coined by king James I.) pieces of three shillings and four pence, coined by king Henry VIII. &c. all these being always gold: yet no gold coins older than Edward III's reign can be found now, excepting some very rare as far back as Edward III. though, from the minuteness of the then silver coins, it is highly probable that most of the great payments were made in gold. As for the bezant, supposed to be so named from Byzantium, or Constantinople, the value of it was forgot, even in king Richard III's time; and bishop Fleetwood thinks it never was an English coin.

The Union of the Two Crowns of ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, under JAMES I. to the Restoration of King CHARLES II.

P A R T X.

J A M E S I. The first King of ENGLAND of the House of STUART*.
A. D. 1603.

THE line of Henry VIII. of the house of Tudor, being extinct in Elizabeth, the crown of England devolved, of indisputable right, to James VI. of Scotland, as the next lineal heir †, and he was accordingly proclaimed at the gates of Whitehall, and at the Cross of Cheapside, by secretary Cecil and the lord-mayor, with the usual pomp and ceremony.

I shall not take up the reader's time with enumerating the minute descriptions which other writers have given of the universal acclamations which resounded from all quarters upon the proclamation of James, the quick dispatch which was made to inform him of his good fortune, the dutiful letters he received, the affectionate ones he returned, his magnificent progress to England, his behaviour to his new subjects on his first entering amongst them, nor the frantic joy with which the giddy multitude hailed their new sovereign : it is sufficient to say, that while he was upon the road he ordered the earl of Southampton, and the other prisoners on the account of Essex, to be set at liberty ; and the funeral rites of Elizabeth were performed in a most sumptuous manner : the earl of Northumberland, with the lords Thomas and Henry Howard, and the lord Montjoy, were made privy-counsellors, notwithstanding their lying under the suspicion of popery, on account of their family-sufferings for the king's mother ; the lord Egerton was at the same time created baron of Ellesmere. The king's gratitude to the Howard family, who, for the sake of the queen his mother, were in disgrace in the late reign, did not stop there ; the lord Thomas was made earl of Suffolk, and then lord-treasurer ; and the lord Henry was created, some years after, earl of Northampton : moreover, Philip, earl of Arundel, the late duke of Norfolk's eldest son, having lost his title by his condemnation, though Elizabeth gave him his life, the king created his son

* The surname of Stuart had no ignoble original. Bancho, a lord of eminency in Scotland, while Edward the Confessor governed in England, is said to have been their ancestor. This nobleman was murdered by the tyrant Macbeth ; but his son Fleance escaped, and lived for some time in exile in Wales, where he married the daughter of one of its petty princes. His son Walter resided some time at the court of Edward the Confessor ; and afterwards going over to France, he is said to have served under William the Norman, at the battle of Hastings. After various adventures, he came to Scotland, where his own and his ancestors merits procured him an honourable establishment, and he was made hereditary great high-steward of Scotland. From this office he and his posterity, as usual, took their name, which originally signifies the Ward or Guardian of an House.

† James IV. king of Scotland, married Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII. king of England, by whom he had James V. who had only one child, Mary, queen of Scots, who had only one son, James VI. who, from James IV. had an undoubted right to the kingdom of Scotland, and from Margaret, king Henry VII's daughter (the male line being utterly extinct), an unquestionable title to the crown of England. JAMES I.

Thomas earl of Arundel and Surry †. Thus the king's regard for the duke of Norfolk's family plainly shewed what he thought of Elizabeth's treatment of that nobleman and his house. It was not in this alone that he expressed his resentment against the late queen: upon all occasions he pretended to shew it was only out of policy that he had, whilst she lived, concealed his aversion for her. The most notable mark he gave of it, was that he neither went into mourning himself, nor would admit any person to his presence in a mourning habit.

On the seventh of May, James, after creating a multitude of knights, was received in London; and on the twentieth he created Cecil lord Cecil of Essenden, sir Robert Sidney lord Sidney of Penshurst, sir William Knowles lord Knowles of Grays, and sir Edward Wotton lord Wotton of Morley. This conduct, so much the reverse of Elizabeth's frugality as to titles of honour, seems to have been owing to the grateful sense James had of the affection discovered towards his person and right by his new subjects.

These promotions were preparatory to the coronation, which was celebrated at Westminster abbey on Monday the twenty-fifth of July, being St. James's day, Whitgift, archbishop of Canterbury, performing the ceremonies of crowning and anointing both the king and queen; the earl of Nottingham being constituted the lord high-steward, and the earl of Worcester made earl-marshal, for that day's solemnity. The plague raging at this time in London with so much fury that thirty thousand persons died of it within the year; there was no cavalcade from the Tower through the city to the palace of Westminster, as had been usual, the day before the coronation; and a proclamation was published, forbidding all persons, except the lord-mayor, aldermen, and twelve citizens (who came in the mayor's barge by water) to resort thither, for fear of spreading the infection. To avoid the distemper, the king, after knighting all the aldermen, the next morning removed with his court to Winchester.

The public rejoicings were, however, somewhat damped by the gifts and dignities which were now lavished upon swarms of Scots, who had attended their sovereign to his new kingdom, in order to feed upon the fat of a land, so much more fertile and grateful than their own: the duke of Lenox, the earl of Marr, the lord Hume, the lord Kinloss, sir George Hume, and secretary Elphinston, were immediately admitted into the privy-council; sir George Hume was created earl of Dunbar; Hay was dignified first with the title of viscount Doncaster, then earl of Carlisle; and Ramsey was promoted to the earldom of Holderneffe.

It must be confessed, however, in justice to James, that he left almost all the chief offices in the hands of Elizabeth's ministers, and committed the management of political affairs, both foreign and domestic, to his English subjects. Among these secretary Cecil, son to the famous Burleigh, created lord Essenden, was retained by him as his prime minister and chief counsellor, to the no small surprize of all parties, who thought that his name and family must naturally be odious to James, on account of the great hand his father had in the execution of queen Mary, and that he himself had been deeply engaged against the earl of Essex, whom James had been often heard to declare he considered as a martyr to the Scottish succession: but the truth is, that Cecil, who possessed all the art and cunning of a courtier, as well as many of the qualities of a statesman, had wisely resolved, on the first approach of Elizabeth's dissolution, to reconcile himself to James, without the knowledge of either the queen or her ministers, and for this purpose had kept up a secret correspondence with the Scottish monarch, during several months, in which he fully informed him of the private as well as public disposition of the people of England in regard to his succession; the consequence of this was, that James, on his arrival at York, honoured Cecil with a most gracious reception, and created him a baron; and this cunning politician soon gained an ascendancy over the spirit of James, who, with very little experience or judgment, and an infinite conceit of his own abilities and penetration, laid himself entirely open to the arts of adulation. Thus much, however, by way of introduction.

The eyes of all the potentates of Europe were fixed in anxious expectation upon James, from the first instant of his ascending the throne of England; they saw in him the son of a mother who died a martyr to the cause of popery, which raised vast hopes in the professors of that religion, and equal apprehensions in those of the protestant communion; and ambassadors from almost all the princes and states concerned, soon appeared at the English court, in order to felicitate the king on his new-acquired dignity, and to conclude with him new treaties and alliances: besides envoys from Venice, Denmark, and the Palatinate, Henry Frederick of Nassau, assisted by the famous pensionary Barneveldt, represented the states of the United Provinces, Aremberg was sent by the archduke Albert, and Taxis was expected in a little time from Spain.

Henry IV. of France could not, without vast concern, reflect that James, in one part of his life, had been already tampering with Spain; he thought he had every thing to dread from such an union, especially if James should happen to discover an enterprizing genius. Though there was

† To avoid confusion, it will be proper to continue the account of the numerous family of Howard. Thomas Howard, the third duke of Norfolk, married, first, Anne, daughter to king Edward IV. by whom he had Thomas, who died young: his second wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, by whom he had Henry, earl of Arundel, beheaded 13 Henry VIII. and Thomas, created viscount Howard of Binden, 1. Eliz. The said Henry married Frances, daughter of John de Vere, earl of Oxford, and by her had Thomas the fourth duke of Norfolk (restored 1 Mary, and beheaded for attempting to marry Mary, queen of Scots), and Henry, made earl of Northampton, 1 James I. The last mentioned Thomas had two wives: 1. Mary, daughter and co-heir of Henry, earl of Arundel; who was mother of Philip, earl of Arundel: 2. Margaret, daughter of Thomas lord Audley, and mother of Thomas, created earl of Suffolk 1 James I. and of William, made lord Howard of Naworth-castle, 1 James I. The aforesaid Philip, earl of Arundel, had a son, named Thomas, who was restored 1 James I. This Thomas was father, 1st of Henry; 2dly of William, created viscount Stafford in 1640. The last Thomas was father of Thomas, the fifth duke of Norfolk, 13 Car. II. and of Henry, created earl of Norwich in 1683. The before-mentioned Thomas, earl of Suffolk, had seven sons: 1. Theophilus, who succeeded him; 2. Thomas, created earl of Berkshire, 1629. 7. Edward, made lord Howard of Escrick, 1629. The above-said William lord Howard of Naworth-castle, was father of Philip, and he of William, who was father of Charles, created earl of Carlisle, 1661. Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii.

little likelihood of this, yet Henry, conscious how much he had provoked him, could not be very easy till he had sounded his intentions, and charged the marquis de Rosné, afterwards duke of Sully, the best political head of the French court, with that commission. This minister proposed, in his master's name, a league with James, in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the Northern crowns, in order to invade the Austrian dominions on every side, and humble the exorbitant power of that ambitious family; but the genius of the English king was little adapted to such vast enterprizes: the love of peace was his ruling passion; and Rosné found James to be master of so much dissimulation, that all his address could not sift out his real intentions, nor bring him to make any declaration farther than in general terms, of his design to live in friendship with France; and upon the whole the marquis thought that Cecil seemed rather disposed to a peace between England and Spain. At last, after numberless evasions on the part of James and his ministers, a solemn conference was held upon the state of affairs, when it was agreed, that the two kings should permit the Dutch to levy forces in their respective dominions, and should privately supply that republic with the sum of one million four hundred thousand livres a year, for the maintenance of their forces; that the whole sum should be advanced by the king of France, but that the third part should be deducted for a debt due by him to Elizabeth; and if the Spaniards attacked either of the princes, they engaged to assist each other, Henry with a force of ten thousand, James with that of six thousand men.

The court of France thought that it had gained a great point in bringing James to sign this treaty; but a very extraordinary discovery that was made, or pretended to be made, in England about this time, did not perhaps a little influence the councils of James on this occasion. The king, on his arrival in England, had given a very cold reception to Raleigh, Cobham, with all the other enemies of Essex, Cecil excepted; and they were imprudent enough to give their enemies an handle, by keeping suspicious company: while, amidst the most profound tranquility, both foreign and domestic, the nation was alarmed with a discovery of a plot to overturn the government, and to place upon the throne the lady Arabella Stuart, a near kinswoman of the king, descended equally with him from Henry VII. who had been for some time a close state-prisoner in the Tower; and sir Walter Raleigh, with his friends the lords Cobham and Grey, sir Griffith Markham, sir Edward Parham, sir George Brooke, brother to lord Cobham, Bartholomew Brooksby, and Anthony Coppely, with two priests, William Watson and William Clarke, were sent to prison. Every thing remains still mysterious in this conspiracy: though nothing could be more ridiculous than that Raleigh, who had ever distinguished himself by a kind of enthusiasm against Spain, should mingle his treasons with those of the papists, yet it is certain, that, besides the general charge, another was brought against him and Cobham in particular, for the tolerating popery by the help of six hundred thousand crowns, which were to be paid to the duke of Arenberg, and distributed among the disaffected in England. The account of the trial, as it is come to our hands, is very imperfect and confused; the two priests and Brooke, however, were executed, but without confessing themselves guilty of any actual treason: Watson indeed, an ignorant pragmatical priest, acknowledged that he had given it as his opinion, that, as the king was not yet crowned, any attempt upon his person could not be properly deemed treason; but nothing appears to have gone farther amongst the pretended conspirators than table-talking, though such as certainly could not be defended.

On the seventeenth of November Raleigh was tried before commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, without having any witnesses brought to confront him, though he earnestly requested that privilege, allowed by the law. One Dyer, indeed, was brought to swear, that he heard a gentleman at Lisbon say, that don Raleigh and don Cobham would cut the king's throat before his coronation: and, to the reproach of all law and justice, sir Edward Coke, the attorney-general, laid very great stress upon this ridiculous evidence; and in the end the confession of Cobham was the only evidence, weak as it was, that bore hard against him. That nobleman had been weak enough to let himself be tricked into the confession to save his own life; but, after he was thrown into the Tower, being seized with a violent fit of sickness, he solemnly retracted all he had said; nevertheless Raleigh was found guilty by his jury, upon which he had sentence of death passed upon him as a traitor, as had likewise Cobham, on the twenty-ninth of the same month by his peers, the lord-chancellor Ellesmere sitting as lord high-steward. In a few days after, the lord Grey and Markham had the same judgment passed on them. James signed warrants for the execution of the two lords and sir Griffith Markham, and publicly sent them to the sheriff of Winchester: at the same time he privately sent, by one of his Scottish domestics, a warrant, written all with his own hand, directed to the sheriff likewise, superseding the execution. His last warrant was not produced till the two lords and the knight were actually making ready for the stroke. This arrant piece of king-craft in James was far from answering his expectations: it is plain he had been made to expect the prisoners, in their last moments, would have enhanced the value of his unexpected clemency, and perhaps have brought more confiscations into his coffers; but no such discovery having been made, the public was thrown into greater doubts than ever as to the truth of the conspiracy; and James afterwards acted as if he had repented of his mercy; for he suffered sir Griffith Markham to perish abroad in obscurity and oblivion; the lord Grey died in the Tower; and the lord Cobham perished through hunger, cold, and filth, in a garret in the Minories, to which he was forced to ascend by a ladder, and even for that he was indebted to the gratitude of an old woman. The natural reflection that is to be made upon this scene of blood and mystery, is, that the whole was a contrivance of Cecil, and the Spanish faction, to get rid of his and their most formidable enemies.

The papists, upon the accession of James to the crown of England, found themselves miserably deceived; for he gave them plainly enough to understand that he was determined to maintain religion as it had been left by Elizabeth. The puritans, encouraged by this, and by some doubts concerning the worship of the church of England, which James, perhaps only to shew his polemical accomplishments, had thrown out, applied for favour and indulgence, and James appointed a disputation between the heads of both parties, in which he was to sit umpire. The disputation was held at Hampton-court, and the managers for the church were, the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of London, Durham, Winchester, Worcester, St. David's, Chichester, Carlisle, and Peterborough, the dean of the chapel, the deans of Westminster, Christ-church, St. Paul's, Worcester, Salisbury, Chester, and Windsor; to these must be added Dr. King archdeacon of Nottingham, and Dr. Field afterwards archdeacon of Gloucester. Those for the nonconformists were, Dr. John Reynolds and Dr. Thomas Sparks, of Oxford; Mr. Chaderton and Mr. Knewstubbs, of Cambridge.

In the course of this conference, which was opened on the fourteenth of January, 1604, James, in his capacity of præses, shewed uncommon talents at disputation; and it may be said with justice, that his merits would have been great, had a college, instead of a kingdom, been his province of government. Upon the whole, the reader may easily guess the nonconformists, on this occasion, were as much worsted in the dispute as the protestants had been under Mary, or the papists under Elizabeth: the king's opinion and decision went clearly against them; if they did not conform, he threatened to use more forcible arguments than disputation; and he closed up the whole with the grave aphorism of "No bishop, no king."

It being thus resolved to treat the puritans with the utmost severity, it was necessary to proceed in some sort against the papists; accordingly a proclamation was published on the twenty-second of February, commanding all Jesuits, and other papists having any orders from foreign powers, to depart the kingdom on or before the nineteenth of March. But this proclamation was so worded, that the king was extremely desirous to shew he did not banish the Jesuits in hatred to the catholic religion in general, but only on account of their attachment to the pope's unlimited power over crowned heads: as to the other doctrines, he was willing to allow his popish subjects to believe what they pleased, which gave occasion to suspect him to be inclined to the Roman catholic religion; and bishop Burnet says, that, from the year 1606, he was always writing and talking against popery, though he acted for it. But what made James more suspected by the zealous protestants, was the great partiality he shewed in his proceedings against the puritans; for, in his proclamation against them, he paid no regard to the tender consciences of such as could not comply with the doctrines of the church of England, but in the whole condemned them as a set of obstinate people deserving no favour.

These proclamations were followed by a great many more against certain monopolies, protections, salt-petre men, and against some other grievances complained of by the people, hoping to gain the concurrence of the public to establish those royal mandates as so many laws, and so to enable him to govern without a parliament; and though he did submit to call one, to meet him at Westminster, on the nineteenth of March, 1604, he words the writs, and proclamation for summoning the same, in such terms of command, and under such restrictions, that he reserved the power of rejecting all those who did not come ready to submit to his will and direction; as most plainly appears in the words themselves, where it is said:

"We notify by these presents, that all returns and certificates of knights, citizens, and burgeses, ought and are to be brought to the Chancery, and there to be filed on record; and if any should be found to be made contrary to this proclamation, the same is to be rejected as unlawful and insufficient, and the city or borough to be fined for the same: if it be found that they have committed any gross or wilful default and contempt in their election, return, or certificate, than their liberties, according to the law, are to be seized into our hands as forfeited. And if any person take upon him the place of a knight, citizen, or burges, not being duly elected, returned, and sworn, according to the laws and statutes in that behalf provided, and according to the purport, effect, and true meaning of this our proclamation, then every person so offending to be fined and imprisoned for the same." By which the king assumed the power to judge the validity of all elections, and demanded the same submission to his own proclamations as to any of the laws of the land.

James opened this his first parliament by the most extraordinary speech that ever was pronounced from a throne: it contained excellent matter, but is blameable for its vanity, its prolixity, and many improprieties. His general propositions, however, are very just; and the following noble passage demands the admiration and praise of every lover of English liberty, and contains a glorious lesson for a crowned head. "When, (says he,) I have done all that I can for you, I do nothing but that which I am bound to do, and am accountable to God, should I do the contrary; for I acknowledge, that the greatest and most essential difference between a rightful king and an usurping tyrant, is this; that whereas the proud and ambitious tyrant doth think, that his kingdom and people are only ordained for the gratification of his desires and unreasonable appetites; the righteous and just king doth, on the contrary, acknowledge, that he himself is only ordained for promoting the wealth and prosperity of his people, and that his greatest and principal happiness must consist in their prosperity. If you be rich, I cannot be poor; if you be happy, I cannot be unfortunate: and I protest, that your welfare shall be the constant object of my study and attention. That I am a servant is most true; and that as I am head and governor of all the people in my dominions, considering them in number, and in different ranks; so if we will take the people as one body and mass, then, as the head is ordained for the body, and not the body for the head, so must a righteous king acknowledge himself to be ordained for the people, and not his people for him: for although a king and people be relative, yet can he be no king if he want people and subjects. But there be many people in the world, that want a king: wherefore I will never be ashamed to confess it my principal honour to be the great servant of the commonwealth, and ever think the prosperity there thereof to be my greatest felicity, as I have already observed*." The rest of this speech was calculated to persuade a union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland; and he took occasion to compliment the Roman catholics, by owning the church of Rome for the mother-church, "although defiled with some deformities and corruptions:" he even offered to meet them half way in their doctrines, &c. and dropped some severe expressions against the puritans, which rendered that sect and their friends very diffident of his intentions all the subsequent part of his reign.

This speech was so far from meeting with the general applause he expected, that it drew upon him the ill-will of all but the most zealous partizans of the church of England, whose chief point was to ruin the puritans. The nobility and gentry could not bear the disappointments they met with in the numerous advancements of the Scots to places of honour and profit, and to titles and dignities, which the English expected as their birth-right; the presbyterians were enraged to hear the king profess himself their open enemy; and all the protestants in general were grieved at the advances he made to the papists.

This laid the foundation of all the misfortunes experienced by the established church afterwards; and so far contributed to the present dislike to his majesty, that the parliament could not be persuaded to agree to his favourite scheme of uniting the two kingdoms, though he had ordered himself to be proclaimed king of Great Britain, and quartered the cross of St. Andrew with that of St. George in the English flag.

The case of sir Francis Goodwin was another cause of discontent to the people; for he being declared duly elected knight of the shire for the county of Bucks by the committee of elections, after a full hearing on a petition of sir John Fortescue, the king commanded the commons to proceed to re-consider the case, and to have a conference with the judges, after they had refused to confer with the lords thereupon; which in all probability must have ended in a quarrel between the king and his commons, had not Goodwin's moderation disengaged him with honour in so nice an affair, and convinced him of what little signification that clause in his proclamation was, by which he intended to be master of the elections; and which convinced the parliament of the necessity of obviating such pernicious incidents for the future. Wherefore they addressed his majesty, on the fifteenth of June, and amongst other grievances, took occasion to represent their privileges, of which they supposed him not yet fully informed. But this so displeased the king, that he prorogued the parliament, on the seventh of July, to the seventh of February following, after they had granted him a large rate on tonnage and poundage, and passed several good acts for the peace and good government of the kingdom; such as an act for the due execution of the laws against Jesuits, seminary priests, and recusants; a continuation of queen Elizabeth's vagrant-act, by which the people who go about the country to sell glasses are adjudged rogues and vagabonds: an act to restrain the inordinate haunting and tippling in inns, alehouses, &c. one against conjuration, witchcraft, and dealing with evil spirits; one for relief of creditors against bankrupts; and another against brokers, &c.

Soon after the prorogation of the parliament, a treaty of peace with Spain was set on foot at London, and the commissioners for the king of England were Thomas Sackville, lately created earl of Dorset; Charles Howard, earl of Nottingham, lord high-admiral; Henry Howard, earl of Northampton; Charles Blount, earl of Devonshire; and Robert lord Cecil, baron of Essenden, lately created viscount Cranburn, and soon after earl of Salisbury: on the part of the king of Spain, John de Velasco, constable of Castile; John Baptista de Taxis, count de Villa Medina, the Spanish ambassador: for the archduke Albert, Charles, count d'Arenberg; John Richardot, president of the privy council; and Ludovic Wareiker, principal secretary of state. On the eighteenth of August, 1604, the several articles were finally agreed upon, the most remarkable of which imported, "that James should fix a day, before the expiration of which the states of the United Provinces should make peace with the archduke; and in case of a refusal, the king of England should deem himself absolved from all engagements with that confederacy." Nevertheless, he never fixed the time, or withdrew his troops from their service; nay he even restored the places they had mortgaged, for a much smaller sum than that for which they were deposited. It was after the conclusion of this treaty that the town of Ostend capitulated, having been three years besieged by the Spaniards, who found nothing in the place but heaps of ruins in recompence for the vast sums of money and incredible numbers of lives which had been expended in the conquest. James, without concerning himself about the fate of this fortress, resolved to improve his new connexion with Spain, and the earl of Nottingham, the lord high-admiral, was appointed ambassador extraordinary to that court, for which he took his departure, with a very numerous and magnificent retinue, while the earl of Hertford was dispatched to Brussels.

At the same time that the above treaty was concluded, another was also made, relating entirely to commerce, and the king granted a monopoly of the trade with Spain and Italy to a company of merchants, exclusive of all his other subjects. But this was so generally complained of, as destructive to trade, that it was thought proper by the government to revoke the patent in the next session of parliament.

The remainder of this year was spent at court in flatteries by those who sought for preferment, and in a lavish disposal of the royal favour to the king's minions, which bred great discontent in those who had no share in it, and thought themselves not less worthy than the others who monopolized the king's graces. Queen Elizabeth took a different method, but king James did not think fit to be her imitator in this, more than in other matters. Never were honours bestowed with less discretion and more profusion than in this reign; accordingly they were no longer considered as the reward of merit, but only of adulation.

Before we conclude the year 1604, it is proper to observe, that his majesty, who was a great enemy to tobacco, as appears in his writings against it, ordered, by proclamation, dated the seventh of October, that, besides the custom of two pence per pound charged upon it by an act of parliament of the late reign, there should be an additional duty of six shillings and eight pence on every pound imported into this realm: and as a farther token of his intention to exert his power and rule without parliaments, he, by privy-seal, borrowed several sums of money from the wealthiest citizens of London.

Cardinal d'Osset, the great French minister at Rome, died on the thirteenth of March this year, and was succeeded by cardinal Perron. By this time the few years of peace which France had enjoyed, had put that king and kingdom in an excellent situation: but there still remained many great men in France who favoured the Huguenots. Though the duke of Bouillon had taken refuge at the elector Palatine's court, yet his friends were very strong and numerous: the dukes de la Tremouille and Rohan were known to favour the same interest; and Plessis Mornay, with those Huguenots who had stood most firmly to Henry, accused him of ingratitude to their party. All these considerations made Henry extremely solicitous to keep well with James, lest he should be drawn either to the Spanish or the Huguenot party; he was fortified in this resolution by the marquis de Rosné.

Henry was at this time daily alarmed with discoveries of conspiracies of the Spaniards against his person and government; and he had not only the good fortune to defeat and disappoint them all, but, by a seasonable mixture of severity and clemency, came a to distinct knowledge of all the connexions between the disaffected party and the Spanish ambassadors in France and England. The marchioness de Verneuil, his beloved mistress, had drawn from him a promise of marriage in writing, which the court of Spain endeavoured to get into their hands, hoping thereby to rear up a pretender to the crown of France against Henry's lawful issue, in the son or posterity of the marchioness; but her indiscretion and insolence, upon the strength of this promise, drove the king from all his tenderness to her; he suffered her and her father, with one Morgan, who managed the correspondence with the Spanish ambassador in England, to be arrested, and tried them, with the count d'Auvergne, who was engaged in the same conspiracy. They were found guilty: upon the strength, however, of the discoveries which all of them, especially the marchioness, made, the king mitigated their punishments, and crushed a conspiracy for betraying Marseilles. At the same time his ministers at Rome became entire masters of all the intrigues of that court, where this year three popes succeeded one another.

On the twenty-third of April, 1605, being St. George's day, the king kept the feast of the order of the Garter at Greenwich, when two new knights companions were admitted, viz. Ulric, duke of Norway, eldest son to the king of Denmark, and brother to James's queen, and Henry Howard, earl of Northampton: and upon the Saturday following, in the hall at Greenwich, being richly ornamented for the purpose, his majesty created three earls, one viscount, and four barons, namely, sir Robert Cecil, viscount Cranburn, he created earl of Salisbury; Thomas Cecil, lord Burleigh, his lordship's eldest brother, earl of Exeter; and sir Philip Herbert, younger brother to the earl of Pembroke, he created earl of Montgomery; Robert Sidney, baron of Penshurst, lord-chamberlain to the queen, was created viscount Lisle; sir John Stanhope, his vice-chamberlain, he made lord Stanhope of Harrington; sir George Carew, vice-chamberlain to the queen, was made lord Carew of Clopton; Mr. Thomas Arundel, of Devonshire, lord Arundel of Wardour; and Mr. William Cavendish, lord Cavendish of Hardwicke: Charles, duke of Albany, the king's second son, then an infant of four years old, had, in the preceding year, been created duke of York with great solemnity, and admitted into the order of the Bath.

About this time one Thomas Douglas, a Scot, who had lately been sent in the character of envoy from the count palatine of the Rhine, was committed close prisoner to the Tower, for having counterfeited the king's privy-seal to divers princes of Germany; and being, upon due trial, fully convicted of the same, he was drawn upon a hurdle to Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered.

We are now to attend the discovery of a plot, the most daring and impious that occurs in the annals of mankind. This is no other than the Gunpowder Treason, by which the conspirators proposed to blow up the king, the royal family, and both houses of parliament, while in full sessions, and thus involve them all in utter and inevitable ruin. This most diabolical design was set on foot by several Roman catholics, who were enraged to hear that James was firmly resolved to put in force the laws against them. Their infernal cabal consisted of Henry Garnet, an Englishman, who, about the year 1586, had been sent over here as superior of the English Jesuits; Catesby, an English gentleman; Telford, a Jesuit; Thomas Wright; two gentlemen of the name of Winter; Thomas Piercy, a near relation of the earl of Northumberland; Guido Fawkes, a bold and enterprising soldier of fortune; sir Edward Digby; John Grant, esq. Francis Tresham, esq. with Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, gentlemen. Most of these were both men of birth and fortune; and Catesby, who had a large estate, had already expended two thousand pounds in several voyages to the court of Spain, in order to introduce an army of Spaniards into England, for overturning the present government, and restoring the Roman catholic religion; but, being disappointed in his project of an invasion, took an opportunity of disclosing to Piercy, who was his intimate friend, and who, in a sudden fit of passion, had hinted a design of assassinating the king as he was riding a-hunting, a nobler and more extensive plan of treason, such as would include a sure execution of vengeance, and, at one blow, consign over to destruction all their enemies. Piercy approved of this project of Catesby, and they resolved to impart the matter to a few more, and, by degrees, to all the rest of their cabal, every man being bound by an oath and taking the sacrament, the most sacred rite of their religion, not to disclose the least syllable of the matter, or to withdraw from the association, without consent of all concerned. These consultations were held in the spring and summer of the year 1604, and it was towards the beginning of that year they began their operations; the manner of which, and the discovery, I shall give the reader from authentic papers of the earl of Salisbury (Cecil), with all the brevity that is consistent with perspicuity.

It had been agreed, that a few of the conspirators should run a mine below the room in which the parliament was to assemble, and chose the very moment when the king delivered his speech to both houses, and then, by one blow, to cut off the king, the royal family, lords, commons, and all the other enemies of the catholic religion, in that very spot where that religion had been most oppressed. For this purpose Piercy, who was at that time a gentleman-pensioner, undertook to hire an house adjoining to the upper house of parliament, with all diligence: and the others, expecting the parliament would meet on the seventeenth of February following, began, on the eleventh of December, to dig in the cellar, through the wall of partition, which was three yards thick. There were seven in number joined in this labour: they went in by night, never after appeared in sight, and, having provided themselves with baked meat, had no occasion to send out; and, in case of discovery, they had provided themselves with powder, shot, and fire-arms, with a resolution rather to die than yield or be taken. On Candlemas-day, 1605, they had dug so far through the wall, as to be able to hear a noise on the other side: upon which unexpected event, fearing a discovery, Guido Fawkes (who personated Piercy's footman) was dispatched to know the occasion, and returned with the favourable report, that the place from whence the noise came was a large cellar, under the upper-house of parliament, full of sea-coal, which was now on sale, and the cellar offered to be lett. Piercy immediately hired the cellar, and bought the remainder of the coals; then he sent for thirty barrels of gunpowder from Holland, and landing them at Lambeth, conveyed them gradually, by night, to this cellar, covered them with stones, iron bars, a thousand bullets, and five hundred faggots; all which they did at their leisure, the parliament being farther prorogued to the third of October, and again to the fifth of November.

The conspirators consulted, in the next place, how they should secure the duke of York, who was too young to be expected at the parliament-house; and his sister, the princess Elizabeth, educated at lord Harrington's, in Warwickshire. It was resolved, that Piercy, and another gentleman, should enter into the duke's chamber without suspicion, and a dozen more, properly disposed at several doors, and two or three on horseback at the court-gate to receive him, should carry him safe away as soon as the parliament-house was blown up: or, if that could not be effected, to kill him, and to declare the princess Elizabeth queen, having secured her, under colour of a hunting match that day.

Some moved for foreign aid beforehand, but were over-ruled; and it was agreed only to apply to France, Spain, and the archduke, for assistance after the plot had taken effect: they also resolved to save the princess Elizabeth, and proclaim her queen, and to spread a report after the blow was given, that the puritans were the perpetrators of so inhuman an action.

Every thing being now prepared by the conspirators, they, without the least remorse of conscience, and with the utmost impatience, expected the fifth of November. But all their counsels were blasted, and brought on their own heads, by the all-seeing eye of Providence: one of the conspirators, with a desire to save William Parker, lord Monteagle, son to lord Morley, wrote the following letter.

"My Lord,

"Out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care for your preservation; therefore, I advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some excuse to shift off your attendance at this parliament; for God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time: and think not slightly of this advertisement, but retire yourself into your country, where you may expect the event with safety; for though there be no appearance of any stir, yet I say they shall receive a terrible blow, this parliament, yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it can do you good, and can do you no harm; for the danger is past so soon (or as quickly) as you burn this letter; and I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it, to whose holy protection I commend you."

Monteagle was for a good while at a loss what judgment to form of this letter, and unresolved whether he should slight the advertisement or not; and fancying it a trick of his enemies to frighten him into an absence from parliament, would have taken the first party, had his own safety been only in question; but apprehending the king's life might be in danger, he carried it at midnight to the earl of Salisbury, who was full as much puzzled about the meaning of the letter, and, though he inclined to think it a wild and waggish contrivance to alarm Monteagle, thought proper to consult about it with the earl of Suffolk, lord-chamberlain. The expressions, "that the blow should come without knowing who hurt them," made them imagine that it would not be more proper than the time of parliament, nor by any other way like to be attempted than by gunpowder, while the king was sitting in that assembly: the lord-chamberlain thought this the more probable, because there was a great cellar under the parliament-chamber, never used for any thing but some wood or coal, belonging to Whineyard, the keeper of the palace; and having communicated the letter to the earls of Nottingham, Worcester, and Northampton, proceeded no farther till the king came from Royston, on the first of November, to Westminster.

His majesty being shewed the letter, and acquainted with their suspicions, was of opinion that either nothing should be done, or else enough to prevent the danger; and that a search should be deferred till the day designed for the execution of the diabolical enterprize. Thus on Monday the fourth of November, in the afternoon, the lord-chamberlain, whose office it was to see all put in readiness for the king's coming, taking Monteagle with him, went to visit all places about the parliament-house, and taking a slight occasion to see the cellar, observed only piles of billets and faggots, but in greater number than he thought Whineyard could want for his own use: asking him who owned the wood, and being told it belonged to one Mr. Piercy, he began to have some suspicions, knowing him to be a rigid papist, and so seldom there that he had no occasion for such a quantity of fuel; and Monteagle confirmed him therein, by taking notice notice that Piercy had made him great professions of friendship, though he was not come out of the North when the letter was received. There were no other materials visible, yet Suffolk thought it absolutely necessary to make a farther search; and upon his return to the king, a resolution was taken that it should be made in such a manner as should be effectual, without scandalizing any body, or giving any alarm. Sir Thomas Knevet, steward of Westminster, was accordingly ordered, under the pretext of searching for stolen tapestry hangings in that place, and other houses thereabouts, to remove the wood and see if any thing was concealed underneath. This gentleman going at midnight, unlooked-for, to the cellar, met Fawkes just coming out of it, booted and spurred, with a tinder-box and three matches in his pockets, and seizing him without any ceremony or asking him any questions, caused him to be bound as soon as the removal of the wood discovered the barrels of gunpowder. Fawkes, an hardened and intrepid villain, made no difficulty of avowing the design, and that it would have been executed on the morrow. He made the same acknowledgement at his examination before a committee of the council; and though he did not deny having some associates in this conspiracy, yet no threats of torture could make him discover any of them, declaring "he was ready to die, and had rather suffer ten thousand deaths, than willingly accuse his master, or any other." It was however drawn from him by repeated examinations, and assurances of his master's being apprehended, "that whilst he was abroad, Piercy had kept the keys of the cellar, had been in it since the powder had been laid there, and in effect that he was one of the principal actors in the intended tragedy." In the mean time it was found out, "that Piercy had come post out of the North on Saturday night, the second of November, and had dined on Monday at Sion House, with the earl of Northumberland; that Fawkes had met him on the road; that, after the lord-chamberlain had been that evening in the cellar, he went, about six o'clock to his master, who had fled immediately, apprehending that all was discovered." Salisbury, in his account of this matter, ascribes the thorough search that was made entirely to the lord-chamberlain, owning for his own part, that though he had been sufficiently apprized of the recusants designing some stir during the parliament, yet he could not possibly conceive it was of such a nature as had never entered before into the hearts of any conspirators mentioned in history.

The news of the discovery spreading as quick as lightning, the conspirators fled different ways, but mostly into Warwickshire, where sir Everard Digby had appointed a hunting match, near Dunchurch, to get a number of recusants together, sufficient to seize the princess Elizabeth; but this design was prevented by her taking refuge in Coventry, and their whole party, making about one hundred horse, retired to Holbeach, the seat of sir Stephen Littleton, on the edge of Staffordshire, having broke open stables and taken horses thence, in the adjoining counties. Sir Richard Walsh, high-sheriff of Worcestershire, pursuing them to Holbeach, invested them there, and summoned them to surrender. In preparing them for their defence, they put some moist powder before a fire to dry, and a spark from the coals setting it on fire, some of the conspirators were so burned in their faces, thighs, and arms, that they were scarce capable of handling their weapons. Their case was desperate, and no means of escape appearing, unless by forcing their way through the assailants, they made a desperate sally for that purpose: Catesby (who first proposed the manner of the plot), Piercy and the two Winters, were killed; Thomas Winter, Grant, Digby, Rookwood, and Bates, were taken and carried to London, where the first made a full discovery of the conspiracy. Tresham, lurking in that city, and frequently moving his quarters, was apprehended not long after, and, having confessed the whole matter, died of the stranguary in the Tower. The earl of Northumberland, suspected by reason of his being related to Thomas Piercy, was, by way of precaution, committed to the custody of the archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth, and was afterwards fined thirty thousand pounds and sent to the Tower, for admitting Piercy into the band of pensioners without tendering him the oath of supremacy. Robert Winter and Littleton wandering through woods in the country, were at last seized and sent to the Tower. Hugh Owen and Baldwin the Jesuit being demanded of the archduke, the former was imprisoned and his papers seized, but, under the pretence of his being naturalized, and of the privilege of the latter's order, neither of them was sent to England. Some escaped to Calais, and coming thither with others who fled only to avoid a persecution, as they apprehended on this occasion, were kindly received by M. de Vic, the governor; but one declaring before him, that he was not so much concerned at his exile, as that the powder-plot did not take effect, de Vic was so much incensed at this man's glorying in such an execrable iniquity, that he had like to have thrown him into the sea. Eight of the conspirators being tried on the twenty-seventh of January, and convicted, sir Everard Digby being the only one that pleaded guilty to the indictment, though all the rest had confessed their guilt before; he was executed on the thirtieth of that month, with Robert Winter, Grant, and Bates, at the west end of St. Paul's Church-yard; as Thomas Winter, Keyes, Rookwood, and Fawkes were in Old Palace-yard, the day following. The earls of Nottingham, Worcester, Suffolk, Devonshire, Northampton, and Salisbury, were in the commission for hearing their trials, and took occasion to vindicate the king from having ever promised the Roman catholics a toleration for their religion, the breach whereof had been alleged as the chief ground of their discontent. Garnet had been mentioned in Tresham's confession; and being tried on the twenty-eighth of March, "for his knowledge and concealment of the conspiracy; for administering an oath of secrecy to conspirators; for the persuading them of the lawfulness of their treason; and for praying for the success of the great action in hand at the beginning of the parliament," was condemned, notwithstanding his false plea, of having known of the plot only in confession, which he was not to reveal. The sentence was not executed till the third of May, when, confessing his own guilt, and the iniquity of the enterprize, he exhorted all Roman catholics to abstain from the like treasonable practices. Gerard and Hall, Jesuits, got abroad; Littleton, and others were put to death in the country. The lord Monteagle had a grant of two hundred pounds a year in land, and a pension of five hundred pounds for life, as a reward for discovering the letter which gave the first hint of the conspiracy.

The reader will readily perceive that I have, in this account, advanced pretty far into the year 1606; but I thought it would be more satisfactory to preserve the narrative of this unexampled villany and its progress entire to its final subversion: I shall now resume the thread of the history.

The session of parliament which was fixed for the fifth of November, 1605, was postponed to the ninth, when the king, in an elaborate speech opened it, and, as much as possible, endeavoured to clear the professors of the catholic religion of the detestable principles and practices of the late conspirators; he then very earnestly recommended it to both houses, that they should not believe that any foreign prince was concerned in the conspiracy, and that they should reverently judge and speak of them in that case. The truth is, that James was under a thousand perplexities; peace was the ruling passion of his soul, and the discoveries he had made of the archduke's hand in this conspiracy, made him afraid, that, if he prosecuted the matter with too keen a resentment against the catholic professors and princes, the court of Spain itself might have been found a party; in which case it would not have been in his power to have prevented a general war all over Europe, in which he himself must have been a principal. From the same spirit of caution James published several proclamations to prevent any public apprehension that the conspirators had been promised assistance from foreign princes; "we do declare (said he) that we cannot admit so inhumane a thought, as to conceive that any prince, of what religion soever, could give ear to so savage and barbarous an imagination; and that by such examinations as hitherto had been taken, we find them all and their ministers clear from any suspicion or privy thereunto; whereof an infallible argument to us is, that all the ministers of foreign princes, who are now here, made earnest suit to be present in the place that day: charging and commanding all his subjects not to speak of any of his neighbour princes, or their ambassadors, but reverently." The parliament was now adjourned to the twenty-first of January, 1606.

Early in which year the court of Spain sent John de Mendoza to congratulate James upon his deliverance, and accompanied its congratulations with many rich presents. But their actions gave their professions the lie in the strongest manner; for when sir Thomas Edmonds, the English resident with the archduke, demanded that Owen and Baldwin the Jesuit, who had both of them been great promoters of the late conspiracy, should be sent to England, the archduke flatly refused to give them up, upon pretext that Baldwin was a Jesuit, and was to be punished by his superiors; and Owen a servant to the king of Spain, and therefore only subject to him. The French king behaved with much more frankness, for he ordered all who were only suspected of the conspiracy to be seized at Calais, and sent over to England.

The parliament met to do business agreeable to their prorogation, when they confirmed the attainders of the conspirators, and seriously applied themselves to prevent the designs of such popish recusants as refused to acknowledge the king's independent authority; and the form of an oath for that purpose, in the nature of a test, was drawn up and agreed to by the two houses; which oath, as it contained nothing repugnant to the essential articles of the Romish faith, and concerned only the unlimited power which by some is given, and by others denied, to the pope, was said to have been devised by the principal catholics of the secular faction, that is, by the secular priests, so called in contradistinction to friars, monks, and Jesuits, who take an oath to the pope, wherein they swear unlimited allegiance to his holiness. Hence we find, that most of the English catholics, not infected with Jesuitism, even their archpriest himself, their superior Blackwell, made no scruple to take it. But pope Urban VIII. dreading the consequences of such a coalition between those members of his church and the church of England, was determined, at all events, to prevent it, so far as in his power; and for that end, by a brief, dated on the tenth of the calends of October, 1606, forbade them to take the said oath: and, upon information that this brief was disregarded, he, the next year, in another brief, told them plainly, that they who took the said oath did forfeit all hopes of salvation. This wrought upon some weak minds, but some of the more learned and judicious despised such unscriptural proceedings of the court of Rome, and the archpriest Blackwell, and others, did not fear to defend the reasonableness and lawfulness of taking the oath of allegiance.

The parliament also passed an act for the better discovering and repressing popish recusants: another to prevent the dangers which may grow by popish recusants. At the same time the practice of the law being found intolerable to the subject, they passed an act to reform the multitudes and misdemeanors of attorneys and solicitors, and to avoid unnecessary suits and charges of the law; and another for the recovery of small debts, and the relieving of debtors in London: and then without regarding the disputes which arose in the first sessions of parliament, and as if they resolved to buy the king's good-will, they granted him one of the largest subsidies that had ever been given to any one of his predecessors on the most urgent occasions of the state, though he was then in profound peace, and wanted money only to enrich his favourites. This aid consisted of three whole subsidies and six fifteenths and tenths, besides four subsidies of four shillings in the pound, granted at the same time by the clergy: the whole was payable at eleven separate payments, and amounted to the sum of four hundred and fifty-three thousand pounds.

The passing this grant was quickened by as arant a state-trick as ever was practiced; for, on the twenty-second of March, a time when the passions of the people were warmed with the recent guilt and obstinacy of the conspirators, and while the commons were in all the heat of their debates against the prerogative, all London and the neighbourhood was fill with a report that James and some of his principal favourites were murdered at Oking, about twenty miles westward of London. This report was very circumstantial, the better to gain credit, for it mentioned James to have been stabbed with an envenomed knife, and the murderers were composed of English Jesuits, Scots in disguise, Frenchmen and Spaniards. In an instant the court and city gates were shut, and the guards upon both doubled: the citizens were put under arms by the lord-mayor; and sir William Wade, lieutenant of the Tower, made all dispositions for preventing a surprize and standing a siege. The commons were sitting when, about eight in the morning, this alarm reached their house, and put a stop to all their business: sir Edwin Sandys, however, during this consternation gravely intimated to the house, that the king's murder might have been prevented, had the archbishop of Canterbury listened to his advice, to banish the papists twenty miles from London, during the session of parliament. In an hour or two after the report became less strong, and then doubtful; and sir Maurice Berkley and two other persons were dispatched immediately to know the truth. While this was passing within doors, the privy-council had assembled, and soon understanding the report to be groundless, published a proclamation to disabuse the people, and to prohibit all riotous assemblies. In a few hours James himself sent a message, that he was to be in London about two in the afternoon; and he was received at Hyde-park by the speaker of the house of commons, preceded by the mace, and all the members attending him. The city of London followed the example of the parliament; and, amongst other foreign ambassadors, the Spanish was so extravagantly joyful, that he presented sir Lewis Leucknor, master of the ceremonies, with a chain of gold worth six score pounds. Then James, having got all he wanted for the present, prorogued his parliament on the twenty-seventh of May to the eighteenth of November following.

The court cormorants rejoiced greatly at this large subsidy, sure of having it to divide among themselves; but they were miserably disappointed at seeing it consumed soon after in the court-entertainments made for the reception of Christian, king of Denmark, who came to England on the seventeenth of July, to visit the queen his sister and the king his brother-in-law; and for the prince of Vaudemont, the duke of Lorraine's third son, attended by seven earls, ten barons, forty gentlemen, and one hundred and twenty domestics.

The parliament meeting on the eighteenth of November, continued sitting till late in the summer of the following year, 1607. In this parliament king James renewed with more earnestness than ever, his solicitations with the two houses to agree to a union of England and Scotland; but the parliament was composed of members who were so little influenced by the court, that no arguments could prevail for it. The king finding them thus refractory, sent for both houses to attend him at Whitehall, and endeavoured, in a long speech, by far the best he ever made, to shew the necessity of the union, and the common advantage it would procure to both nations. However, this had no effect farther than to obtain a repeal of the hostile laws on the borders: and James was so exasperated at the opposition made to his favourite project, that he could not forbear loading those who were against the union with the epithets of blind, ignorant, restless, and disaffected; and from thenceforward shewed a great aversion to parliaments, and even tampered with his judges to countenance and determine actions in the King's Bench upon the authority of his proclamations only: and towards the end of June, 1607, he prorogued the parliament. The business of the commons was now become so complicated and important, that, in consequence of a proposal of sir Edwin Sandys, a member of great influence, the house entered, for the first time, an order for the regular keeping of their journals.

The puritans exerted themselves, as usual, in this session, in bringing in bills against pluralities, and for restraining the execution of ecclesiastical canons not confirmed by parliament; and moving for a toleration of the conventuous opposers of ceremonies, but without any effect. In the mean time an insurrection happened in the counties of Northampton, Warwick, and Leicester, the country-people pretending they were deprived of their rights of commoning, and gathering three or four thousand together, and sometimes double the number in a body, in order to demolish parks and inclosures; such were their feats for about a month that they roved about the country. A puritan minister, lately deprived, was said to be one of their chiefs; four or five of them went masqued, and otherwise disguised; but the principal ring-leader was one John Reynolds, called captain by his followers, which he boasted would enable him to defend them against all assailants. Proclamations were issued, ordering them to disperse; the high-sheriffs raised the posse of their counties against them, and broke them in some encounters, taking care to shed as little blood as possible. The king at last, by a proclamation on the twenty-eighth of June, expressing his unwillingness to proceed against them by martial law, and giving them hopes of mercy as well as redress of their grievances, they dispersed; and special commissions being issued for their trials, captain Pouch, and others of their ring-leaders, were convicted of high treason, and executed. This commotion was scarce quelled, when James, though no supply had been granted him in the late session, paid on the third of July, a debt of sixty thousand pounds, contracted by queen Elizabeth, who had borrowed that sum on the third of February, 1598, of the citizens of London, and had left it undischarged at her decease.

The disturbances in the middle of England were nothing in comparison of one that was going to break out in Ireland, where the earls of Tyrone and Tyrconnel, weary of a quiet and inactive life, had conspired to seize the castle of Dublin, and to make a general massacre of the English families settled in that realm; and had employed some Romish priests to treat with foreign princes for succours. Their design being discovered, a relation of the former was put upon commencing a suit against him for part of his estate; and the council of Ireland pretending the cause was too weighty or difficult for their decision, remitted it to that of England, in hopes that Tyrone might be drawn thither and clapped up in the Tower: the parties had notice to attend there with their title-deeds; but Tyrone excusing himself from the journey, offered to send his papers by a knight, who knew all his affairs. In the mean time, having secured a foreign vessel that had put into a port belonging to him, he got over to France; and procuring a pass from the government of Normandy, posted away for Brussels; but finding this place at that time not a proper asylum, he retired to Rome, where not long after he died.

In the beginning of this year, 1607, was begun a new translation of the Bible, which was published in 1611, and is the same that is now in common use.

The next year, 1608, began with the execution of George Jarvis, a seminary priest of Rheims, who was hanged for treason at Tyburn, on the eleventh of April; and Thomas Garret, a Jesuit, had the same fate on the twenty third of June, for refusing to take the oath of allegiance. This year also died Thomas Sackville, earl of Dorset, and was succeeded in his post of lord-treasurer by Robert Cecil, earl of Salisbury, a nobleman of great genius, and a fit instrument for the king's urgent occasions for money, who was extremely prodigal of the English money to his Scottish favourites. Amongst other means devised by the ministry to procure the necessary sums, they granted many monopolies, to the incredible loss of our woollen and other manufactures; they moreover obliged the Dutch to pay an annual acknowledgement for fishing on the coasts of Great Britain.

In the spring of the year 1609, after a long negociation, was concluded, by a truce of twelve years, under the guarantee of France and England, that war, which, for near half a century, had been prosecuted between Spain and the states of the United Provinces; that haughty monarchy, finding her trade entirely ruined, and her provinces exposed to the most imminent danger from the maritime forces of the states, at last consented to acknowledge them for a free people, whom she had so long treated as rebellious subjects, and solemnly to relinquish all pretensions to sovereignty over them.

This event proved a source of great mortification and dissatisfaction to James, who, on all occasions, condemned the Hollanders as rebels, it being his avowed maxim, in all debates concerning his prerogative, that subjects ought not to withdraw their allegiance from their prince upon any account whatever; he therefore considered this treaty as a dangerous precedent, and prejudicial to the sovereign authority of kings: this appeared more evidently at present by his licensing two books, which maintained most extravagant maxims of arbitrary power. The first, written by Dr. Cowel, of Cambridge, professor of the civil law and vicar-general to archbishop Bancroft, laid down these three principles: "1. That the king was not bound by the laws or his coronation-oath. 2. That the king is not obliged to call a parliament to make laws, but might do it alone by his absolute power. 3. That it was a great favour to admit the consent of the subject in giving subsidies." The other, wrote by Dr. Blackwood, a clergyman, laboured to prove that the English were all slaves by right of the Norman conquest.

By this time the immoderate expences of the court had emptied the Exchequer; and James, to recruit it, was obliged to have recourse to raising an aid from his subjects upon the stale pretence of an act of the twenty-fifth year of Edward III. for giving the king a reasonable aid upon making his eldest son a knight. But the money he raised in this manner being soon dissipated, and the household of prince Henry, who was now fifteen years of age, increasing, James was obliged to assemble his parliament on the ninth of February, 1610. The earl of Salisbury was ordered to demand the supply: in order to conciliate all their affections, he began with assuring them that his majesty was resolved to redress all their grievances; he then proceeded to explain the causes of the king's indigence, by observing that he had paid the debts of the late queen; that he had maintained an army of nineteen thousand men in Ireland; that he had expended great sums in the funeral of Elizabeth, in his own journey, and that of his queen and children, from Edinburgh to London; in entertaining the king of Denmark and the foreign ambassadors; in maintaining three courts, for himself, his consort, and the prince of Wales; in sending envoys to the different countries on the continent, and in liberalities to his officers and dependents; he launched out into extravagant encomiums upon the king's wisdom and probity, and declared that his majesty, far from intending to rule despotically, was ready to hear the remonstrances of his parliament, provided they would confine themselves within proper bounds, without deviating from that respect which was due to such a great and generous sovereign. Notwithstanding these professions, the members of the house of commons loudly complained of the king's prodigality and excessive profusion towards his own countrymen: others ventured to affirm, that his intention was to sap the privileges of the subject by gradual usurpation. He had been heard to declare at his own table, that the civil law of the Roman emperors ought to be substituted in the room of the common law of England; and approved of the treatise called the Interpreter, written by Dr. Cowel, on that subject; but the chief cause of their complaint was the high-commission court, which had exercised great severities against the puritans, whose party was espoused by a majority of the commons.

James being informed of these proceedings, had recourse to his own eloquence, which he thought irresistible, and required the attendance of the two houses at Whitehall on the twenty-first of March, where he talked to them, in a very high strain, of prerogative, a subject the reader will best understand by the following short extract: "As it is blasphemy (says he) to dispute what God may do, so it is seditious in subjects to dispute what a king may do in the height of his power." Then he tells them not to meddle with the main points of government; "for (says he) that is my craft, and it would be lessening me, who have been thirty years at the trade in Scotland, and served an apprenticeship of seven years here in England;" so that there did not want much penetration to perceive how distant the king's maxims of government, how artfully so ever palliated, were from the established constitutions of the land: if the whole speech should be examined, there is scarce a word but what tends, either plainly or ambiguously, to establish in the king an absolute despotic power. The English had not been used to hear their kings speak in such a style; and indeed the whole of this curious harangue was very ill calculated to sooth the animosity of the people.

The commons, however, though highly disgusted at some of the maxims he had broached, thought proper to dissemble their resentment, and express their willingness to comply with the king's desires. The earl of Salisbury moved for a conference with the commons, in order to obtain an adequate supply for his majesty's present occasions; as well as a grant for two hundred thousand pounds a year, for the future support of his royal dignity. The commons fired at this proposal, and voted only one subsidy and one fifteenth, which did not amount to the sixth part of what had been asked for the king's present occasions: they refused to settle any standing revenue, unless the king would would purchase it with some valuable consideration. They complained of respites of homages, and consented to settle an annual revenue of two hundred thousand pounds, provided wardships should be suppressed, purveyances should be abolished, and some farther privileges granted to the subject: but they afterwards rose in their demands, and insisted upon a redress of their grievances. They complained of the king's pretending that his proclamations ought to have the force of laws, and of the power arrogated by the high-commission court; and of his majesty's having altered the Book of Rates, and imposed new customs on certain species of merchandize; they petitioned, that nobody should lend money to the king, or give reason for his refusal: and having received divers messages, forbidding them to debate of his right of laying imposts, they represented, that it was their fundamental right to debate freely upon all matters that concerned the subject. They afterwards passed a bill against taxes and impositions on merchants and merchandize, but it was thrown out of the house of lords at the first reading. James, had he not been bound down by his wants, would have resented the proceedings of this parliament very highly; but he found he could not, without it, either pay his immense debts, or obtain a perpetual independent revenue, both which he earnestly desired, that he might be set free from the tutelage of parliaments, those obstacles to his immense profusion and boundless partiality.

Amongst the other occurrences which fell out in the course of this parliament, the creating the king's eldest son, Henry, prince of Wales, made a great noise. It appears, that several difficulties were started against this creation; and that, by the profusions of late reigns, the revenues of that principality were greatly diminished*. The debts of the crown were urged as so many reasons why the expences of the king ought not to be increased; and it was strongly insinuated to James, that by creating his son prince of Wales, and putting him in possession of a great independent state, the glory of the crown would be eclipsed; it was farther urged, that the jurisdiction of a prince of Wales, when exercised by him in person, would clash with that of the crown of England. What effect those objections had upon the mind of James, does not appear; but it is certain he created his son prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester; and that the sum of his revenues arising from thence, besides the vast privileges annexed to his dignities, amounted to fifty one thousand four hundred and fifteen pounds seventeen shillings and ten pence, besides two thousand pounds a year allowed him for collection, that the revenue might come clear into his own pocket; and seven thousand pounds given him by James, to purchase the great barony of Killingworth from sir Robert Dudley, son of the earl of Leicester.

Henry was a youth of very promising talents and an amiable character, by which he acquired the love and esteem of the English people: he spent his time in studies becoming a prince, and exercised himself in the most manly diversions. He possessed the advantage of a fine person, and there was a martial turn in his disposition that could not but be agreeable to a warlike nation. He kept his court at St. James's, while his mother resided at Somerset-house, where she lived at a great expence; so that James was obliged to maintain three separate households.

Differences now daily increasing between the king and his parliament, the latter was at length, on the twenty-third of July, prorogued to the sixteenth of October, parting equally dissatisfied with each other.

James had shut the temple of Janus in England, and was at peace with all the world. The eyes of all Europe were now fixed upon Henry IV. of France, who by his experience and good sense, was become one of the greatest politicians as well as generals of the age: he saw that while the house of Austria, through its widely-extended branches, was ever ready to embrace all opportunities of aggrandizing itself, France had every thing to fear from its ambition; and he had formed a noble project

* As this part of the English History, which relates to the constitution of the principality of Wales, appears to be very little known to the generality of our historiographers, we shall, from an original manuscript, written by prince Henry's order, give some account of it in this note.

Edward I. had, in his father's life-time, a jurisdiction in Wales; and when he came himself to the crown, in the twelfth year of his reign he obliged the barons, and other great men of that country, to do homage to his son, after making the policy of the country more analogous to that of England. Whether, in the twenty-ninth year of his reign, he created Wales into a principality by charter, is justly doubted; but it is certain, from the summonses to parliament, that Edward II. was earl of Chester. Edward III. in the seventeenth year of his reign, created his son, the famous Black Prince, prince of Wales; and with the principality, he gave him its revenues, together with the lands of Rice ap Marydick, who had been attainted. The same prince was likewise created duke of Cornwall, upon the death of his uncle, John of Eltham; and when he was no more than three years of age, he was made earl of Chester. Thus the whole revenue of the principality, the duchy, and the earldom, amounted to nine thousand nine hundred and eighty-two pounds twelve shillings and seven pence; as appears by a survey taken upon the death of this prince, in order to ascertain the jointure of his princess, which was to be one third of the whole. This was in those days an immense revenue, when we consider that the prince was at the same time duke of Aquitain; and descended to his son, afterwards Richard II. who died without issue. Henry IV. in the first year of his reign, created his son prince of Wales; and he had an especial seat in parliament on account of that principality: the prince, beside the dukedom of Cornwall and the earldom of Chester, had many additional lands granted him, besides those possessed by the Black Prince, and was duke of Lancaster besides. Henry VI. never was prince of Wales; but, in the thirty-second year of his reign, he made his eldest son prince of Wales, and earl of Chester; and next year duke of Cornwall. By act of parliament, the rents and profits of these lands were to accrue to the king, until the prince was fourteen years of age; but he was to enjoy one thousand pounds a year, for his necessary expences, till he was eight years of age; and two thousand marks a year after that, till he was fourteen. But, upon the claim of the house of York to the crown, that duke was, in Henry VI's time, created prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester, as being heir to the crown. Edward IV. was never prince of Wales; but, in the eleventh year of his reign, he created his son prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, earl of Chester, and earl of Pembroke, and appointed a council to manage his revenues till the prince was fourteen. The next prince of Wales was the son of Richard III. who died before his father: and Henry VII. in the fifth year of his reign, created his son Arthur prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester. It appears that the revenues of this prince were very great, and yearly increased by his father, who assigned him a council, for the better management of his principality, of which Dr. William Smith was the first president. Upon the death of Arthur, his brother Henry, afterwards Henry VIII. was made prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester; and the crown resumed the revenues of the duchy of York, upon his obtaining those of the dukedom of Cornwall. Dr. Powel, a great Welsh author, is of opinion, that Edward VI. never was created prince of Wales; but admits that his sister Mary was princess of Wales, and that the king made the bishop of Exeter president of her council.

for humbling that house. The succession to the duchies of Cleves and Juliers offered a fair opportunity of putting in practice what Henry appears to have long meditated, a general league amongst all the princes of Europe. The duke of Cleves dying on the twenty-fifth of March, 1609, his four sisters, or their heirs, claimed his inheritance, containing the duchies of Cleves and Juliers, the earldoms of la Mark, Bergh, Ravensburg, and Ravenstein. The chief competitors were, Wolfgang William, son to the duke of Newburg; John, duke of Deux Ponts; both of the Palatine family: John Sigismund, elector of Brandenburg; Christian II. elector of Saxony; and Charles of Austria, marquis of Burgaw. Whilst these princes contended for the succession, the emperor Rodolphus II. pretended it was to be committed to his trust till the affair should be decided: to that purpose he sent his letters to Leopold of Austria, bishop of Strasburg, who, entering the duchy of Juliers, at the head of an army, took the capital city, and placed a garrison in it. This proceeding convinced the elector of Brandenburg and the duke of Newburg, that, whilst they were contending about the succession to the duke of Cleves, they both ran the risk of losing it; they therefore joined in a league, and, taking possession of the deceased duke's dominions, implored the aid of France and Holland to support them. Henry IV. who had now made great preparations against the house of Austria, promised to assist them in person, and at the same time ordered the troops he had in Holland to be ready to join him in the duchy of Cleves, and desired the states to send thither prince Maurice, with part of their own forces. But all the great designs of Henry were blasted by his untimely death; for as he was preparing to follow his army, he was, after repeated warnings given him of his fate, stabbed in his coach by Ravallac, a desperate popish enthusiast†. This villain, on his examination, boldly confessed he did it because the king did not take arms against the Huguenots, and that his making war against the pope was the same as making war against God, "seeing the pope was God, and God was the pope." This discovery of the principles on which this regicide had been committed, was extremely disagreeable to James; and as the Jesuits were universally believed to be concerned in it, James, thinking it greatly behoved him to remove from his person men who held so detestable a doctrine, issued out a proclamation commanding all Jesuits and priests to depart the kingdom, and all recusants to keep themselves at the distance of ten miles from the court: then he caused the justices of peace in all the counties to administer the oath of allegiance which had passed in the third year of this reign, and which, without any regard to any particular religion, established the independency of the crown against the court of Rome and all other powers.

The best informed historians have not proved that any prince or state was privy to the design of the murderer, who took the whole upon himself; but it is certain that the zealots of the Roman catholic religion had ever looked upon Henry's conversion to it as a matter of policy and convenience in him; and when he came to declare so highly as he did in favour of the protestant interest in Germany, they were confirmed in their suppositions that he still remained in his heart an Huguenot. By a letter from Mr. Beecher, secretary to the English resident at Paris, we learn that the assassin had, some time before the murder, resided at Brussels, and this augmented the general opinion that the court of Spain was privy to Henry's death. James, however, did not believe it, or thought it adviseable to dissemble his real sentiments, being willing to gain the friendship of an house so formidable to the protestants, and sent sir Charles Cornwallis his ambassador, to negotiate a marriage between the prince of Wales and the king of Spain's eldest daughter.

The death of Henry, which happened on the third of May, deferred for a time, but did not prevent, the siege of Juliers, which was invested in the beginning of July by prince Christian of Anhalt, general of the army of the claimants and confederate princes, assisted by a body of Dutch troops under prince Maurice, four thousand English under the command of sir Edward Cecil, the earl of Salisbury's nephew, eight thousand French foot and two thousand horse commanded by the marshal de la Chatre: Rulenburg, the governor, surrendered it on the thirteenth of September; and the castle of Braidebant being also taken, the two claimants gained possession of the whole country.

About this time the protestant princes of Germany thought it necessary to enter into a more strict union, and a project was drawn up for that purpose by the duke of Wirtemberg. As the death of the king of France had entirely altered their system, they threw their eyes upon James as their chief protector, and sent to him the duke of Wirtemberg's project, both for his approbation and to try how far he would espouse their cause. Before this paper arrived in England, the queen-regent of France, Mary de Medicis, who had been so appointed during the minority of her son went before to clear the way, while the other stepped behind to tie his garter: Ravallac, who had followed the carriage, took this opportunity to perpetrate his shocking purpose; he mounted on the coach-wheel, and, with a long knife, sharp on both sides, struck the king over the shoulder of the duke d'Epemon. Henry exclaimed, "I am wounded!" The assassin repeated the blow with greater violence, and the knife, penetrating the thorax, divided the vena cava, so that the king expired immediately. Ravallac was not seen by any person while he perpetrated this atrocious murder; and if he had thrown down the knife under the coach, might have escaped unnoticed: but he stood on the wheel like a statue, with the bloody knife in his hand. A gentleman coming up, would have put him to death immediately, but the duke d'Epemon called aloud, "Save him, on your life!" and the miscreant was taken alive. Every body knows the nature of the torments to which this desperate fanatic was subjected. See Smollett's Notes to Voltaire, vol. v. p. 113.

† This infamous miscreant had for some time followed the king in his excursions, in quest of an opportunity of perpetrating his horrid purpose. That very morning he intended to stab him at the Feuillans, where he went to hear mass; but was hindered by the interposition of the duke de Vendôme. After dinner the king appeared extremely uneasy, and, leaning his head upon his hand, was heard to say "My God! what is this that will not suffer me to be at quiet!" About four in the afternoon he went into his own coach, with the duke d'Epemon, the duke de Monbazon, the marquis de la Force, marquis de Mirebeau, messieurs de Lavardin, Roquelaur, and Liancourt, and ordered the coachman to drive to the cross of Tiroy; from thence it proceeded to the church-yard of St. Innocent; then turning into the Rue de la Ferroniere, which was very narrow, there was a stop, occasioned by two loaded carts: the king had sent away his guards, and ordered the coach to be opened, that he might see the preparations for the queen's entry; all the pages had gone round another way, except two, one of whom

Lewis XIII. had intimated, by the French ambassador at London, the state of her affairs, and that the interest of her son's crown did not permit her to engage farther in the German war than was absolutely necessary, and therefore she wished that means might be found to prevent any farther hostilities. Though this declaration startled James, yet, in answer to the duke of Wirtemberg's project, he offered to enter into a league with the princes for six years, and to lend them four thousand men, or money to pay them, they promising to furnish him two thousand in case he was attacked. The court of France seems to have had no concern in this transaction, and found it their interest to court James to renew all his alliances with them: James, in consequence of this request, which was made by Boderie, the French ambassador, gave a commission to the earls of Salisbury, Northampton, Nottingham, and others, to treat with Boderie; and upon his paying to James sixty thousand pounds, a treaty was concluded ratifying all the former leagues, and stipulating particularly the quantity, the number, and the pay of the troops which each one was to send to the other's assistance. The lord Wotton was then appointed by James ambassador extraordinary to Paris, where he made a most magnificent entry, and received the queen's oath in confirmation of the late treaty.

But the magnificent embassies and splendid court of James demanded a farther supply of money than his revenues could furnish, and it was necessary that he should give leave for his parliament to meet on the sixteenth of October, when the great affair of the annual standing revenue was again brought upon the carpet, but neither party were able to finish the business on which they were so intent, and in which they were so deeply interested. The journals of that session are lost, so that we are at a loss to know the reason of this miscarriage: it only appears that James was highly displeased with the conduct of the parliament, and soon after dissolved it by a proclamation, dated the last day of December, 1610. This was his first parliament, and it lasted almost seven years.

We cannot in justice to James omit to mention, that he this year exerted a laudable care for the navigation and trade of the kingdom. Several useful discoveries were by him encouraged, large storehouses were erected, and naval architecture brought, under the king's direction, to greater perfection than it had ever been known in England, or perhaps in Europe. His care for the East India company deserves likewise the eternal gratitude of the English nation: this company, which had been incorporated by queen Elizabeth, had hitherto subsisted under great disadvantages, through the difficulty and length of their voyages, and the barbarous disposition of the inhabitants of those countries they had discovered; but the great profits of a fortunate voyage made it worth their trouble to apply to James for an enlargement of their charter, by which they proposed to increase the trade, the shipping, the mariners, the strength and wealth of the kingdom, and to deprive the Turks and Persians of the East Indian commerce. James entered into all these considerations with an attention becoming the father of his people, and granted them a perpetual charter, enlarging their patent, and enabling them to be a body corporate and politic: he also prohibited the importation of pepper by foreigners and by all but the East India company, and ordered that no retailer should sell pepper at above two shillings and six pence the pound at most. But James did not think it sufficient to advance the interest without adding to the dignity of trade; he graced the meetings of the company with his own presence, and that of his family; he attended at the launching of the largest ship that had ever been known in England, of the burden of twelve hundred tons, built by the same company; and he made a present to sir Thomas Smith, its governor, of a gold chain with his own picture, with many encomiums upon their laudable spirit, and exhortations to persevere in it. This condescension, in which James successfully imitated his illustrious predecessor, gave great encouragement to the company, and we find this year the great ship, with four others, sent out under sir Hugh Middleton, at the charge of one hundred thousand two hundred pounds; besides three other ships fitted out a few months after, at the expence of sixty thousand pounds more, under captain Sayres. The next spring, which was 1611, the same company fitted out four other ships, the largest of which was one thousand tons burden, and sent them under the command of captain Best, who established a very advantageous English settlement on the coast of Surat, and obtained a patent for holding it from the mogul himself.

The king having freed himself from the encumbrance of the parliament, and being determined never to call another, the courtiers highly applauded his design, as an absolute government was much more for their advantage than a government bounded by the laws, where the king depends in some measure upon the people: the whole court was overjoyed at the king's shaking off this troublesome yoke, and nothing was now heard there, but mirth and diversion. As the king, during his reign in Scotland, was hardly ever without a favourite, both the English and the Scots did all in their power to give him one in England, but hitherto all their endeavours had proved abortive: James's taste was very different from that of most other princes; neither virtue, merit, nor eminent qualities had any charms for him; something external and dazzling, as youth, gracefulness of person, elegance of dress, were the only things to captivate him. At last, however, the lord Hay introduced to him Robert Carr, a young Scottish gentleman, of an ancient family, who had formerly been a page of honour to him in Scotland; and now James's remembrance of him was renewed by his happening to break his leg by a fall from an unruly horse, as he was presenting his majesty with his shield at a tournament. James conceived an unusual pity at this accident; he visited the unfortunate youth while he lay ill of his fracture; and so rapid was the progress of his passion, that, upon his recovery, he became the growing favourite at court. It is hard to say, whether those who introduced him at the tournament did it by accident or design, but they could hardly have employed a more fit person than Carr was, for engaging the affection of James. His person was handsome, and his years not above twenty; he was extremely ambitious, but profoundly ignorant; his passions were strong enough, though his dissimulation was deep; and the rest of his character was compounded of ill applied capacity, excessive insolence, inhuman ingratitude, itude, and every species of wickedness. The first distinction that James bestowed upon him was knighthood; honours and riches were then heaped upon him, and he quickly became the channel through which all favours passed between the king and his subjects. On the ninth of April, 1611, he was made viscount Rochester; on the eighteenth of May following he was, with the duke of York and the earl of Arundel, installed knight of the Garter; upon the death of the earl of Dunbar, he became the unrivalled favourite of James, to the no small distaste of the English nobility.

But we are now to behold all James's attention engrossed by another favourite subject, of a very different nature, and the most absurd and the most foreign to the character of a king that can be imagined; of which it is necessary to give some account, because it gave rise to some of the most considerable events in Europe. The famous preacher Arminius, at Amsterdam, had been chosen divinity-professor at Leyden, and had been accused by the Calvinists with teaching absurd doctrines concerning free-will and predestination. Before his death, which happened in 1608, his party remained possessed of the field of disputation, and his chair was filled by Vorstius, who had published several treatises in defence of the Arminian principles; and as he differed from his Britannic majesty in some abstruse points concerning the intimate essence and secret decrees of God, he was regarded as a dangerous rival in scholastic fame, and was, at last, compelled to yield to the legions of that royal doctor, whose syllogism he might have refuted or eluded. If James wanted vigour in other incidents of his reign, he behaved here even with arrogance and presumption; and the states were forced, after several remonstrances, to deprive Vorstius of his office, and to expel him from their dominions.

The king desisted from any farther persecution against that professor; though he very charitably hinted to the states, "that, as to the burning of Vorstius for his blasphemies and atheism, he left it entirely to their own Christian wisdom; but never surely did heretic better deserve the flames." The states, however, had too much sense and humanity to understand his majesty's hint; and they even procured for the ejected professor a chair in another university. All this exertion in James, a prince of remarkable indolence, who had already treated transubstantiation and the number of the sacraments as scholastic questions of little consequence to salvation, is not to be accounted for but from his vanity and self-conceit: he thought himself the most able theologian in the world; and after he had signified his sentiments on this dispute, he could not brook the last opposition. Perhaps too he was influenced by motives of resentment against pensionary Barnevelt, the patron of Vorstius, whom he treated as a rank republican.

No transaction of this reign reflected so much honour on the sovereign as did the settlement of Ireland, in which James had been seriously engaged ever since his accession to the crown of England. He began with passing an act of oblivion, to quiet the minds of the people; he took them into his protection, and indulged them with the benefit of the English laws; and caused justice to be administered to them with the utmost impartiality: Wexford, Tyrone, Tyrconnel, the northern parts of Ulster, half Connaught, and all Munster, were divided into counties, supplied with sheriffs and justices of the peace, and the judges made their circuits regularly twice every year. The lords chieftains made a surrender of their lands to the crown; and, before they were re-granted, all oppressive exactions were abolished. The Irish duties, rents, and services, were valued, and reduced to certain sums of money, on payment of which the tenants possessed their lands in security, so that the most miserable slavery was succeeded by wealth and independence. Tyrone, Tyrconnel, O'Dogharty, and other rebellious chieftains having forfeited their possessions, together with Ardmagh, Cavan, Derry, Donnegal, and Fermanagh, which had been escheated to the crown, were granted out in different portions to English, Scottish, and Irish adventurers, in order to be properly cultivated. These undertakers obliged themselves to make certain improvements; and, in a word, such measures were taken, that Ulster, the wildest part of Ireland, became one of the best cultivated countries in Europe.

During the great tranquility enjoyed by James, he caused the body of his mother, Mary late queen of Scots, to be removed, in the spring of 1612, to Henry VII's chapel at Westminster, from Peterborough, where it was interred after her decapitation, and had lain ever since.

About the middle of the same year James had an opportunity to exhibit an agreeable specimen of impartiality, in the execution of Robert Creighton, lord Sanquhar, a Scottish nobleman, who had basely assassinated one Turner, his fencing-master. In vain did Abbot, then archbishop of Canterbury, and other gentlemen, intercede for him; the king observing how much the English were provoked at his attachment to his countrymen, prudently sacrificed him to their resentment.

Shortly after a very extraordinary embassy arrived in England. Sir Robert Shirley, an Englishman, who had served the king of Persia many years in his army, desiring to see his native country, obtained of that monarch the character of ambassador, and a letter of credit to the king. His instructions were only to pay his compliments to the king, with the offer of a free trade to the English throughout the Persian dominions. The ambassador had passed through the Hague, where he demanded audience of the states, to propose to them a treaty with the king of Persia; but because he came from Spain, where he had made some stay, the states suspected he had some other design, demanded to see his instructions, and upon his scrupling to produce them, he was desired to withdraw. As he had been also at other courts, it was believed he had put the king of Persia in hopes of engaging all the Christian princes in a war with the Turks, who were preparing to invade him. He had married a Persian lady, who was delivered of a son in England, to whom the queen stood god-mother, and prince Henry god-father. After a year's stay in England, he returned to Persia.

The great noise made by the arrival of this ambassador was, however, far exceeded by that of Frederic V. elector Palatine, who, in consequence of a treaty of marriage which had been some time negotiating between him and the princess Elizabeth, James's daughter, came over to England on the sixteenth of October this year. He was received with the greatest respect, and for some time nothing was seen at court but entertainments and diversions sions on his account. But amidst the universal joy which this marriage occasioned, the prince of Wales was attacked with a distemper which at first was not thought dangerous: he was seized with it a few days before the elector's arrival, but believed it of so little consequence, that he accompanied him every where for some time, and was not confined to his bed till the twenty-fifth of the same month. He died on the sixth of November, being eighteen years eight months and seventeen days old, and was buried at Westminster on the seventh of December following. His funeral charges amounted to sixteen thousand and sixteen pounds.

Some authors would insinuate that the king caused him to be poisoned; but as there are no clear proofs of this, or, indeed, hardly the slightest presumptions, it probably proceeded entirely from malice. Others are content with accusing the viscount Rochester of this crime, but without any manner of proof. However, as a proof of this nature was spread immediately after the prince's death, his head and body were ordered to be opened, in presence of many physicians and surgeons, who gave their opinion, upon oath, that no signs of poison appeared: but what reflected most upon the king, was his commanding that no person should appear at court in mourning; probably he was willing to remove from his sight all melancholy objects that might renew his grief, or determined not to interrupt the preparations for his daughter's marriage; decency, however, obliged him, to defer the nuptials for a few weeks.

The great application which Salisbury gave to business had such an effect on his health, that, in the beginning of this year, he was seized with a disorder that finished his days on the fourteenth of May. His death proved a great misfortune to James, who in him lost a very able minister, and one perfectly well acquainted with the affairs of state and the genius of the English nation. He was a check to the rest of the ministers, and hindered them from running upon precipices, the danger whereof they were not so well acquainted with: he had also a wonderful talent of diverting the king himself from dangerous resolutions; though it must be granted that he did not always succeed. According to Weldon, he was a man of great parts, very wise, full of honour and bounty, a great rewarder and lover of virtue and merit in others, if they did not aspire at too great places.

The beginning of the year 1613 was wholly spent in preparations for the princess's marriage, which was solemnized on the fourteenth of February, the elector having been, on the seventh, installed knight of the Garter. Nothing was spared to render the entertainments on these occasions as magnificent as possible: in order to this the king demanded an aid of money from his subjects, in conformity to a custom anciently observed, when the king married his eldest daughter, though an hundred years had elapsed since this custom had been used, there having been no occasion since the reign of Henry VII. However, few or none dared to refuse complying with the king's command: by this means twenty thousand five hundred pounds were raised, and all expended in the marriage.

During the stay of the elector and his consort in England, which was till April, there was nothing but entertainments, balls, masquerades, and other diversions: the city of London entertained the new-married couple at a splendid feast, after which the lord-mayor and aldermen presented the bride with a chain of oriental pearl, worthy the grandeur and riches of that metropolis: Stowe says it cost upwards of two thousand pounds.

Soon after the elector and his spouse embarked at Margate, and in four days landed at Flushing. He behaved during his stay in England, so nobly and discreetly, in all respects, that he gained the general applause and love of all men, and gave away to the full value of one hundred and twenty thousand French crowns. The king was not behind the Palatine in magnificence, and the total of the marriage, including the princess's portion, cost him ninety-three thousand two hundred and seventy-eight pounds. The nation, however, was so well pleased with the match, which promised the greatest advantages to the protestant interest in Europe, that all impositions to defray this immense expence were cheerfully bore by the public; and in the spring of this year the old earl of Nottingham, lord high-admiral, attended the princess to Germany, with a gallant train of English nobility and gentry. At the departure of the elector and electress, the court was rendered more quiet, with regard to public rejoicings, which had continued several months without interruption; but at the same time a private scene was acting, the plots whereof began this year to open: I mean the annulling the marriage of the earl of Essex with his countess, that lady's second marriage with Robert Carr, viscount Rochester, the king's favourite, and the violent death of sir Thomas Overbury. In order to set these incidents in a clear light, it will be requisite to relate some things already passed, which we purposely deferred, that the thread of this extraordinary story might not be interrupted.

The late earl of Essex, to whom Robert Cecil, earl of Salisbury, was a mortal enemy, and one of the chief instruments of his ruin, left a son, who, being but nine years old, gave Cecil little uneasiness, though the king, on his coming to England, had restored him to his paternal honours and estates. However, the sharp-sighted Cecil was apprehensive that some time or other he might be called to an account for his proceedings against that nobleman; therefore, in order to preserve the king's favour, he judged it necessary to unite closely with the Howard family, by marrying his own son, Edward Cecil, viscount Cranburn, to the lady Catherine, third and youngest daughter to the earl of Suffolk; and as the young earl of Essex began to grow towards man's estate, he looked upon it as necessary for him to be reconciled to that young lord; with which view he completed a match between him and the lady Frances Howard, the earl of Suffolk's second daughter: thus the three families of Cecil, Devereux, and Howard, were united in the strictest connexion. But as the earl of Essex and his bride, at the time of their marriage, were thought too young for cohabitation, the earl was sent on his travels, and in the Low Countries he had an opportunity of completing himself in the art of war, in which he afterwards made so great a figure. Upon his return he found his countess the most finished beauty of the age, as he himself, now about twenty years old, was one of the most promising young noblemen in Europe; but he was ignorant that the lord Rochester was his rival in the heart of his lovely bride. In effect the young favourite pre-fuming on his great power, had the impudence to solicit the lady to criminal love, and she the weakness privately to yield to his addresses. The return of Essex in the preceding year interrupted the enjoyment of the two lovers; that nobleman, fired with the charms of his young consort, claimed the privilege of a husband with all the impatience of youthful ardour; but, to his inexpressible disappointment and mortification, when he approached her he met with nothing but coldness and indifference, and a flat refusal of any intimate freedoms. Provoked at this unaccountable behaviour, which he for some time exerted all his endeavours to alter, he at last abandoned the attempt, and, separating from his wife, left her to follow her own will and inclination: to this, indeed, he was particularly induced by having discovered her intrigue with Rochester, which became every day, more and more notorious.

But the countess, not satisfied with being the mistress of Rochester, eagerly wished to become his wife; and being by this time lost to all manner of shame, she prevailed on her paramour to use his influence with the king to procure for her a divorce from Essex. Rochester imparted this scheme to sir Thomas Overbury, who had for nine years been his most intimate friend and monitor. That faithful counsellor was alarmed at the proposal, and employed every argument that the nature of circumstances offered, to divert his friend from so foolish and base an attempt; and, in the warmth of his honest expostulations, went so far as to threaten Rochester that he would break off all correspondence with him, if he could so forget his honour and interest as to prosecute the intended marriage with so abandoned a woman. Rochester had the weakness to impart this conversation to the countess, who instantly vowed vengeance on this bold arraigner of her honour and conduct; and the favourite was by this time so infatuated by her charms, that he joined with her in resolving the ruin of Overbury. With this view he went to the king, and, after extolling Overbury's abilities, took occasion to insinuate that he was grown of late insupportably insolent, and therefore requested that he might be removed by some honourable employment, such as being sent ambassador to the court of France or Brussels, or, as others say, to that of Russia. James, far from suspecting the truth, instantly appointed Overbury to the embassy: this latter, on receiving notice of his appointment, consulted with Rochester how he should proceed, as he looked upon this as no better than a genteel banishment from the court, Rochester, under pretence of not being able to support his absence, persuaded him to reject the proffered mission; and then posting away to the king, represented this refusal as such an instance of insolence and disrespect, that James, who could not brook the slightest contempt of his authority or power, gave an order for committing the unhappy Overbury prisoner to the Tower, the lieutenancy of which had been lately bestowed on sir Jervaise Elwis, one of the favourite's creatures.

The troublesome counsellor being thus removed, and sequestered from all intercourse with his friends and acquaintance, the earl of Northampton, who had been brought over to favour the designs of his niece and Rochester, solicited the king in behalf of the countess, who demanded a divorce from her husband, the pretence of which was his incapacity to fulfil the conjugal duties; and the earl, who was willing to embrace any decent opportunity of separating from so profligate a woman, readily acknowledged, upon the trial, that, with regard to the countess, he was conscious of such an infirmity, though he was not sensible of it with regard to any other woman. A jury of matrons was impanelled to inspect the countess, who reported her a virgin. In consideration of her great modesty, she obtained permission to appear before them with a veil, and it is said a young woman of her own shape and stature was substituted, and underwent the examination in her place. The confession of the husband, and the report of the matrons, were deemed sufficient reasons to declare the marriage a nullity*.

After such a trial, assisted by court-influence, and supported by the ridiculous opinion of fascination and witchcraft, the sentence of divorce was awarded between the earl of Essex and his lady; and the king not only gave his favourite leave to marry the countess, but also created him earl of Somerset, on the fourteenth of November this year, that her second husband might be of equal rank with the first. The nuptials were solemnized in the most ostentatious manner, in the beginning of the following month, and nothing was now wanting to complete their triumph but the death of Overbury, without which that implacable woman could not be satisfied; and she engaged her husband, as well as her uncle the earl of Northampton, in the atrocious design of taking him off secretly by poison. Many attempts were made for this purpose, but the strength of Overbury's constitution as often rendered them abortive, till at last nature gave way to the repeated attacks, and the unhappy gentleman died in the Tower by an envenomed clyster. He was buried in the place of his confinement with the greatest dispatch and secrecy, under pretence that he died of such a loathsome disease as rendered his corpse unfit to be seen; and although it occasioned a strong suspicion immediately in the public, the crime was not discovered till some years after. It is but doing justice to the memory of James to say, that he was imposed upon by the artifices of Rochester and the Howard family in the whole of this black affair: he indeed had been a little too forward in the matter of the divorce between the earl of Essex and the countess; but it was no wonder if, when he saw himself supported by the opinions of his nobility, his clergy, and his lawyers, he too readily gave way to a sentence which completed the happiness of a favourite, whom he so entirely loved as he did Rochester; and that he was struck with terror when he discovered that he had been unwittingly made the promoter of such a scene of barbarity.

It was now four years since the king had called a parliament, and it was a great comfort to him to have no disputes with the house of commons, ever ready to complain of grievances, and take occasion to examine the conduct of the sovereign or his mi-

* The archbishop of Canterbury was the only person of note who was dissatisfied with the sentence of divorce. Bilson, bishop of Winchester, having strenuously supported its expediency, his son was knighted, by the interest of Rochester, and ever after distinguished in derision by the name of sir Nullity Bilson.

nifters. He was much better satisfied with governing absolutely, though this was attended with very great inconvenience: he was continually obliged to invent new methods to raise money, which, being founded on absolute authority, produced murmurs and complaints amongst the people; neither did these methods bring in sufficient sums for the king's occasions, who loved magnificence, and was always fond of giving. Hence sprung his wants, which incessantly increased, his revenues, as well ordinary as extraordinary, not being sufficient to defray his expences.

The king being thus continually reduced to straits, he had at last recourse to a project formed by the late earl of Salisbury, namely, to create knights baronets, a kind of middle nobility between barons and knights bachelors: their number was not to exceed two hundred, but the king at first made but ninety, of whom sir Nicholas Bacon, of Redgrave in Suffolk, was the first. To purchase this honour, which was to be hereditary, every baronet was obliged to pay to the king a thousand pounds; but, in order to give some colour to this new institution, every baronet was obliged by his patent to maintain thirty foot-soldiers in Ireland for three years, at eight pence per diem each soldier; afterwards it was hinted to them, that if they would compound with the king, and pay the whole sum at once, part should be abated, and the king would maintain his troops in Ireland himself, and every one accepted this offer. There were also other methods made use of to fill the king's coffers, without being obliged to have recourse to parliament; each rank of nobility had its price affixed to it; privy-seals were issued to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds; benevolences were demanded, to the amount of fifty-two thousand pounds; and some monopolies of no great value were established.

Though the earl of Somerset looked upon it as a great advantage to have dispatched Overbury, yet he found himself much more embarrassed in the management of affairs since he was no longer assisted by that faithful counsellor. As his small experience rendered every thing difficult, he grew completely odious at the court of England; and though the king's partiality continued, yet his insolence and weakness gave his enemies such advantage, that it soon appeared he must be removed. Somerset's favour, however, with the king, appeared so great, that none durst openly attack him; and, on the death of the earl of Northampton, which happened in the following year, Thomas Howard, earl of Suffolk, his brother, was made lord high-treasurer, whilst the favourite succeeded Suffolk as lord-chamberlain. Somerset had been for some time labouring to bring about a match between Charles, now prince of Wales, and a daughter of France, and this negociation had been carried on with such great secrecy, that scarcely a lord of the English court knew any thing of it before Edmonds, the English ambassador at Paris, brought the proposal over to England in his pocket, ready to be signed. This gave infinite disgust to the lords of the council, and they made so violent an opposition to the match, that James saw he must either break with his favourite or his council: in proportion as the favourite's interest secretly or visibly declined, the necessity of calling a parliament appeared the stronger, all the money raised by loans, benevolences, and the sale of the new order of baronetage, being now spent*.

James, who heartily hated the nonconformists, readily listened to a proposal for sending them out of the kingdom, by transporting them to the wastes of America, belonging to, but not cultivated by, the English: several ships were accordingly freighted, some by the government, and some by private persons, for carrying over adventurers or planters; and great numbers at this time entered themselves for Newfoundland and Virginia. But the clergy were not fond of those colonies, and represented them to James as so many seminaries of puritanism, which would in time form not only a separate church, but a separate state; James therefore, after several ships full had gone, ordered those who were on board other ships to be stopped, and examined concerning their principles, and, upon their not giving satisfaction, they were restrained from going abroad: but James lived long enough to see the ill effects of this caution, and, when it was too late, would gladly have retrieved his error.

On the fifth of August, 1614, the new parliament met; the ministry had exerted their utmost efforts in order to procure a majority in the house of commons; but the measures of the court were so generally disagreeable to the nation, that all their endeavours proved ineffectual, and, instead of granting a supply as desired by the king, who made them several cajoling offers of grace, they resumed the subject which had been canvassed in the last parliament, and declaimed against the regal usurpation in levying new customs and impositions by the mere authority of prerogative. To prevent, if possible, the like practice for the future, they applied to the lords for a conference on this topic, in order to concert measures for securing the liberty of the subject, and circumscribing the exorbitant and unlimited power of the crown. James, informed of this circumstance, immediately dissolved the parliament (on the seventh of June), after a session of about two months, wherein not one statute was enacted; and he even carried his resentment so far as to imprison some of the members, who had been most forward in the opposition; a step by which he exposed himself still farther to the hatred of the nation.

Soon after the dissolution of the parliament, the king of Denmark came to England on a second visit to his sister and brother-in-law; but having a mind to surprize them, he came privately and with a small company, so that he appeared before the queen at Somerset-house most unexpectedly. But James being then on a progress in Bedfordshire, and hearing of his arrival, came presently back; and, after he had entertained his royal guest with all the diversions his court could afford, prince Charles, on the first of August, conducted him on board his ship, and he returned home.

* His frantic liberality went so far as to give sir Henry Rich, afterwards earl of Holland, then a young man, distinguished by no merits or service, three thousand pounds in specie, which was carrying to the privy-purse, for no other reason but because Rich, as the money was passing by, was heard to say, such a sum would make him very happy. James was much delighted in reporting, or hearing that others reported, those acts of his generosity; but the nation thought he had no right to be lavish at their expence.

The king of Denmark had not long departed, when an ambassador arrived from the czar of Muscovy, to desire the mediation of James in a quarrel between him and the king of Sweden.

This year is remarkable for the completion of two projects which proved of great advantage to the city of London: the one was performed by sir Hugh Middleton, citizen and goldsmith of London, a native of Denbighshire, who having the authority of parliament for his warrant, with infinite cost and indefatigable labour brought water to the city from the two great springs of Chadwell and Amwell, in Hertfordshire, having cut a channel from thence to a place near Islington, where he conveyed it to a large reservoir (now called the New River Head), and from thence in wooden pipes to all parts of the city. The other project was about this time completed on the north side of London, called Moorfields, which being before environed with stinking ditches and unhealthy common-sewers, was now not only entirely cleansed from its collection of filth, but levelled and formed into gravel-walks, adorned with handsome rows of trees, that rendered it the most healthy and pleasant place in the city. The next year also brought an addition of beauty and benefit to the capital, by the paving of Smithfield, which was before a miserable dirty place, and the separating the middle part of it by rails into a fair walking place, fit for a market, or any other use. This year also the lady Arabella Stuart, a near kinswoman to the king, who had some time before, without the king's privity, secretly married William Seymour, the earl of Hertford's youngest son, for which they were both committed to the Tower, ended her life there, and was buried in the chapel royal of Westminster.

Hitherto the earl of Somerset had been in so full possession of the king's heart, that the queen herself began to be alarmed, and conceived a violent hatred against him. Whether the king's fondness for him had been the occasion of her aversion, or that she suspected him of having been concerned in the death of her son, prince Henry, she resolved, if possible, to effect his ruin: for this purpose she interested in her resentment sir Ralph Winwood, who enjoyed the title of secretary of state, though all the functions of that office were discharged by the express direction of Somerset: Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, was also drawn in to join in the scheme for ruining the favourite: he was a well-meaning prelate, a most zealous enemy to popery, and had conceived an insuperable disgust to Somerset on account of the match which that minister had proposed between the prince of Wales and a daughter of France. After many consultations upon the means of effecting the downfall of this object of their aversion, it was concluded on all hands, that none carried so fair a prospect of success as to introduce to the king a new minion, which was George Villiers, a youth of one-and-twenty, younger brother of a good family, returned at this time from his travels, and distinguished by the advantages of an handsome person, genteel air, and elegant dress; snares which they knew the weak heart of James could never resist. Their scheme was crowned with the desired success; James beheld this gaudy object at a comedy which was acted at Cambridge, in the beginning of the year 1615, where he was placed full in the royal eye, and immediately engaged the attention, and in the same moment the affection, of the monarch. The junto perceived that James was touched; they followed their success; even the queen and the grave primate themselves condescended to recommend the young man to the king's farther notice, who, overjoyed to receive this sanction to his wishes, no longer restrained his affections, but, calling Villiers to court, knighted him, and appointed him gentleman of the bed-chamber, into which office he was sworn on the tenth of April, and had a yearly pension of a thousand pounds assigned him. Here he daily stole the hearts of the courtiers and petitioners from his rival, by his noble and generous way of promoting their suits, and James's fondness for him was carried even to a degree of folly; but still he thought it requisite to keep up some shew of complacency for Somerset, his natural pusillanimity making him fearful of pushing things to extremity with a favourite who was master of most of his private thoughts and actions.

Somerset, however, now looked upon himself as irretrievably lost in the affections of his royal master, and thought it prudent, upon pretexts that may be easily guessed, to solicit James for pardon. James consented, and the drawing the pardon was left to the care of sir Robert Cotton; who, copying after a pardon granted by Henry VIII. to Wolsey, drew it up with the following clause, "that the king, out of his mere motion and special favour, did pardon all and all manner of treasons, misprisions of treason, murders, felonies, and outrages whatsoever, by the said Robert, earl of Somerset, committed or to be hereafter committed." This pardon, after being signed by the king, was carried to the great seal, where it stuck; for the lord-chancellor Bacon, who was Somerset's enemy, refused to pass it, and informed the queen of the contents. Upon consultation, the whole party against Somerset concluded they must now make their last push; and the plot now thickened so much, that in every company dark, though confident, surmises were heard, that Overbury had been poisoned, and by those whose greatness set them above the stroke of justice.

Winwood, the secretary of state, had come to the knowledge of Overbury's murder by the apothecary's boy, who had been employed in the affair of the poisoned clyster, and had fled to Flushing, where falling sick, he discovered all he knew of the matter to some correspondent of Winwood. This latter had for some time prudently concealed his intelligence, as a discovery, which, if unseasonably made, might have overwhelmed himself; but now he made no secret of what the boy had confessed: his discoveries were confirmed by some conversation he had with the countess of Shrewsbury, a prying intriguing lady, and then a prisoner in the Tower on account of the lady Arabella Stuart's marriage. This lady had rendered herself so intimate with sir Jervaise Elwis, that she drew from him part of the secret, which she whispered so artfully about, that, before any durst name Somerset, Elwis was charged with being an accomplice in Overbury's murder. It was not long before this reached the ears of James; and the lieutenant being questioned on the fact, could not help being visibly shocked; and acknowledged that he did indeed know of some attempts made against Overbury. James, upon this, ordered one of the privy-council to take, under the lieutenant's own hand, all he knew of the matter: which being brought to court, Weston, who had given Overbury the poison in tarts and jellies, and at last in a clyster, Mrs. Turner, who was the chief counsellor to the countess of Somerset, Franklin the apothecary, who had prepared the poison, and sir Jervaise Elwis, lieutenant of the Tower, were ordered to be apprehended: and soon after, with the king's privy, a warrant was made out for arresting Somerset and his countess; and they, with the other accomplices in Overbury's murder, were, upon the fullest evidence and most impartial trial, convicted of that dreadful act. Sir Jervaise Elwis, Weston, Turner, and the rest, suffered the punishment due to their crime; but the king granted a pardon to the principals, Somerset and his countess; and, to mitigate the severity of their fall, after some years imprisonment, he restored them to their liberty, and indulged them with a pension, upon which they retired into the country, and languished out old age in infamy and obscurity; for their guilty loves were converted into most deadly hatred, and they lived several years in the same house, without any intercourse or correspondence with each other.

Having thus finished this disagreeable subject, which has carried the narrative twelve months too forward, I now resume the thread of the history.

The marriage of the young king of France, Lewis XIII. with the princess Anne of Austria being solemnized in the year 1615, James sent ambassadors to France and Spain, to congratulate the two kings. The lord Hay, a Scotch nobleman, was made choice of for the French embassy, and the lord Rofs for the Spanish: they had both orders to sound the two courts with regard to the prince of Wales's marriage, either with the princess eldest sister of Lewis XIII. or with the infanta Maria, daughter of Philip III. The lord Hay soon discovered that his negotiation would be fruitless, because the princess of France was already promised to the prince of Piedmont, son to the duke of Savoy.

During these transactions, and before the lord Rofs arrived in Spain, sir John Digby, his majesty's ambassador to Philip III. informed the king that the duke of Lerma had made an overture of marriage between the infanta Maria and the prince of Wales, desiring private instructions on this head; accordingly he sent orders to sir John Digby to begin the negotiations with Spain. At the same time count Gondemar, the Spanish ambassador in England, received a commission to treat with the king concerning the marriage.

King James had no sooner taken this resolution than his extreme desire of accomplishing it grew too strong to be concealed; hence he gave occasion to the Spaniard, who had then no design to treat seriously of this affair, to feign that he passionately wished to conclude it to his satisfaction, in order to gain considerable advantages for the house of Austria and the catholic religion.

Whilst the king was entirely taken up with this marriage, his ministers were devising new methods to raise money; but all means seemed to be exhausted, and a parliament could not safely be called, the wound of the imprisoned members being still too fresh to hope it was yet healed. Mean while the above treaty of the prince of Wales's marriage with the infanta procured an unexpected supply: queen Elizabeth had settled with the states of the United Provinces the arrears they owed her, which amounted to eight millions of florins, which sum became due to James as her successor: the states would long since have paid this debt, had they not found their account in remaining debtors to England, as they by this means engaged the kingdom to support them. But having made a truce with the king of Spain, they no longer wanted the protection of the English, and being encouraged by the present necessitous condition of James's finances, they employed Carou, their minister at London, to offer a little more than a third of the sum that was owing to England, and which amounted in the whole to eight hundred and eighteen thousand four hundred and eight pounds, on condition that the king would restore the three important fortresses of Flushing, the Brille, and Rammekins, which had been delivered by the states to Elizabeth, as pledges for the money she had advanced them; at the same time Carou intimated, that the states would do their utmost in time to discharge the whole debt: this intimation had the desired effect; the king having no money, and there being a prospect of drawing a much larger sum from the states, readily determined him to grant their request, and the cautionary towns were accordingly delivered on the fourteenth of June. From this period we may date the full liberty of the Dutch commonwealth.

This money in a short time was vanished without the least possibility of guessing what was become of it: none of the king's debts were paid, the navy was suffered to decay for want of money to repair it, and nothing had been sent to the army in Ireland, which had not received a penny for several years, and whose wants were made use of as a pretence to treat with the states.

At length it was discovered that the lord-treasurer Suffolk had converted great part of the money received from the states to his own use. As he was father-in-law to the earl of Somerset, and consequently no friend to the favourite, this opportunity was readily embraced; the lord-treasurer was therefore accused in the Star-chamber of sundry misdemeanors in the execution of his office, and particularly with having secreted part of the money recovered from the states: sir Edward Coke, who was again reconciled to the king, was his accuser; he aggravated his misdemeanors, his extortions, his mismanagement of the king's treasure, his boldness in applying it to his own use, the corruptions of his countess, who took bribes with both hands, and the artifices of his deputy Bingley, to ensnare such as had business with his master; after that, he urged many precedents of treasurers who had been punished for slighter crimes than those of the earl of Suffolk, and shewed the dangerous consequences resulting from the ill administration of the treasurer-ship when managed by corrupt persons. Had the lord-treasurer thrown himself upon the king's mercy, he would have been easily acquitted; but he endeavoured to justify himself, and not succeeding to the satisfaction of his judges, he was fined thirty thousand pounds, and condemned to imprisonment during the king's pleasure, and Bingley was fined two thousand pounds.

After the fall of Somerset the royal favour was wholly engrossed by the youthful Villiers, who began the first exertion of his influence by filling all the places about court with his own creatures, so that the dependants of the old minister were dismissed of course. It was in the beginning of Villiers's ministry nistry that lord chief-justice Coke was divested of his office on pretence of some trivial misdemeanors, though the real cause of his disgrace was his opposing the king in bestowing a vacant bishopric in commendam. His place was filled by Montagu; and the lord-chancellor Ellesmere being seized with a dangerous illness, resigned the seals into the hands of his majesty, who kept them till the death of Ellesmere, and then they were given to Bacon, who was afterwards promoted to the dignity of chancellor. He was an able lawyer, an excellent philosopher, but abject, irresolute, and of an unguarded disposition, which was practised upon to the prejudice of his character. In the course of this year the king's only surviving son, Charles, was created prince of Wales. On the twenty-seventh of August Villiers was created baron of Whaddon and viscount Villiers; and on the first of January following earl of Buckingham; he was afterwards raised to the title of marquis and duke of Buckingham, installed knight of the Garter, appointed master of the horse, chief-justice in eyre, warden of the Cinque Ports, steward of Westminster, constable of Windsor, and lord high-admiral of England: his mother was created countess of Buckingham, his brother viscount Purbeck, and a numerous train of his needy relations were brought into places of trust and profit.

Though king James, upon the death of queen Elizabeth and his accession to the crown of England, came to reside here, yet he forgot not that Scotland was his native country; and therefore, having now spent some years among his English subjects, to acquaint himself with the state of their constitution, in March this year, 1616, he made a journey into Scotland; for though he had left very able ministers to sit at the helm there in his absence, yet, having formed a scheme of reducing the Scottish clergy to a conformity with the English church, he thought his presence absolutely necessary for that purpose. He had sent the following articles to be inserted in their canons: "I. That they should receive the communion kneeling. II. That the sacrament should be administered in private to sick persons. III. That they should keep the festivals of Christmas, Easter, Ascension, and Whitsuntide. And, IV. That children, at a certain age, should be confirmed by the bishop." He met with many difficulties, during a stay of six months in that country, to get the assembly of the Scottish kirk to comply with his views; but he at length prevailed upon them to receive his four articles, though this imposition sowed the seeds of those troubles which afterwards brought ruin upon his son and successor. Having carried his point, and made some regulation in the civil government of the kingdom, he returned to London on the fifteenth of September,

During his journey from Scotland to London, he was presented with a petition by a great number of peasants, tradesmen, and servants, requesting that they might, as usual, be allowed to take their diversions on Sundays, after divine service. James being persuaded those were puritans who forbade such diversions, and that they were Jewishly inclined, because they affected to call Sunday the Sabbath, resolved to re-establish the vulgar in the privilege which they had lost: he therefore published a performance, intitled the Book of Sports, recommending all diverting exercises after sermon; and ordered it to be read publicly in all churches; and such ministers as refused to obey this injunction were severely punished by the high-commission court. Whatever his motives might have been for enforcing this practice, it was not a bad preservative against the desperate effects of gloomy fanaticism, which had already taken full possession of one kingdom, and made considerable progress in the other.

The year 1617 was rendered remarkable for the last expedition of sir Walter Raleigh, which produced great murmurs against the government, and ended in the death of that gallant seaman. We shall give an account of this remarkable transaction as we find it in Wilson, a cotemporary writer. Sir Walter Raleigh had been a prisoner twelve years, ever since his condemnation, during which time he had employed himself in completing his History of the World: at last he obtained his liberty, though without the king's pardon. As his estate was all forfeited, and given to the earl of Somerset, he was very much embarrassed when he came out of prison; the court, where he was entirely unknown, was like a strange country to him; for this reason he formed the project of seeking his fortune in distant climates. He had formerly traversed the seas of America, and knew all the coasts, especially that of Guiana; nay, it is said he set up marks to direct him again to a certain place, where was a gold mine, and that Keymis, his old attendant, brought him from thence a piece of ore, which made him think the mine very rich: however, as he knew not where to lay his head, he found means to inform the king that he knew of a very rich mine in America, from whence he hoped to bring immense quantities of gold, if his majesty would be pleased to grant him a private commission. The mine lying in a country belonging to the Spaniards, it could not be seized without breaking the peace with Spain; nevertheless, the king, tempted no doubt by the golden hopes inspired by Raleigh, granted him a commission, directed to "our beloved and faithful Walter Raleigh, knight," &c. It was said afterwards, the king granted the commission with this limitation, that he should not injure the subjects of Spain: but how was it possible to bring away gold from a mine belonging to the Spaniards without doing them damage?

However, Raleigh, by virtue of his commission, engaged several persons in the project. He was supplied with money to fit out twelve sail, and departed in August, 1617, in search of the mine. At his arrival on the coast of Guiana he found not the marks he had left there, neither could he know again the place he thought he had so well observed. He detached however his son and captain Keymis, with five ships, to sail up the river Oronoque as high as possible, in order to discover the mountain in which the supposed mine lay. The mountain not appearing, the English landed, and, putting the Spaniards to flight who opposed their descent, pursued them to the town of St. Thomas, which they took and plundered: sir Walter Raleigh's son was killed in the assault. Then, leaving a garrison in the place, they advanced farther into the country, without being able to find the so much desired mine. At last, weary with searching, they returned to sir Walter, who, finding himself disappointed in his hopes, threatened Keymis with the king's indignation, and some days after Keymis was found dead in his cabin. The sailors, vexed at this ill success success loudly complained of their being drawn in to a chimerical project, and compelled sir Walter to sail back for England: when they arrived at Kinsale, in Ireland, he would have persuaded them to go with him to France; but, instead of listening to his proposal, they carried him, against his will, to Plymouth, where he was arrested by the king's orders, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

During his absence, don Diego de Sarmiento, count de Gondemar, the Spanish ambassador in England, making great complaints about sir Walter's commission, which was become public; the king found no better way to appease him than by disowning it, or at least by assuring him that Raleigh had express orders not to act against the Spaniards. Raleigh returning without gold, his cause was so much the worse; besides, the ambassador openly insisted upon his being punished, and told the king there was no other way to continue the treaty of the prince of Wales's marriage with the infanta; wherefore the king resolved at length to sacrifice Raleigh to the Spaniards: but as he could not be tried upon his late expedition, for which he had a commission in form, it was determined he should lose his head by virtue of the sentence passed upon him fourteen years before. In vain did he plead his commission, wherein the king styled him "faithful servant," and gave him power of life and death over those who were under his command, was equivalent to pardon: the judges told him, "that treason could not be pardoned but by express words;" so that, without being called to an account about his late expedition, it was ordered that the former sentence should be executed. He was not, however, executed till the twenty-ninth of October in the following year, 1618.

The English nobility and the best English patriots beheld the fate of Raleigh with silent indignation. Most certain it is, he fell a sacrifice to the mortal hatred conceived by the Spaniards against him in queen Elizabeth's time, and to the king's unhappy desire to accomplish the prince his son's marriage with the infanta of Spain. Weldon scruples not to declare, "that the Spanish faction and Spanish gold betrayed his life, as they had done the kingdom before; and it was one of Gondemar's greatest master-pieces to purchase Raleigh's head; yet (adds this writer) had not the earl of Bristol, who was possessed of Sherborn castle, formerly sir Walter's, co-operated, the king would never have consented*." All the powers of government were by this time concentrated in Buckingham, who, rather to keep James easy than to answer any ends of his own, consented to Raleigh's death.

All this while the lord Digby was negotiating the Spanish match; and Gondemar informing his court of the resolution which had been taken in England for cutting off Raleigh's head, the negotiation was carried on with greater application than ever: at last, after many formalities and scruples had been discussed by the Spanish council, certain articles were presented to Digby, to be transmitted to James for his approbation. They were as follow†:

"That the pope's dispensation be first obtained, by the mere act of the king of Spain.

"That the children of this marriage be not constrained in matters of religion, nor their titles prejudiced in case they be catholics.

"That the infanta's family, being strangers, may be catholics, and shall have a decent place appointed for all divine service according to the use of the church of Rome; and the ecclesiastics and religious persons may wear their proper habits.

"That the marriage shall be celebrated in Spain by a procurator, according to the instructions of the council of Trent; and, after the infanta's arrival in England, such a solemnization shall be used as may make the marriage valid according to the laws of this kingdom.

"That she shall have a competent number of chaplains, and a confessor, being strangers, one of whom shall have power to govern the family in religious matters."

Though these articles have been exclaimed against by some writers, yet, except that part which gives leave to the religious and ecclesiastics to wear their habits, they differ but little from the articles afterwards agreed upon by the same prince and the princess of France, which were approved of by parliament. The remarks of the king upon those articles were as follow:

"Seeing this marriage is to be with a lady of a different religion from us, it becomes us to be tender, as on the one part to give them all the satisfaction convenient, so on the other to admit nothing that may blemish our conscience, or detract from the religion here established."

Hitherto the Spaniard, in prolonging the negotiation, had in view only the succession of Cleves, but this year the affairs of Germany and Bohemia began to give occasion to fear a religious war would break out in those countries; hence the Spaniards had fresh reasons for amusing king James, in order to prevent his determining in favour of the protestants, and sending them a powerful aid. In order to understand the sequel, it will be necessary to know the situation of affairs in Germany and Bohemia.

Notions of liberty never prevailed more strongly in Europe than at this time; even Hungary, Bohemia, and Austria, were as jealous of their rights as the English themselves. This spirit had reigned in Germany ever since the time of Charles V. The example of the United Provinces was continually present with those people, who pretended to the same independence, and even thought themselves more in a condition to command it than even the Hollanders. The emperor Matthias having this year, 1618, gotten his cousin Ferdinand of Austria elected nominal king of Hungary and Bohemia, and made the other archdukes yield him Austria, the people of Hungary, Bohemia, and Austria, joined in complaining that sufficient regard had not been shewn to their privileges as states: religion made a part of the grievances of the Bohemians, who soon became furious. The protestants wanted to rebuild the churches which had been thrown down by the catholics; the council of state issued a declaration against the protestants, upon which these broke into the town-hall, and threw three of the emperor's officers out of the windows; Austria sided with the Bohemians. Matthias dying in the midst of these troubles, Ferdinand of Austria was chosen emperor in his stead: this new dignity, however, made no impression upon the protestants of Bohemia, who were at that time very considerable; they looked upon themselves as entitled to depose the king whom they had not elected, and actually made a tender of their crown to Frederick the elector Palatine, son-in-law to the king of England, who accepted of it, and was thereupon actually elected. James complained of this proceeding in the elector as disloyal, imprudent, and dishonourable: he could not digest the maxims of elective governments, and thought that Ferdinand, by a kind of prescriptive right, had acquired a lawful title to Bohemia; he upbraided his son-in-law for putting him upon the dilemma of either deserting him, or breaking his flattering negotiation with Spain; and he complained of his double-dealing, in having sent to him for his advice concerning his accepting the crown of Bohemia, and yet accepting it before his messenger could arrive in England. Notwithstanding these reproaches, the popularity of Frederick's cause was so great in England, that James found himself under a kind of necessity of doing somewhat in his favour; nevertheless he for the present denied his son-in-law the title of king of Bohemia, and forbade him to be prayed for in the churches under that appellation.

Those disturbances abroad were attended with equal distractions in England: Buckingham continued still the king's favourite and sole minister, and the old earl of Nottingham was in a manner obliged to resign to him the office of lord high-admiral. Buckingham's insolence was as uncontrouled as his power, and an abject spirit was to him the best recommendation: hence arose that motley set of under-ministers which disgraced the remaining part of this reign. Of the two secretaries of state, Naunton was a puritan, and Calvert a papist, but in all other matters had no other contest than who should be most devoted to the will of the minister. Sir Richard Weston was about the same time introduced to court, recommended by his fine personage and portly behaviour, which he taught to stoop to Buckingham; but in his heart he was a papist, and destitute of any great natural abilities. Sir Edward Conway, a rough ignorant soldier, buffooned himself into the good graces of James and his favourite. The lord Doncaster still kept his footing by his easy manners, his magnificent way of living, and his pliant counsels. But the most rising man at this time about court was Dr. John Williams, afterwards lord-keeper of the great-seal and archbishop of York: this young man was of good parentage; with a grave demeanor he had a sprightly conversation, great learning, and sound knowledge; but it was for none of these qualities that Buckingham threw his eyes upon him: his fortune, which lay in Wales, had been but low, and he owed his education to the munificence of the lord Lumley, one of the greatest ornaments and patrons of learning in his age; this dependency had given him pliable habits, and rendered him a fit tool for Buckingham. Such was the situation of James's court when his queen died, on the first of March, 1619, in the forty-sixth year of her age. The character of this queen is variously drawn; some represent her as a vicious lewd woman, but this, upon a strict inquiry, appears to be only calumny: Wilson more justly affirms that she was possessed of many virtues, and no small share of understanding. About the beginning of this year the earl of Northumberland, who had been confined in the Tower ever since the Gunpowder-plot, obtained his liberty by the intercession of the lord Hay, who had married one of his daughters, and had been lately created viscount Hay. James was so affected with the death of his queen, that he was seized with a dangerous illness, which brought him almost to the brink of the grave. Happy would it have been for his reputation if he had indeed died at this time; for the rest of his reign, which lasted six years longer, was not much to his honour.

The new emperor, Ferdinand II. who was endowed with greater abilities than is commonly possessed by the Austrian princes, prepared himself with great diligence for the recovery of his authority. Besides the assistance of his subjects who adhered to the catholic religion, he attached to his side a powerful combination of the neighbouring potentates; all the catholic princes of the empire had declared in his favour; even Saxony, the most powerful of the protestants, and the kingdom of Poland, had espoused his quarrel; and, above all, the Spanish monarch, considering his own interest as inseparably connected with that of the younger branch of his family, sent him powerful succours from Italy and from the Low Countries, and also furnished large sums of money for the support of Ferdinand and of the catholic religion: Gondemar was also ordered to maintain the delusion of the marriage with James, and that artful minister, by means of his insinuating manners and a large sum of money judiciously distributed, soon gained the ascendancy over the king, the favourite, and the ministers; so that, in effect, he governed the whole kingdom. James, who above all things dreaded the breaking off a match his affections were so warmly fixed upon, and, moreover, greatly affecting the title of the Pacific King, instead of taking any vigorous measures to support his son-in-law, fell again to his ruinous negotiations, and sent the lord Doncaster to mediate, in his name, a pacification in the empire; but Ferdinand would scarce favour him with an audience, and the embassy produced no effect.

It was now the year 1620, and affairs in Germany hastened toward a crisis. Ferdinand having collected a mighty force under the command of the duke of Bavaria and the count de Bucquoy, marched against Frederick in Bohemia. In the Low Countries Spinola assembled a veteran army of thirty thousand men: when Edmonds, the king's resident at Brussels, demanded of the archduke Albert the meaning of those preparations, he was told, that the orders for this armament had been sent to Spinola from Madrid, and that he alone knew the purpose for which it was intended: in the mean while the emperor put the Palatine to the ban of the empire, and the execution of it was committed to the elector of Saxony, who entered Lusatia, which he subdued. The war now raged with great fury in the bowels of Germany; and now James, unable longer to resist the solicitations of his subjects, who offered to open their purses in support of the elector Palatine's right to the crown of Bohemia, gave leave to sir Edward Cecil to command a regiment for the preservation of the Palatinate; but sir Horace Vere coming over to England, and offering his service, it was accepted, and Cecil was laid aside. The regiment, which consisted of two thousand two hundred men, was one of the finest that Europe had ever seen: it was composed mostly of volunteers, with the brave earls of Oxford and Essex at their head; the company of the latter consisted of three hundred gentlemen, fifty of whom he paid out of his own pocket: and a kind of promise was extorted from James, that he would suffer two other regiments to be sent after them. These brave volunteers were transported to Holland, passed the Rhine below the Wesel, were escorted to Frankfort by a body of troops under prince Frederick Henry of Nassau, and, on the first of October, joined the army of the Palatine and his allies, conducted by the margrave of Anspach. These gallant men, however, arrived only in time to be the melancholy witnesses of the overthrow of that cause they espoused; for the duke of Bavaria joining the count de Bucquoy, the Imperial general, in Bohemia, they advanced towards Prague, in the neighbourhood of which Frederick was posted. On the eighteenth day of November a battle was fought, and the Palatine, being totally defeated, fled, with his wife and family, to Holland; the inhabitants of Prague opened their gates to the Imperialists, and the unfortunate Frederick saw himself abandoned by all his friends and allies, except count Mansfeldt, who still preserved his fidelity. Loud were now the complaints of the people against the king's timid and pusillanimous conduct, by which he had not only deprived the Palatine of all that aid and assistance which the English were both willing and able to afford him, but had also deterred other princes from espousing his quarrel. It cannot be supposed that James did not really wish to preserve the Palatinate to his son-in-law; but his weakness was cajoled in such a manner by Gonde-mar, that he believed no expedient could be so effectual for that purpose as the match of his son with the infanta of Spain; and that this scheme would miscarry, should he attempt to take any vigorous steps in the elector's favour; besides, his aversion to war was insuperable. He never dreamed that his peaceable disposition, the more highly it was praised, exposed him only to the greater contempt and derision; he considered not that the Spanish match was itself attended with such difficulties, that all his art of negotiation could hardly be able to bring it to effect, much less that this match could be safely depended upon as the means of procuring the mighty advantages he expected from it.

James resolved, however, to seem bent on vigorous measures, in hopes that he should receive ample subsidies from the parliament, which met on the twenty-first of January, in the year 1621. The king, as usual, made a long speech to both houses, explaining the duty of parliaments, expatiating on his own merit and necessities, and demanding supplies for the relief of the Palatinate, in defence of which he declared he would hazard his crown, and even the life of his own son, should he miscarry in his endeavours to procure a reasonable pacification. The house of commons, taking into consideration the urgency of the occasion, and being extremely incensed against the house of Austria, immediately granted two subsidies, with which the king was satisfied for the present. This affair being discussed, the commons received petitions against the increase of popish recusants, monopolies, and projectors. The king had farmed to certain individuals the power of licensing taverns and public houses, and granted to sir Giles Mompeyson and

Francis Michel, an exclusive patent for the sale of gold and silver lace; by virtue of this privilege they had been guilty of such scandalous fraud and oppression, that, upon complaint to the upper house, they were committed to prison, though Mompeyson, who was Buckingham's creature, found means to escape: but he was degraded from the dignity of knight, and his estate confiscated; the other was sentenced to do public penance in the street, sitting on horseback with his face to the tail, to pay a fine of one thousand pounds, and to be imprisoned for life.

James perceiving with what eagerness the two houses proceeded against these delinquents, began to be afraid for his favourite Buckingham, who had been the author of these monopolies; he therefore went to the house of peers, and soothed the parliament with the most affectionate expressions, assuring them, upon the faith of a Christian king, that if he had known of these grievances, he would have punished the authors of his own accord; and cautioning them against giving ear to those who should accuse the innocent instead of the guilty. They understood his meaning, and forebore to trace the enormity to its fountain. James afterwards understanding that the commons had impeached chancellor Bacon, baron Verulam and viscount St. Alban's, he again harangued both houses, representing the necessity of punishing corrupt judges, and soliciting farther subsidies, as the former supplies granted by the commons were already expended for the subsistence of the Palatine and his family, who had taken refuge in Holland. He observed, that great sums would be required to defray the expence of extraordinary ambassadors to all the courts of Europe, as well as for an army to march into the Palatinate, in case his negotiations should prove ineffectual; and lastly, he protested before God, that he would not dissolve the parliament, until the affairs which were then under consideration should be fully determined.

The celebrated Bacon, created lord Verulam and viscount St. Alban's, was a man equally admired for the greatness of his genius, and beloved for his courteous and affable demeanour. His want of œconomy, and his indulgence to servants, had involved him in debt; and, in order to supply his necessities, he had been tempted to take bribes, and that in a very open manner, from suitors in Chancery.

It is affirmed, that, notwithstanding this enormous abuse, he had still, in the seat of justice, maintained the integrity of a judge, and had given such just and equitable decrees, that none of them afterwards were ever questioned or reversed. Being, however, committed to the Tower, the chancellor, conscious of guilt, implored the mercy of his judges, and endeavoured, by a general confession, to avoid the shame of a stricter enquiry. But the lords were inexorable, and insisted on a full acknowledgment of all his corruptions. He owned twenty eight articles; and was so very particular that he mentioned a dozen of gold buttons, which his servant had taken as a gift from a suitor. He was condemned to pay a fine of forty thousand pounds, to be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure, to be for ever incapable of any office, place, or employment; and never again to sit in parliament, or come within the verge of the court. This dreadful sentence he survived five years; and being in a little time restored to liberty, his genius, yet unbroken by calamities, supported itself amidst involved circumstances and a depressed spirit, and shone out in literary productions, which, notwithstanding all his failings, have made him be justly considered as the glory and ornament of his age and nation.

The commons still proceeded in their laudable career, and carried their scrutiny into many grievances which, though of no great consequence, could not be discussed without sensibly affecting the king and his ministers. The king's prerogative seemed each moment to be attacked; his authority, in every article, disputed; and James, who was willing to rectify the abuses of his power, would by no means suffer his power itself to be either questioned or denied. After the house, therefore, had sat near six months, without bringing any business of importance to a final conclusion, the king determined, under pretence of the advanced season, to interrupt their proceedings, and sent a message to inform them, that, in a few days, he would adjourn them till next winter. The commons, eager to complete the salutary work of redressing all the public grievances, applied to the lords, and intreated them to join in a petition for delaying the adjournment; but the upper house refused their concurrence. While these matters were in agitation, the king's commission for an adjournment came down to the house, and the speaker, in obedience to it, pronounced the house to be adjourned to the fourteenth of November.

In this parliament it was that the parties of court and country, or, as they are usually called, Tories and Whigs, were first regularly formed. All those who favoured the hierarchy of the church, and the prerogative of the crown, adhered to the former; the puritans, to a man, engaged in the latter; and as the court, in order to discourage all parliamentary opposition, affixed the name of Puritans to its antagonists, the religious puritanists readily adopted this distinction, which was so advantageous to them, and which confounded their cause with the patriots, or country party.

Soon after the breaking up of the parliament, the king published a proclamation, declaring "that as several grand affairs, debated in parliament, could not in so short a time be brought to perfection, the commons thought it convenient to continue the sessions in course of adjournment: that as for the grievances, he would reform them of himself, and had sooner done it, had he been informed of them; adding, that by his royal authority he had annulled and revoked the patent for gold and silver thread, and some others mentioned in the proclamation." A second proclamation was also published at the same time, prohibiting persons from speaking of state affairs.

Before we proceed any farther in our narrative of affairs of England, it will not be foreign to our purpose to relate briefly what passed in Bohemia and the Palatinate after the battle of Prague.

Count Tilly, the emperor's general, was making great progress in reducing the kingdom of Bohemia.

Prague had surrendered to him at discretion, and the emperor proceeded in the way of justice, with vast severity against the friends or abettors of the elector Palatine. In like manner count Bucquoy, the Imperial general, subdued all Moravia, and marched into Hungary against the party who had chosen Bethlem Gabor, prince of Transylvania, for their king. The unfortunate king of Bohemia had retired into Breslau, in Silesia; but Bohemia, Moravia, and Lusatia, being now in the enemies hands, he retired to the marquisate of Brandenburg: the brave count Mansfeldt, however, still made a shift to keep his army together, and this summer James made a great merit with his people for having sent his son-in-law six thousand pounds. The Dutch about this time sent the king of Bohemia one hundred and fifty thousand florins, and he ordered Mansfeldt to abandon Bohemia, and march into the Upper Palatinate, into which Tilly had fallen with an army of twenty-five thousand men. All that Mansfeldt could do, was to stop the progress of Tilly, who made a treaty with him, by which Mansfeldt was to withdraw his army from the Palatinate, and to receive two hundred thousand florins: but this treaty was only made to amuse Tilly, and the war still went on, though Mansfeldt was obliged to march into the Lower Palatinate, where the progress of the Imperialists was opposed with great vigour and good conduct by Vere, Burroughs, and other officers, who still headed the small body of English in that country. But the truce between Spain and the States General being now almost expired, Spinola was obliged to lead back his army to the Netherlands; and the archduke, to give the emperor time to replace them in the Lower Palatinate, had agreed to the truce mentioned by James in his speech to the parliament. Before the expiration of this truce, which was but for five weeks, the Spanish general, don Gonsoles de Cordova, whom Spinola left to command in the Lower Palatinate, was at the head of ten thousand men: this obliged Vere to retire, first towards Worms, and next to Frankendale, while Gonsoles took Stein, Ladenburgh, and Keyfers-lautern; and in October he besieged Vere in Frankendale: Mansfeldt, however, marched time enough into the Lower Palatinate to prevent the loss of that important fortress for that time. But Tilly, as we have already mentioned, falling into the Lower Palatinate, obliged Mansfeldt to withdraw to Alsatia. Thus, at the end of the campaign, the king of Bohemia found himself stripped of all his towns in the Lower Palatinate, except Frankendale, Mannheim, and Heidelberg, which were held by three English officers, Vere, Herbert, and Burroughs. Such was the unhappy state of the king of Bohemia's affairs at this juncture; while the emperor, the archduke, and the king of Spain, availing themselves of James's weakness, entered into an infamous confederacy for abusing him, by shewing dispositions for restoring the Palatinate; but in reality to keep James from declaring himself for the States, in case they should renew the war with Spain. It would tire the reader, should I inform him of every instance of mean juggling on one part, and gross credulity on the other; it is sufficient to say, that James, finding himself bewildered in the mazes of negotiation, was at last obliged to give way to the meeting of his parliament.

Notwithstanding that the king had, during the recess of the parliament, revoked several of his oppressive patents, and remedied many other articles of grievance which had been mentioned by the commons, yet, when that house reassumed its session, on the twentieth of November, they shewed that they were far from entertaining any favourable idea of the dispositions of their sovereign; and one of their first acts was to draw up a remonstrance, which they proposed to present to his majesty, wherein they represented, "that the power of the house of Austria threatened the liberties of Europe; that the progress of the catholic religion in England begat the most alarming apprehensions, lest it should once more gain an ascendant in the kingdom; that the king's lenity towards the professors of that religion had increased their arrogance and presumption; that the uncontroled conquests made by the Austrian family, mightily raised the expectations of the English papists; and especially that the prospect of the Spanish match inspired them with the most sanguine hopes of procuring, if not the final establishment, at least the entire toleration, of their religion." Then they proceed humbly to offer to his majesty remedies against these growing evils, which are these: "that he would immediately undertake the defence of the Palatine, and support him by force of arms; that he would declare war against Spain, whose arms and riches were the chief bulwark of the catholic interest in Europe; that he would engage in no negotiation for the marriage of his son but with a protestant princess; that the children of popish recusants should be taken from their parents, and committed to the care of protestant teachers and school-masters; and that the fines and confiscations to which the catholics were by law subject, should be exacted with the utmost rigour."

James was absent from London when this spirited petition or remonstrance was offered to him; and being highly irritated thereat, and vexed with the ill state of his affairs in which he had involved himself, in a fit of despair he resolved to menace his parliament and people.

He had imprisoned sir Edwin Sandys for being too free about affairs of state without doors; when the above petition was offered to him, he not only rejected it, but sent the following letter to the speaker of the house of commons.

"To our trusty and well-beloved sir Thomas Richardson, knight, speaker of the house of commons.

"Mr. Speaker,

"We have heard, by divers reports, to our great grief, that our distance from the house of parliament, caused by our indisposition, hath emboldened and fired the popular spirits of some of the house of commons to argue and debate publicly of matters far above their reach and capacity, tending to our high dishonour and breach of prerogative royal. These are therefore to command you to make known, in our name, to the house, that none therein shall presume henceforth to meddle with any thing concerning our government or deep matters of state; and namely, not to deal with our dearest son's match with the daughter of Spain; nor to touch the honour of that king, nor any other of our friends and confederates; and also not to meddle with any man's particulars, which have their due motion in our ordinary courts of justice. And whereas we hear they have sent a message to sir Edwin Sandys, to know the reasons of his late restraint, you shall, in our name, resolve them, that it was not for any misdemeanors in parliament; but, to put them out of doubt of any question of that nature that may arise among them hereafter, you shall resolve them, in our name, that we think ourselves free and able to punish any man's misdemeanors in parliament, as well during their sitting as after; which we mean not to spare hereafter, upon any occasion of any man's insolent behaviour there, that shall be ministered to us; and if they have already touched any of those points which we have forbidden, in any petition of theirs which is to be sent unto us, it is our pleasure that you shall tell them, except they reform it before it comes into our hands, we will not deign the hearing nor answering it.

"Dated at Newmarket, December 3, 1621."

This letter, however, was far from producing the effects intended by it; the commons knew their own strength too well to regard James's menaces. Instead of retracting what they had done, they entered with greater freedom than ever upon the national grievances, and the dangerous state of the reformed religion at home and abroad. It would swell this work too much, should I discuss the particulars of all the debates upon these important points; the result of the whole was, that the house resolved again to present their former petition, or rather remonstrance, and to back it with another.

This new paper was conceived in very respectful words, but it was no less bold than respectful: after having reminded him of the cheerfulness with which they undertook to assist him in the defence of the Palatinate, they observed, "that their zeal for the protestant religion and the interest of his majesty's family, had induced them to represent the dangers with which both were threatened, and to point out remedies for those evils: that, by his letter to the speaker, he seemed bent upon depriving them of the parliamentary liberty to speak freely in the house, as well as of the jurisdiction which the house exercised over its own members; they therefore begged he would not violate a privilege which was their undoubted right, and which they inherited from their ancestors; a right which he himself had confirmed in his speeches to parliament, and without which it would be impossible to discuss and determine the affairs which might fall under their cognizance."

So resolute and determined a spirit shewn by the commons, roused every spark of kingly pride in the composition of James. His answer was short, peremptory, and suitable to the sentiments which he then breathed: after explaining his intentions in regard to the prerogative very clearly, without using ambiguous expressions, as he had hitherto done, he concluded his reply in regard to the rights and privileges of parliament as follows:

"And although we cannot allow the style calling it your undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wished you had said, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us (for most of them grew from precedents, which rather shew toleration than inheritance); yet we are pleased to give our royal assurance, that, as long as you continue yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful liberties and privileges as any of our ancestors were, nay, as to preserve our own royal prerogative; so as your house shall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown, which would enforce us, or any just king, to retrench them of their privileges, that would pare his prerogative and the flowers of his crown. But of this we hope there will never be cause given."

This answer, which was dated at Newmarket, December 11, 1621, breathes all the spirit of despotism; and now the prerogatives of the crown and the privileges of the subject seemed to be drawn up against each other in formal array. The parliament resolved to proceed in their career, and to grant no supply till they received satisfaction from James for the breach of their privileges, and they drew up a protestation, in which they insisted on their former claims for freedom of speech, and an unbounded authority to interpose with their advice and counsel. And they affirmed, "that the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England."

James no sooner understood what had been done, than he hastened to town, and sending for the journals of the house of commons, tore out with his own hand the protestation, which he declared null and void, on account of the manner in which it had been framed, and the matter it contained. In a few days after this effort of his prerogative, he dissolved the parliament by proclamation, and then wreaked his vengeance upon those members of the house of commons who had taken freedoms with his power and administration: Cook, Philips, Selden, Pym, and Mallory, were committed to prison; Diggs, Crew, Rich, and sir James Perrot, were exiled to Ireland, on pretence of executing some commission in that country, and a pretext was found for confining the earls of Oxford and Southampton in the Tower.

James, still pestered with the itch of negotiating, continued his fruitless attempts with regard to the recovery of the Palatinate. In the beginning of the year 1622, he dispatched Digby as his ambassador to the emperor, desiring a cessation of hostilities. That minister was referred to the duke of Bavaria, who commanded the Austrian armies, and who told the English envoy very frankly, that there needed no treaty for that purpose, since hostilities were already ceased by his having got firm possession of the Palatinate, which he intended to keep till a final accommodation should be made between the contending parties. Notwithstanding this gross insult, and that every circumstance concurred to convince James that the emperor industriously eluded all his application, our weak monarch had the meanness to attend Ferdinand through all his shifts and evasions, and renew the conferences at Brussels.

In the mean time the king of Bohemia, finding all his father-in-law's pacific endeavours prove ineffectual, laid hold of some favourable circumstances, arising from the expiration of the truce between the Spaniards and the States General, and the jealousies in Germany against the house of Austria, to make a final effort for recovering his dominions. Three armies were raised under three commanders, Christian, duke of Brunswick, the prince of Baden, and count Mansfeldt; but the same ill success attended the unfortunate Frederick: the two former generals were defeated, one after the other, by count Tilly and the Imperialists; Mansfeldt, though generally inferior in numbers, still continued the war, but with no equal supplies of money either from the Palatine or the king of England. These misfortunes, joined to the persuasions of James, who was for the king of Bohemia's laying down his arms, quite disheartened that prince, and he retired, at first, to Sedan, where he remained an unwelcome guest with his uncle the duke of Brunswick: count Mansfeldt was dismissed from the Palatine's service; and that famous general retired, with his army, into the Low Countries, where he was received into the pay of the United Provinces. It has been justly observed, that vigorous acting bids fairest to obtain good terms; and though the king of Bohemia was over-persuaded by James to disregard this maxim, yet his enemies strictly observed it; for count Tilly, after the advantages he had gained over Mansfeldt, did not lose a moment in harrassing the Palatinate; and at last he besieged and took Heidelberg, the richest town in it, and sent to Rome (where it still remains) its fine library. The castle of Heidelberg was bravely defended by Herbert, an English colonel, who was killed, after doing wonders in his own person. Tilly next blockaded and took Mannheim, notwithstanding all that sir Horace Vere could do to defend it; and then besieged Frankendale. All the concern that James took in those misfortunes, was to redouble his pacific applications; and to make them go on smoother, he extended still farther graces to the popish recusants, as appears from the following copy of a writ, sent by the lord-keeper to the judges.

"That the king having, upon deep reasons of state, and in expectation of the like indulgence from foreign princes to the professors of our religion, resolved to grant some grace to the imprisoned papists, had commanded him to pass some writs under the broad-seal for that purpose: wherefore it is his majesty's pleasure, that they make no niceness or difficulty to extend this princely favour to all such as they shall find prisoners in the jails of their circuits for any church-recusancy that shall concern religion only, and not matters of state."

The truth is, that James did not now much expect the restoration of the Palatinate from the emperor; his eyes were entirely fixed on Spain, and, if he could accomplish his son's marriage with the infanta, he fondly imagined, that, after so close an alliance, this other point might easily be settled: but, to put that matter out of dispute, the emperor, whose power in Germany was now fully confirmed, assembled a diet at Ratisbon in the following year, in which he declared, "that the elector Palatine having been guilty of high-treason, his estates, goods, and dignities, were fallen to the Imperial demaines; but that, being unwilling to diminish the number of the electors, he wills, commands, and orders Maximilian of Bavaria to be invested with the electorate Palatine." He bestowed this investiture from his throne, his vice-chancellor declaring aloud that the emperor conferred this dignity "in the plenitude of his power*."

The eyes of England were now sullenly turned towards Spain, where Digby had the whole management of the negotiation for the marriage.

* Voltaire, Gen. Hist. vol. v. p. 223.

This nobleman had been lately dignified with the title of earl of Bristol, and dispatched as James's ambassador to Philip IV. who had lately succeeded his father Philip III. on the Spanish throne. Bristol was a minister of great abilities, and had formerly disapproved of all alliance with Spain, but now appeared so convinced of the sincerity of that court, that he wrote over to James, felicitating him on the entire accomplishment of his views and projects: a daughter of Spain, whom he represents as extremely amiable, would soon, he said, be conducted into England, and would bring with her an immense fortune of two millions†, a sum four times greater than Spain had ever given with any other princess. The fact is, that the court of Spain had hitherto fed James with hopes of the marriage only to amuse him; but, as they saw that the king of England was determined at any rate to conclude this alliance, they thought this fair opportunity of restoring the catholic religion in England was not to be missed, as it was very probable it might be effected by means of the infanta, and her numerous train of popish domestics and dependants, who were to be allowed the uninterrupted exercise of their religion here: accordingly the Spanish court suddenly altered its mind, and appeared as eager to conclude, as it had been dilatory and unwilling before; the only difficulty was, to extort from the English monarch such terms as should lead to what was intended, and which the impatience of James gave great reason to expect.

The articles concerning religion were the only obstacles to the marriage. The earl of Bristol had been disputing the ground inch by inch ever since his arrival in Spain, and Philip IV. was not displeased with it, because it gave him an opportunity of gaining time. In August, 1622, the Spaniard demanded certain articles in favour of the English catholics, to which the ambassador only answered, that he would acquaint the king his master therewith: at the same time the pope put his postils, or notes, to the articles that were agreed upon. Hence it is easy to conclude that the court of Rome and Spain acted in concert, both tending to the same end. The king received about the same time the pope's postils, and the court of Madrid's demands in favour of the English catholics: he kept these last, out of ceremony, some months without giving an answer; but at length, on the fifth of January 1623, he signed all, and, after making the prince do the same, sent the articles to the earl of Bristol, who received them the twenty-fifth of the same month. Such of our readers as may be desirous of knowing what value James set upon the protestant religion, may see these articles at length in Rushworth's Collections. Among many other shameful concessions made to the catholics to the prejudice of our religion, none gave greater disgust than the article in which the king engaged that the children of the prince and the infanta should be educated by their mother till they had attained the age of ten years: this condition could only be stipulated with a view of implanting in their minds prejudices in favour of the Romish faith; and though so tender an age might seem little susceptible of any strong impressions, yet the same motives which prompted the pope to insert it, should have induced the king to reject it. Besides the public treaty, there were several private articles, to which the king and the prince of Wales both swore, and in which a promise was given to suspend the execution of the penal laws against the catholics, to procure a total repeal of them from the parliament, and to tolerate the exercise of the popish religion in private houses.

Every previous step being therefore adjusted, nought was wanting to the conclusion of the marriage but the pope's dispensation, which might be esteemed as a mere formality. The king, elated by this success, now triumphed in his pacific counsels, and consoled himself for the contempt he had incurred throughout Europe for looking on with unconcern while his son-in-law was stripped of his estate and dignity, by boasting of his superior wisdom and sagacity; when all his flattering prospects were ruined by the rashness of a man, whom he had raised from a private station to be the curse of himself, of his family, and his people.

Buckingham was now as much in favour with the prince of Wales as he was with the king, and both father and son implicitly followed his counsels, and adopted his opinions; while that artful favourite made the most of their complacency to serve the purposes of his own unbounded ambition. He had long swelled with envy at seeing the earl of Bristol have the sole management of so great an affair, and so desirable a one to the king his master, as that of the Spanish match, and was resolved to exert all his influence to procure a share of the honour of that negotiation: with this view he persuaded prince Charles to undertake a journey to the court of Madrid in person, to fetch home his mistress, the infanta, representing to him that the romantic nature of the adventure could not fail to captivate the admiration and affection of that monarch and his subjects, and introduce him to the princess under the character of a fond lover rather than of a stately husband; that, in regard to the restitution of the Palatinate, the presence of so illustrious an intercessor would do more in three days, than ambassadors would do in as many years, as it was not to be doubted that the Spanish generosity, moved by such an instance of trust and confidence, would be induced to make greater concessions than could be expected from political views and motives." In a word, he so artfully represented the project to the young prince, naturally of a warm and sanguine complexion, and who had early taken a liking to romances, where heroes break forth with double lustre out of distresses, dangers, and disguises, that he looked upon this as an adventure worthy his blood, his courage, and his passion. He immediately agreed to solicit the permission of his father, and, in concert with Buckingham, chose the time when James was in the most kind and jovial humour, and, more by their importunities than the force of their reasons, they extorted an hasty and unguarded consent to their undertaking.

Many pages would be taken up, should I attend the two adventurers from their mournful parting with James (who would fain have retracted his rash permission) to their unexpected arrival in Spain. I must therefore refer my readers to learn from other authors, the celerity of their dispatch from England; their being happily unobserved at Paris, where they had the indiscretion to venture into a court-ball, where Charles saw the princess Henrietta, whom he afterwards married; their happy escape out of that country, where they had no reason to think themselves in safety; and their arrival on the sixth of March, 1623 (eleven days only from their leaving London), at Madrid, where they surprized every one by their unlooked-for presence. From the like motive of conciseness, I shall omit the particulars of the reception of the English prince at that court, which was such as might be expected from a rich, generous, and powerful monarch, who had a full sense of the confidence reposed in him, and who was studious to employ every expedient to shew the respect he had for his royal guest; and shall now hasten to the material part, the prince's conduct and negotiation there, both with regard to the marriage and the restitution of the Palatinate.

The imperious temper of Buckingham was on this occasion of service; for he bluntly broke through all the formal evasions of the conde Olivarez, by demanding at once, "whether they intended to give the infanta to the prince, and upon what terms?" The Spanish minister finding himself beaten out of his guard, frankly told him, that it was expected in Spain, that the prince should change his religion, and that it was generally supposed that he had come to Spain on that account. Buckingham cut off all hopes of this kind, and gave Olivarez a lasting hatred for his person by his impetuous manner of proceeding, and pressing for a peremptory answer, without any regard to the tergiversations and shufflings of the court of Rome or Madrid.

We find that Olivarez, and some other of the Spanish ministry, were for making the best of the prince, now they had him in their power; but the king, having more virtue, rejected this proposal, though he was not against bringing the prince to as near a conformity in religion as possible. They were encouraged in this by a kind of correspondence entered into between James, the prince, and Buckingham, on the one part, and the court of Rome on the other: in this correspondence they go hand in hand with his holiness (to use James's expression) "usque ad aras—to the very altar." But I will not venture to give, as genuine, those letters from one to the other which have been published as such by historians and collectors: certain it is, that both James and his son laboured to disguise and dress up the deformities of popery; and that it had been resolved by them, with the privacy of Buckingham, to make some farther concessions than had ever yet appeared in public. This appears from the many extracts from the letters between James, his son, and his favourite, published by Dr. Wellwood.

Mean while pope Gregory XV. who had granted the dispensation, died, and Urban VIII. succeeded in his place. Upon this event the papal nuncio at the court of Spain refused to deliver the dispensation until it should be confirmed by Urban. This was made use of as an argument for farther delay. The affair of the Palatinate was another obstacle which the Spaniards made use of for their own conveniency. The prince honestly made it an indispensable condition of this marriage; but the Spaniards sometimes pretended, that when the marriage was settled, that would follow of course; sometimes, when they saw the prince inclined to be satisfied on that head, they pressed to have it settled before the marriage; and sometimes they offered him carte blanche, to make his own conditions.

The prince was greatly chagrined at this delay; he and Buckingham despaired of success so much, that they were thinking of privately withdrawing from Spain, when they received intelligence, that the roads to the frontiers of France and the sea-ports were beset with troops, to intercept the prince in case he should attempt to make his escape. Alarmed at this advice, Charles sent a message, by one Graham, to James, which Graham was to deliver if he should hear the prince was arrested, "that if his majesty should receive any advertisement that he was detained by that state as a prisoner, he would be pleased, for his sake, never to think on him any longer as a son, but to reflect with all his royal thoughts upon the good of his sister, and the safety of his own kingdoms." But the true design of the Spaniards was to keep the infanta in Spain till next year, in hopes of his conversion. However, it is upon all hands agreed, that the prince, by his prudence, affability, and modesty, endeared himself so much to the court and people of Spain, that he was as popular as Buckingham (who had received a patent from James, creating him duke) was odious amongst them; and this popularity wrought out his deliverance from them. Buckingham, sensible that he had incurred the hatred of the Spaniards, by his shameful and debauched pleasures, his haughty, arrogant, and overbearing temper, which he either could not or would not disguise, and which all of them were qualities that to the Spaniards were peculiarly hateful and disgusting, and dreading the influence which that nation would naturally have after the arrival of the infanta, determined to employ all his credit to defeat the marriage: but by what arguments he could persuade the prince to offer such an insult to the Spanish nation, from whom he had received such generous treatment, and, above all, by what arts he could prevail with James to relinquish a project, which, during so many years, had been the object of his wishes, and which he had now so nearly brought to a successful and happy issue; these are circumstances which have never transpired to the public. However this might be, we find that all at once, whether alarmed with the report that the court of Spain intended to detain the prince, or whether wrought upon by the insinuations of his favourite, James peremptorily wrote to Buckingham, charging him to bring home the prince immediately, and forthwith dispatched vessels to St. Andero, in Biscay, to take them on board. The duke immediately communicated this order to Philip, alleging the prince's return was absolutely necessary to quiet the fears and suspicions of the English people; but in the mean time he would leave a proxy to espouse the infanta, as soon as the confirmed dispensation should arrive. The king of Spain made no objection to his return, but offered to be the prince's proxy. A procuration was for this purpose drawn up, and signed by the prince of Wales, who delivered it to the earl of Bristol, with orders to put it into the hands of Philip ten days after receipt of the dispensation. The Spanish monarch accompanied his guest as far as the Escorial, where he was royally regaled, and erected a pillar on the spot where they parted, as a monument of their friendship. The prince, before he embarked, dispatched one of his domestics with a letter to the earl of Bristol, at Madrid, desiring that he would not part with the procuration until he (Charles) should be satisfied that the infanta, after the ceremony, should not take the veil.

Upon this the prince and Buckingham embarked, and after escaping a dangerous storm, arrived at Portsmouth on the fifth of October, and from thence he and the duke posted immediately to James, who received them with infinite joy, which was diffused throughout the whole nation. The first deliberation in the cabinet at Royston, where the court then resided, was how to break off the match (for that was now fully resolved upon) with a good grace. Luckily, the pope's approbation came from Spain, but somewhat altered, which gave James a better pretext for his proceedings than he could have expected; but he received a more material one from the Spaniards altering the sum of the infanta's portion, which, from six hundred thousand pounds in ready money, they now brought down to eighty thousand, some jewels, and a pension of twenty thousand pounds a year. Bristol would have surmounted all these difficulties, had it not been that the Spaniards neither could nor would undertake for the restitution of the Palatinate; and Buckingham, having the prince's concurrence, made his own use of this circumstance, and drew a peremptory order from James to Bristol for breaking off all negotiations, just at the time when that minister had, to all appearance, accommodated all differences between the contracting parties, and the Spaniards were ready to deliver up the infanta. Philip perfectly well comprehended the meaning of these proceedings: he had been informed of the disgust conceived by Buckingham, and the animosity subsisting between him and Olivarez; and judging him a man capable of sacrificing to his own ungovernable passions the greatest interests of his king and country, he suspected that the unbounded ambition of that favourite would be employed to foment a quarrel between the two nations. Resolved, however, to throw the whole blame of the rupture on the English, he sent to the earl of Bristol a written promise, dated the eighth of January, 1624, by which he engaged to procure the restoration of the Palatinate, either by treaty, or by any other possible means; but when he found that this concession was utterly disregarded, he ordered the infanta to lay aside the title of princess of Wales, which she had borne ever since the arrival of the dispensation from Rome, and to drop the study of the English language, which she had been learning for a considerable time; and thinking that such precipitate counsels as now influenced the court of England, would not stop at the violation of the marriage-treaty, he ordered preparations for war to be made throughout all his dominions.

Thus terminated the affair of the Spanish match, after having employed all James's attention for upwards of six years. His resolution to break it off at last was no sooner known to the people, than they celebrated the rupture with bonfires and other demonstrations of joy. The two houses, then sitting, petitioned the king to execute the laws against Jesuits and Romish priests; to give order for seizing the arms of popish recusants, and obliging them to retire from London; to revoke all licences granted to such recusants, and put a stop to the great concourse of people who resorted to mass in the chapels of ambassadors; to deprive all papists of the posts which they enjoyed; and not to relax the laws against popish recusants on any account whatever. To this petition the king sent a very complaisant answer, assuring them in general that he would comply with their demands; but he artfully avoided explaining himself touching those articles that mentioned the removal of the papists from London, and their being divested of all employments. Buckingham's mother and wife, one of the secretaries of state, and many persons possessed of very considerable offices, were either professed or reputed Roman catholics: the commons presented a list of fifty-seven to the king, but he would not signify his sentiments on this subject, and they did not insist upon satisfaction.

In the mean time the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg grew extremely uneasy at the growing greatness of the house of Bavaria, and at the untractable haughtiness of the emperor. They had protested against the translation of the electoral dignity; and James, after renewing his round of negotiation, brought matters to such a crisis, that he wrote a letter to the king of Bohemia, wherein he urged him to lay down his arms, and submit to an arbitration between him and the emperor; but Frederic would not hearken to such advice, and James now seemed inclinable to have assisted him powerfully, could he have been sure of the Dutch or the French; but, amidst these good dispositions, difficulties intervened which blasted all their efforts, for in February 1623, a cruel scene was acted at Amboyna, in the East Indies: a treaty was concluded in 1619 between England and the United Provinces, whereby, among other things, it was agreed, that in regard to the great trouble and cost pretended to have been bestowed by the Dutch in gaining the trade to the Molucca islands, Banda, and Amboyna, from the Spaniards and Portuguese, the Dutch should enjoy two thirds of that trade, and the English one third. In consequence of this agreement English factories were erected at the Moluccas, at Banda, and at Amboyna: the latter is the principal place in the East-Indies where nutmegs, mace, cinnamon, cloves, and other spices grow. Here the English had been settled about two years; when the Dutch, in order to deprive them of their share of the spice-trade, pretended a plot was formed between the English and the natives, to take possession of the Dutch fort at Amboyna; whereupon the English were tortured by the Dutch, both with fire and water, in a most cruel and barbarous manner; and, on February the twenty-seventh, captain Gabriel Towerson, and nine other Englishmen, with nine Japanese and one Portuguese, were ignominiously executed for this pretended conspiracy, though they protested their innocency to the last. For this insolent affront no reparation was obtained till the year 1654, when Cromwell made the Dutch pay three hundred thousand pounds upon that account.

Much has been blindly said concerning a paper of accusation put into James's hand by the marquis of Inviosa and don Carlos, the Spanish ambassadors; the truth is, James by this time was fully convinced that Buckingham had been the author of the failure of the marriage treaty; and though he dissembled his resentment, he now began to estrange himself from a man, who, through his ambition or vanity, was perpetually traversing all his measures; he affected, in speaking to the prince and duke, to use broken and mysterious expressions, which shewed that something lay heavy on his mind: at last, the king going one day to Windsor, and taking coach at St. James's, ordered the duke, on some slight pretence, to stay behind; the duke looking upon this as a certain sign of his approaching disgrace, returned to his own house, overwhelmed with anxiety; but, by the advice of some of his friends, he soon followed the king to Windsor, where he found means to remove his majesty's disgust, at least to outward appearance; but in reality James only dissembled his sentiments through fear of the duke's resentment; he impatiently longed for the arrival of Bristol, and it was by the advice of that minister, whose fidelity he knew, and whose abilities he respected, that he hoped to extricate himself from those difficulties in which he was at present involved. It was the interest of Buckingham to exert his utmost endeavours to keep Bristol at a distance from the king and the prince, lest the voice of truth, enforced with that oratory which the earl possessed in an eminent manner, should disclose scenes which it was his interest to wish buried beyond the reach of their knowledge. Accordingly, he no sooner heard of the earl's arrival in England, than he made use of all that despotism he had acquired over the mind of his weak sovereign to procure an order for committing Bristol to the Tower, till he had answered certain questions which should be put to him by the council. He was, however, soon after released, but ordered to retire to his own house, and not approach the king and court. The earl wrote to James, loudly demanding an opportunity of vindicating himself, and of laying his whole conduct before his master on all occasions; he asserted his own innocence, and cast on Buckingham the blame of every miscarriage. Hereupon the favourite thought it consistent with his honour and interest to defend his transactions, and he presented, to a committee of both houses, a long narrative, which he affirmed to be full and complete, of every step taken in the treaty with Philip: but, partly by concealing some facts, and partly by misrepresenting others, the narrative was calculated to deceive the parliament, and to load the court of Spain with the reproach of artifice and insincerity.

He alleged, that, after a negotiation of many years, the king still found himself as far from his purpose as ever, and that Bristol had never brought the matter beyond general promises and professions: that the prince, suspecting the intentions of Spain, determined, at last, to go to Madrid, and put the matter to a final trial: that he there met with such artificial dealing, as convinced him that all the steps taken towards the marriage were false and deceitful: that the restoration of the Palatine, which had ever been considered by the king as an essential article, was never seriously intended by Spain: and that, after suffering much ill treatment, the prince was forced to return to England, without any hopes either of procuring the infanta, or of reinstating the Palatine in the possession of his dominions. This narrative, which, considering the importance of the subject, and the august nature of that assembly to which it was presented, deserves great blame, was yet vouched for truth by the prince of Wales, who was present; and even the king himself seemed tacitly to approve it, by assuring the parliament that Buckingham had laid the matter before them by his express order; and notwithstanding that so many extraordinary circumstances appeared therein, yet so agreeable was it to the bent and inclination of the parliament, that they received it without hesitation, and even joined in an address to the king in favour of Buckingham, which concludes as follows: "And so, without your further trouble, we do humbly beseech your most excellent majesty to interpret fair of this our representation, which we hold ourselves bound to offer unto your majesty for the clearing of so amiable a person, who, as we verily believe, hath in his negotiation well deserved of your majesty and the commonwealth." Had Bristol been heard in parliament, he would undoubtedly have given a new complexion to affairs; for many, out of hatred to Buckingham, would gladly have laid hold of the smallest opportunity to oppose him; and had James, situated as he then was, seen but the shadow of an opposition, he would have put himself at its head, in which case it would have quickly become a majority; but Buckingham ruled the cabinet, and dictated to the inclinations of a king who now feared, if he did not hate, him. He was the idol of a parliament to whom the name of a sole minister was execrable. Though in his actions and conversation he had every mark of vice, yet he was the bosom favourite of a young prince who was the very pattern of modesty and virtue.

The parliament being prorogued on the twenty-ninth of May, it was necessary to make some preparation to oppose the warlike armament fitting out by the court of Spain, and also to assist the elector Palatine. The aid granted the king was very considerable; three fifteenths and tenths from the laity, and four intire subsidies from the clergy. Of the laity's aid, eight citizens of London were appointed to be treasurers, and ten other persons of his majesty's council for war; without whose warrant no money was to be issued out by the treasurers, nor upon any other account but for the war, and both were to be accountable to the commons in parliament. With this money it was computed that the king might send twenty-five thousand men into the Palatinate, under the command of an English general. However, only six thousand men were sent into Holland, to serve in the army of the States under the command of the prince of Orange, and other troops were levied by count Mansfeldt, who was, during the war, to open himself a passage into the Palatinate.

During these transactions, the earl of Holland, who had been dispatched into France, having sent word that Lewis XIII. was inclined to listen to an overture of marriage between the prince of Wales and his sister, the princess Henrietta Maria, the king appointed the earl of Carlisle to go and negotiate the affair, jointly with the earl of Holland. The two ambassadors repairing to Compeigne, where the court of France was, commissioners were appointed to treat with them, of whom the marquis de la Vieuville, superintendant of the finances, was the first. When these conferences began, the king, pursuant to his promise, was putting the laws in force against popish recusants, particularly against friars and priests, some of whom were thrown into prison; but James was now become apprehensive lest his son should be altogether disappointed of a bride; and therefore, as soon as the most Christian king interposed his mediation in behalf of those of his own faith, James gave orders for the release of all the popish recusants who had been imprisoned since the parliament's petition. In short, such was the earnestness of the English monarch to terminate this affair, that by the tenth of November this year, the marriage articles were signed at Paris, and were in substance much the same as those which had been concluded with Spain; for as Lewis only required, for the honour of his crown, the same conditions which had been granted to the catholic monarch, James made no scruple to comply. And as the prince, while in Spain, had given a verbal promise to leave the infant the education of her children till the age of thirteen, this article was also inserted in the treaty; and to that imprudent concession is generally, and perhaps justly, ascribed the present distressed condition of the Stuart family.

While this affair was depending, count Mansfeldt came over to England, where he was received with extraordinary caresses, and lodged by the prince in his palace of St. James's. After some conferences, it was agreed that Mansfeldt should have twelve thousand men to carry the war into the Lower Palatinate. During the negociation with France, the ministry of that court had made mighty promises, though in general terms, not only of affording a free passage to the English troops, but also of reinforcing them with powerful succours in their march towards the Palatinate; but, on the arrival of those troops, under the command of count Mansfeldt, before Calais, they found that no orders had come for their admission. This occasioned many dispatches backward and forwards; but the French insisted that they had given no positive orders under their hands, and that the granting the count a passage through France was a matter not to be hastily resolved upon: in fine, this debate lasted so long, that a pestilential disease crept aboard the ships, and carried off great numbers of the English; and those who remained, weakened by sickness and discouraged by misfortunes, appeared too small a body to lead into the Palatinate. Such was the shameful issue of this expedition, which reflected the highest disgrace on the English ministry, who were so weak as to consider Gallic professions as solemn engagements: justice, however, obliges us to confess, that this was the only public disaster that befel England, during the quiet reign of the peaceful James.

We cannot conclude the history of this reign, which draws to its period, without taking some notice of the state of affairs in Ireland, where the Spaniards kept a constant intelligence with the disaffected papists, and put the English government under perpetual alarms. The earl of Tyrone having been received into favour by James, at the beginning of his reign, and assured of the royal protection, provided he did not relapse into his former traitorous practices, returned to his own country; but construing all the marks of liberality he had received as the effects of fear, he had the boldness, soon after, to petition the king for a toleration of the popish religion: his request being refused, he, with the earl of Tyrconnel, and other heads of the Irish Roman catholics, began to intrigue anew against the English government, and a desperate confederacy was formed amongst the Irish of Ulster, for murdering the lord-deputy (then sir Anthony Chichester) and the council, and extirpating the English out of Ireland. This conspiracy was discovered by a letter dropped in the council-chamber, and Tyrone, Tyrconnel, M^c Guire, and other chief conspirators, fled to France; but the most Christian king not giving them any great encouragement, the rebels retired, without going to Paris or seeing the French monarch, to Brussels. The archduke was not so reserved; he gave them a noble reception, and settled upon them large pensions, by order of the court of Spain, who soon found its interest in furnishing them with money to blow up another rebellion, which Tyrone, in the year 1613, actually undertook to effect; and his design appeared so practicable, that the marquis Spinola, one of the best officers of the age, offered to head an expedition: but the design was discovered, and Tyrone's correspondents were taken and executed in the year 1615.

Sir Oliver St. John, afterwards viscount of Grandison, was sworn in lord-deputy of Ireland, in the year 1616, and acted with so much vigour against the papists, that he procured himself many enemies even at the court of England. Though he was a brave and active magistrate, and James knew him to be so, yet he made a handle of the complaints against him, to issue out the commission we have already taken notice of, to some discontented members of the house of commons; viz. sir Dudley Diggs, sir Thomas Carew, sir Nathaniel Rich, sir James Perrot, and others, "to enquire of sundry matters concerning his majesty's service in Ireland, as well in the point of government ecclesiastical and civil, as of revenue, and to inspect the state of the kingdom, propagate religion, settle the government, and improve the Exchequer." Before these commissioners arrived in Ireland, the differences between the lord-deputy and the privy-council there arose so high, that the latter demanded of James that he should be removed. James obstinately refused this for a long time; but at length the party against the lord-deputy prevailed, and lord viscount Falkland was sworn lord-deputy in his stead. In the mean time the commissioners were busied in endeavouring to improve the revenue; but, although all of them were men of experience in the genius and manners of the Irish, all their attempts were rather plausible than practicable. The papists, supported by Rome and Spain, still continued to act with great insolence, and in some churches exercised their own religion. This drew a severe proclamation from the government towards the end of this reign, ordering all the regulars to depart out of Ireland; and the famous Dr. Usher, archbishop of Armagh, was highly serviceable to the protestant interest, by his learned and vigorous sermons against popery.

In the spring of the year 1625, James was seized with a tertian ague; but though such agues are not held dangerous in that season of the year, he was so reduced by repeated fits, that he died at Theobalds, his favourite residence, on the twenty-seventh of March, 1625, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after reigning over England twenty-two years and three days, and over Scotland almost from his cradle. Authors in general have been extremely extremely severe on Buckingham, as if he had hastened the end of James by poison; but this rests only on the credit of ill-informed spiteful writers: it cannot, indeed, be denied that improper applications were made to James during his last illness; and perhaps even the physicians themselves mistook his disease. What confirms this suspicion is a note of bishop Laud's, entered into his Diary, and which, I think, has never been observed by any historian of this reign, in which "he fears the king's disease, though to all appearance it was a tertian ague, was the gout, and that a wrong application of medicines had driven it from his feet to his inward vital parts." The countess of Buckingham, and some other ladies, who had no opinion of regular physicians, but thought that life might be rendered immortal by the secrets of mountebanks, attended James, who, being impatient for health, fell into the same fatal mistake. Buckingham had been, some time before, ill of an ague, and had been cured by a vomit, a plaster, and a posset-drink; which James insisted should now be administered to himself: according to Buckingham's defence against the charge on this head brought against him by the commons, he did all he could to dissuade the king from taking any thing that was not prescribed by his physicians; but James obstinately sent for the plaster and the drink, which were applied in Buckingham's absence. If James (as some passionate authors pretend he did) entertained the least suspicion of Buckingham, he would not have failed to communicate it to the archbishop of Canterbury and the lord-keeper Williams, who attended him on his death-bed, nor (as both of them hated Buckingham) would they have failed to have divulged it afterwards.

The character of James has been variously handled by different historians, most of whom appear to have wrote under the influence of favourable prepossessions or extreme prejudice: some represent him as the perfect pattern of a good king; others have loaded him with reproaches by aggravating his failings. The reason of this diversity proceeds from the history of this reign being penned at a time when the animosity of parties was at a great height; therefore the character of this prince must not be formed either on the praises of the one, or the invectives of the other, but upon the manner of his governing, upon his speeches and actions; and this our readers will be perfectly able to do for themselves, by recollecting the principal circumstances of his reign: we shall therefore content ourselves with observing in general, that he was endowed with many virtues, but no one of them pure or free from the contagion of the neighbouring vices. His liberality degenerated into profusion, his learning into pedantry, his love of peace into pusillanimity, his wisdom into cunning, and his friendship into light fancy and boyish fondness. He was certainly a great dissembler; this failing accompanied him even in the most common transactions of life, and made him pass for a worse man than he really was; he frequently missed a favourite point by his duplicity, which he might have secured by openness and resolution. His too great aversion to war, which has from some got him the reproach of want of courage, was certainly a defect productive of the most happy consequences to the nation he governed; the people were blessed with a most profound peace, which no troubles interrupted; they were enriched by an extensive commerce, which few taxes oppressed; and, freed from the care of foreign affairs, they had leisure to attend to their own concerns, and secure their liberties by many excellent and wise regulations*.

James, by his wife, Anne of Denmark, had seven children:

1. Henry, already mentioned.
2. Robert, who died in his infancy.
3. Charles, who succeeded him on the throne.
4. Elizabeth, married to the elector Palatine.
5. Margaret,
6. Mary, and
7. Sophia, who all died infants.

He had no illegitimate issue; and what may appear surprizing, though he is said to have been extremely fond of obscene and immodest language, he never discovered the least tendency towards a passion for any mistress.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES.

What chiefly distinguishes the reign of James, is the commencement of the English colonies in America, which have now increased to such an amazing height of power and grandeur. Queen Elizabeth had done little more than given a name to the continent of Virginia; and after her planting one feeble colony, which soon decayed, that country was entirely abandoned. In 1606, Newport carried over a colony, and began a settlement; which the company, established for that purpose in London and Bristol, took care to furnish with yearly supplies of provisions, utensils, and new inhabitants. About 1609, Argal discovered a shorter and more direct passage to Virginia, than had hitherto been known, and left the tract of the ancient navigators, who had first directed their course southward to the tropic, sailed westward by means of the trade-winds, and then turned northward till they arrived at the English settlements. The same year, sir Thomas Gates and sir George Somers set sail with a company of five hundred persons for Virginia: Somers, being attacked by a storm, was driven into Bermudas, and laid the foundation of a settlement in those islands.

Lord Delawar afterwards undertook the government of the English colonies: but notwithstanding all his care, assisted by supplies from James, and by money from the first lottery ever known in England, the settlement of these countries was attended with such difficulties, that, in 1614, there were not alive above four hundred men of all that had been sent thither. After supplying themselves with provisions more immediately necessary for the support of life, the new planters began to cultivate tobacco; and James, notwithstanding his aversion to that drug, gave them leave to import it into England; and forbade, by a public proclamation, all importation from Spain. By degrees more colonies were planted on that continent, and gave names to the places where they were established, leaving that of Virginia to the province first settled. The island of Barbadoes was also planted in this reign.

In the fourth year of king James, A. D. 1607, there was so great an inundation from the river

STORY OF THE

The first part of the story is the most interesting. It tells of the early days of the settlement, when the pioneers first came to the land. They found it a wild and desolate place, but they were determined to make it a home for themselves. They built their huts and cleared their fields, and in a few years a small community had grown up. The story then goes on to tell of the various adventures and hardships that the pioneers endured. There were many battles with the Indians, and the pioneers often found themselves in a desperate struggle for survival. But they were brave and determined, and they finally won out. The story ends with a description of the present state of the settlement, which is now a thriving community.

The second part of the story is also very interesting. It tells of the growth of the settlement, as more and more people came to live there. The pioneers were not content with their own little community, but they wanted to see the settlement grow into a great city. They worked hard and saved their money, and in a few years they had enough to build a large and beautiful city. CHARLES I.

C. Grignon sc.

Severn, in some parts of Somersetshire and Gloucestershire, that the water rose above the tops of the houses, insomuch that there perished by this fatal accident no less than eighty persons, and the damages done upon the whole amounted to upwards of twenty thousand pounds.

In his sixth year, 1609, a frost began in December, which lasted till April following, with such violence, that not only the Thames was so frozen that heavy carriages passed over it as on dry land, but many animals, especially birds, perished; and almost all the garden-herbage was destroyed.

CHARLES I. The second King of ENGLAND of the House of STUART: A. D. 1625.

THE death of James caused very little alteration in the English court, as that monarch had, before his decease, been altogether under the guidance of the prince and Buckingham: their friends were in full possession of the court and cabinet, and all the great officers of state were continued. The council meeting immediately after notice given of the king's decease, they caused Charles prince of Wales, his only son, then living, and now in the twenty-fifth year of his age, to be proclaimed king, to the universal satisfaction of the nation, as a prince of admirable endowments both of mind and body. The funeral obsequies of the deceased king were celebrated on the seventh of May, being carried from Somerset-house (to which palace it had been conveyed from Theobalds) to Westminster, where it was interred in St. Peter's church with great funeral pomp and solemnity: the young king himself performed the office of chief mourner, which, though it was contrary to the custom of crowned heads, yet he chose rather to relinquish some part of his state, than be seen wanting in filial piety.

No sooner were the funeral obsequies performed, than the king sent to hasten the coming over of the princess Henrietta Maria of France, his destined consort, to whom, on Sunday the first of May, he had, by his proxy the duke of Chevreuse, been espoused, in the church of Notre Dame, at Paris, the cardinal de Richelieu performing the nuptial ceremony. Soon after the queen began her journey towards England, being accompanied as far as Amiens by the queen her mother, the duke of Orleans her brother, and the duke and duchess of Chevreuse, and a great train of French nobility, together with the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Carlisle, Holland, Montgomery, and many of the English gentry, who were sent over for that purpose. From Amiens they proceeded to Boulogne, where a fleet of twenty-one English ships were waiting to take her on board, with the duchess of Buckingham and other English ladies of quality, to serve her as attendants. On Trinity Sunday, June 12, late at night, she arrived at Dover; which being signified to the king, then at Canterbury, he went the next morning to meet her, and that evening the marriage was consummated at Canterbury. The sixteenth of the same month, the king and queen made their entry into London; but the plague then raging in the capital, abated considerably of the pomp and solemnity. But neither that, nor any thing else could divert the king's attention from the weighty concerns of the realm; for the great assembly of the nation meeting two days after his arrival in London, he went thither, and opened his first parliament with the following speech.

“ You are not ignorant, that, at your earnest intreaty, March 23, 1623, my father (of happy memory) first took up arms for the recovery of the Palatinate; for which purpose, by your assistance, he began to form a considerable army, and to prepare a goodly armada and navy royal: but death intervening between him and the achievement, the war, with the crown, is devolved upon me; to the prosecution thereof as I am obliged both in nature and honour, so I question not but the same necessity continuing, you will cherish the action with the like affection, and further it with a ready contribution. True it is, you furnished my father with affectionate supplies, but they held no symmetry or proportion with the charge of so great an enterprize: for those your donatives are all disbursed to a penny, and I am enforced to summons you hither to tell you, that neither can the army advance, nor the fleet set forth, without farther aid. Consider, I pray you, that the eyes of all Europe are fixed upon me, to whom I shall appear ridiculous, as though I were unable to outgo muster and ostentation, if you now desert me: consider, it is my first attempt, wherein if I sustain a foil, it will blemish all my future honour. If mine cannot, let your reputation move you to deliver and expedite me fairly out of this war, wherewith you have encumbered me (let it never be said, whereinto you have betrayed me): I desire, therefore, your speedy supply. The sun you know is entering into his declining point, so it will soon be too late to set forth, when it will be rather not too soon to return. Again, I must mind you of the mortality regnant in this city, which should it (as so it may, and no breach of privilege neither) arrest any one member of either house, it would soon put a period both to the consultation and session; so that your own preservation necessitates an early resolution; in sum, three of the best rhetoricians, Honour, Opportunity, and Safety, are all of a plot, and plead, you see, for expedition. Perhaps it may be expected I should say something in way of account of my religion, as also of the temper and tenor of my future government; but as I hope I have not been guilty of any thing which may justly start the least question in either, so I desire you would repose in this assurance, that I will in neither vary from those principles wherein I have been instituted at the feet of that eminent Gamaliel, my late father.”

This speech was very well received, and though it did not produce so great a supply as the exigency of affairs required, yet the commons gave two subsidies without any condition, and the clergy three; and in the grant of the laity, the papists were to pay double. The king very graciously accepted the gift, as an earnest of the good affections of his people, in reference to greater sums which he expected to follow; but the plague increasing in London, the parliament, on the eleventh of October, was adjourned to Oxford, to be held there on the first of August.

King James, a little before his death, promised to send the king of France five or six ships, to be employed against the Genoese; but, afterwards, Lewis XIII. wanting these ships for the siege of Rochelle, prevailed with Charles I. by Buckingham's means, that he might employ them where he pleased; and, accordingly, they were sent to Dieppe, under the command of vice-admiral Pennington. The commanders of these ships discovering that they were to go against Rochelle, weighed anchor, and sailed back to England. Pennington informing the duke of Buckingham of it, received an express order, confirmed by another from the king himself, to return to Dieppe with the ships, and put them into the hands of the French; which was done accordingly: but the mariners all deserted, utterly refusing to serve against Rochelle.

This affair made a great noise at Oxford, where the parliament was to be assembled. Buckingham's ill conduct in this, and other respects, was loudly complained of, and the commons put in a very ill humour. On the day appointed, the king sent for the two houses, to attend him in Christ-church hall; where, in a short speech, he acquainted them with his wants for fitting out the fleet, and other necessary matters; adding, that the eyes of all Christendom were fixed upon his conduct.

The commons, upon their return from the king to their house, had several long debates upon the substance of his speech, and the present condition of the kingdom, all tending to arraign the measures of government. The truth is, that Charles had, in his speech, suffered those arbitrary principles which he inherited from his father, and which at length wrought his own ruin, to escape from him too clearly for any one to mistake them. While he meant to beg, he seemed to threaten; by declaring, as he did, that civil treatment would endear to him the use of parliaments, he might be supposed to insinuate, that harsh treatment would estrange him from those popular assemblies, and perhaps induce him to discontinue them intirely: a power, which, however desirous he might be to usurp, the commons were by no means willing to allow him; and their great secret was now to straiten the king, as the only way to make themselves of importance. On this occasion, sir Edward Coke took the lead: he observed, "that if the king's necessities arose through improvidence (which he proved to be the case in many instances), the parliament had no cause to give:" he then fell upon the management of the court, the frauds in the customs, the mismanagement of the treaty with Spain, large fees annexed to the new invented offices, old useless offices continued, the multiplicity of offices in one man (meaning the duke of Buckingham), the vast increase of pensions, and the immoderate luxury of the courtiers. He enforced all these, and many more political abuses with so great keenness, that they resolved to appoint a committee to consider of the present state of the nation, and to invite the duke of Buckingham to it, to answer the objections against him. But it was very visible, from the spirit the house shewed, that the duke was to expect little favour there; for though they contended for an immediate declaration against the king of Spain, for the necessity of recovering the Palatinate, and of reforming the king's council, yet they absolutely refused to saddle the nation with any more subsidies, or to anticipate their grants of money. This drew a smart speech from one Clark, a member, (perhaps the same who had been employed by Buckingham in Spain), as if the speeches thrown out on that occasion had too much invective bitterness in them, and were unseasonable for the time. Though those are the only expressions charged in the Journal of the house upon Clark, yet, the friends to the freedom of speech in the parliament would have expelled him the house, had it not been for some moderate members, who prevailed to have him only committed to the serjeant at arms for two nights, and acknowledge his error at the bar of the house upon his knees. In fine, before they would agree to any answer to what the king requested of them, they proceeded to the redress of grievances, and drew up a petition against popish recusants, which was presented to his majesty by their speaker, who returned the parliament a very gracious and satisfactory answer. Nevertheless, this condescension in the king did not at all win upon them; for, when the matter of a supply came again to be debated, the same opposition was made, and the majority insisted on a redress of grievances before granting a supply. The king, seeing what course the commons were taking, was extremely offended; first, as by their slowness they broke all his measures for the present campaign; secondly, he deemed it a manifest affront and contempt of his person, to presume openly to attack his servants and ministers, or rather himself under their name: so, perceiving no likelihood of a speedy supply, which was the sole end of calling the parliament, he was determined to dissolve it, and thereupon went to the house for that purpose. The commons were resolved into a grand committee, when the usher of the black rod came to demand their presence in the lords house; but having notice of his errand, before they would admit the speaker to resume the chair, to sit as a house, Mr. Glanville, one of the members, stood up, and declared the sense of the house in these words; "That thanks be given to his majesty for his gracious answer to our petition for religion; next, for the care of our health, in giving us leave to depart at this dangerous time; lastly, we make the most dutiful declaration of our affection and loyalty, and purpose to supply his majesty in a parliamentary way in a fitting and convenient time." This being done, the usher was called in, and delivered his message; and the dissolution of the parliament immediately ensued.*

* On the twelfth of August, not having sat full three weeks to do business, both at Westminster and Oxford.

Soon after this, a proclamation was issued for putting in execution the laws against popish recusants; commanding the return, by a prefixed day, of children of noblemen, and others, sent to be educated in popish schools, or seminaries, abroad; and all of the king's subjects under the pay of the emperor, the king of Spain, and the archduke, who then governed the Spanish Netherlands, were speedily enjoined to return to their native country, to be employed in the king's service; for the refractoriness of the parliament did not hinder the king from pursuing his design of continuing, or rather of beginning, the war with Spain. For though the late king had taken some measures which tended to a war, there had not, however, been any hostilities committed since the breach of the treaty. Charles resolving therefore to undertake this war, sent the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Holland ambassadors to the United Provinces; where they met, at the Hague, the ambassadors of France and Denmark, and concluded a league with them and the States for restoring the liberties of Germany. In the mean time, to supply the want of parliamentary aids, Charles issued privy-seals for borrowing money from his subjects. The advantage derived from this expedient, was but a poor compensation for the odium with which it was attended. By means, however, of that supply, the king was at last enabled to fit out his fleet.

It consisted of eighty good ships, with the addition of some Dutch vessels; and should have been sent out early in the summer, to make an attempt upon the coast of Spain; but, through want of money, and other obstacles, it was the beginning of October before it was ready to leave the ports. Sir Edward Cecil, lately promoted to the title of viscount Wimbleton, was appointed commander: and had under him the earl of Essex as his vice-admiral.

After putting to sea, they were overtaken by a storm, which not only dispersed them, but also the English ships which blocked up Dunkirk: the fleet, however, met at the rendezvous off Cape St. Vincent, where a council of war was held; for so undetermined was the whole expedition, that the officers were yet ignorant of their destination. The brave earl of Essex naturally gave his voice for attacking Cadiz, the scene of his father's glory; and his proposal being carried by a majority of voices, they bore towards that port. But by this time all Spain was alarmed, and so dreadful to the Spaniards was the English valour under Elizabeth, that their king was ready in person to have marched down, at the head of a royal army, to the defence of his coast. When the English arrived at the place, they found every thing in readiness to give them a warm reception; and the attack of Port Puntal was, with twenty English and five Dutch ships, committed to the earl of Essex, who was so eager upon it, that he was afterwards accused by lord Wimbleton of suffering the shipping which lay under its guns, and which drew out to fight him, to escape. Whatever ground there might be for this charge, it is certain that the shipping of the Spaniards, which consisted of seventeen stout ships and eight or ten gallies, finding that they were an unequal match for the whole of the English fleet, if it should come up, retired to Port Real; and the earl of Essex, after spending a great deal of powder and shot, found it impracticable to take Puntal on that side. Upon this, sir John Burroughs, an old English officer, landed with his regiment, and driving some companies of Spaniards, who had opposed his landing, back to the fort, the Spanish governor surrendered it. But the taking of this fort was of no other consequence than as it opened a passage to Cadiz itself; and it commanding a large extent of villages and country round, the raw English troops could not resist the deliciousness of the Spanish wines, which proved a loss to the expedition; for when a squadron, under the command of sir Samuel Argale, was sent to attack the ships that had retired to Port Real, the design miscarried; whilst dissensions amongst the officers increasing with diseases amongst the soldiers, the lord Wimbleton abandoned the fort they had taken, and reembarked his troops, which were now greatly weakened by sickness. The fleet then, in pursuance to instructions, cruised for some days off St. Vincent, for the Spanish plate-fleet, then on its return from America; and, after narrowly missing it, Wimbleton brought back nothing but infected crews, sickly companies, a broken reputation, disheartened officers, leaky ships, and national dishonour, about the beginning of December.

Charles, having missed so rich a prize, was again obliged to have recourse to parliament, though his authority was weakened by this miscarriage of his enterprizes, and the imprudence of the Spanish war became every day more apparent: but though his growing necessities increased his dependence, and made him less liable to withstand the encroachment of the commons, he was determined to try once more that regular and constitutional method of supply; however, the solemnity of his coronation was first to be performed, which was celebrated on the second of February, 1626. To save expence, and to prevent the danger of popular concourse, as the plague, though greatly decreased, was not quite gone, the king omitted the riding in state from the Tower to Whitehall. Sir Thomas Coventry an able lawyer, who had succeeded Williams as keeper of the great-seal, officiated as such on this occasion.

Four days after the coronation, viz. on the sixth of February, the parliament met, and was opened by a very ministerial speech from the new lord-keeper, greatly extolling the piety and wisdom of the king, and acquainting the two houses, that as his majesty intended the session should be very short, he expected they would make all imaginable dispatch in granting supplies. But the commons, with their speaker, sir Heneage Finch, being returned to their house, instead of paying any regard to the lord-keeper's speech, thanked his majesty for his zeal for religion, and began, where they had left off at Oxford, with an enquiry into the national grievances, and the malversations of government. In order that the grievances might be examined with more regularity and clearness, committees were appointed; one for secret affairs, one for grievances, and one for religion. The latter, of which Mr. Pym was chairman, called in question certain books written by Mr. Montague, one of the king's chaplains, which they reported to the house to be erroneous, false, and full of papistical and Arminian opinions, contrary to the articles of the English church. The grievances, as reported by Mr. Whitby, chairman of that committee, were stated under four heads.

" I. The state of the king in the constant revenue of the crown.

" II. The condition of the subject in his freedom.

" III. The cause of the nation's good success in former times.

" IV. The present condition of the kingdom."

Under the first head was considered the great dispositions of lands and pensions, "mero motu," and other exorbitant expences. In the second, the bringing in of new impositions, the multiplying monopolies, and the levying tonnage and poundage without an act of parliament. Under the third they ascribed the great renown and reputation of the nation in former times, to the wisdom and gravity of the counsellors, when nothing was ordered but by public debate; whence arose readiness in the subject to assist their sovereign in purse and person. In the fourth was represented the loss of the nation's wonted reputation, in the expedition to Cadiz, and others, which was imputed to the want of such counsels as were heretofore used; forasmuch as men, through difference in success, were backward either to venture their persons or their purses.

From generals the house proceeded to particulars, and at last Buckingham was openly named as the source of all the national grievances and indignities. Nothing could shew the mutability of human affairs, and how little dependence is to be placed on the affections of the people, more than this conduct of the commons; for in the last parliament of king James, this very duke of Buckingham, against whom every voice was now open, was extolled as the great ornament and honour of the English nation, and the chief preserver of the kingdom from the Spanish practices; and no honour was thought great enough to requite his merits. No sooner, however, was the present dispositions of that house divulged, than informations from all the officious busy heads in the kingdom flocked in against Buckingham; and the commons proceeded with the greatest warmth and acrimony in the enquiries against the duke, who had notice sent him of what they were about. In the course of these debates, Dr. Turner, a physician, proposed the following queries against Buckingham:

" I. Whether the duke, being admiral, be not the cause of the loss of the king's royalty in the Narrow Seas?

" II. Whether the unreasonable, exorbitant, and immense gifts of money and lands bestowed upon the duke and his kindred, be not the cause of impairing the king's revenues, and impoverishing the crown?

" III. Whether the multiplicity of offices conferred upon the duke, and others depending upon him (whereof they were not capable), be not the cause of the evil government of this kingdom?

" IV. Whether recusants in general, by a kind of connivance, be not borne out and increased by reason of the duke's mother and father-in-law being known papists?

" V. Whether the sale of honours, offices, and places of judicature and ecclesiastical livings and promotions (a scandal and hurt to the kingdom), be not through the duke?

" VI. Whether the duke's staying at home, being admiral and general in the fleet of the sea and land-army, were not the cause of the bad success and overthrow of that action; and whether he did give good direction for that design?"

In the mean while the speaker received a letter from the king, in which he represented his necessities to the house, and demanded a supply; and at the same time promised to do every thing in his power to satisfy his faithful commons, and redress the grievances they complained of. To give the more strength to this letter, sir Edward Weston, chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered to the house of commons a message, in which he laid before them five articles of expence to be provided for. Upon the receipt of this letter and message, the commons returned an answer full of respect, submission, expressions of zeal for his majesty's service, and even promises of assisting him in his wants; however they artfully intimated to him, that redress of grievances ought to precede the supply they intended to grant him, and that this was the only condition on which he could expect any assistance. It was the misfortune of Charles to consider this answer of the commons as the result, not of duty, but of fear; and he thought that a few additional big words in reply, would quiet all opposition; he therefore sent the speaker the following letter.

" Mr. Speaker,

" The answer of the commons, delivered by you, I like well of, and do take it for a full and satisfactory answer, and I thank them for it; and I hope you will, with all expedition, take a course for performance thereof, the which will turn to your own good as well as mine: but for your clause therein for presenting of grievances, I take that but for a parenthesis in your speech, and not a condition; and yet, for an answer for that part, I will tell you I will be as willing to hear your grievances as my predecessors have been, so that you will apply yourselves to redress grievances, and not to enquire after grievances: I must let you know, that I will not allow any of my servants to be questioned amongst you, much less such as are of eminent place, and near unto me. The old question was, What shall be done to the man the king will honour? but now it hath been the labour of some, to seek what may be done against him whom the king thinks fit to honour. I see you especially aim at the duke of Buckingham: I wonder what hath altered your affections towards him. I do well remember, that in the last parliament in my father's time, when he was an instrument to break the treaties, all of you (as yet I cannot say all, for I know some of you are changed, but yet the house of commons is always the same) did so much honour and respect him, that all the honour conferred upon him was too little; and what he hath done since to alter and change your minds, I cannot say; but can assure you he hath not meddled or done any thing concerning the public or commonwealth, but by special direction and appointment, and as my servant; and is so far from gaining or improving his estate thereby, that I verily think he hath rather impaired the same. I would you would hasten my supply, or else it will be worse for yourselves; for if any ill happen, I think I shall be the last that shall feel it."

And lest this style, which was rather that of an eastern monarch than an English sovereign, should not be sufficiently understood, he sent to demand satisfaction satisfaction of Mr. Cook for certain words he had spoken, and of Dr. Turner for the queries he had presented. At the same time he prohibited them from touching his minister and servant, Buckingham, and commanded them to finish in a few days the subsidy-bill, otherwise they must expect to be immediately dissolved. These proceedings set the whole house in a flame; and though Buckingham, a few days afterwards, endeavoured to soften the rigour of these harsh commands by a plausible and specious oration, the impression which they made was not so easily effaced, and produced a remonstrance from the commons to this effect:

“That, with extreme joy and comfort, they acknowledged the favour of his majesty’s most gracious expression of affection to his people and this present parliament: that, concerning Mr. Cook, it is true he let fall some few words that might admit an ill construction, and that the house was displeased therewith, as they declared by a general check at the very time he spoke them; and though Mr. Cook’s explanation of his mind more clearly, did somewhat abate the offence of the house, yet were they resolved to take it into farther consideration, and so have done; the effect whereof had appeared ere this, had it not been interrupted by this his majesty’s message; and the like interruption in the business of Dr. Turner.

“As concerning the examination of the letters of his secretary of state, as also of his majesty’s own, and searching the signet-office, and other records, they had done nothing therein not warranted by the precedents of former parliaments upon the like occasions.

“That concerning the duke, they did humbly beseech his majesty to be informed, that it hath been the constant and undoubted usage of parliaments, to question and complain of any person, of what degree soever; and what they should do in relation to him, they little doubted but it would redound to the honour of the crown and safety of the kingdom.

“Lastly, as to the matter of supply, that if a petition may be made of other things, importing his service, then in consultations amongst them, they were resolved so to supply him, as might evidence the truth of their intentions, and make them safe at home and formidable abroad.”

To this the king answered briefly, that he would have them consult about matters of the greatest importance in the first place, and that they should have time enough for other matters afterwards: but this stopped not the proceedings against the duke of Buckingham, to which the earl of Bristol also contributed not a little in the house of lords.

As long as James lived, Bristol, secure of the secret favour of that monarch, behaved with great duty and submission; in hopes that an opportunity would some time occur of regaining his former credit and authority; nor did he entirely despair, even after the accession of Charles. In obedience to the king’s order he continued at his country-seat, and refrained from attending in parliament. Many attempts he made to recover the good opinion of his master; but finding them all ineffectual, and perceiving Charles to be entirely ruled by Buckingham, his inveterate enemy, he determined no longer to keep any measure with the court. When the parliament was summoned, Charles, by a stretch of prerogative, had ordered, that no writ, as usual, should be sent to Bristol. That nobleman presented a petition to the lords; and entreated their good offices with the king for obtaining what was his due as a peer of the realm. His writ was accordingly sent him; but accompanied with a letter from the lord-keeper Coventry, forbidding him, in the king’s name, to attend in parliament. This letter Bristol transmitted to the lords; and begged their advice with regard to his conduct in so delicate a matter. The king’s prohibition was superseded, and Bristol took his seat in the house. Enraged at these repeated instances of courage, which the court called contumacy, Charles caused his attorney-general to prefer an impeachment of high-treason against Bristol. In return Bristol accused Buckingham of high-treason. The earl’s defence of himself and accusation of the duke are both extant; and, together with some original letters, which are likewise preserved, exhibit the clearest and most distinct views of all the negotiations with Spain. From the whole it appears, that the duke had been guilty of many acts of folly and presumption; but it would be difficult to collect thence any action which in the eye of the law could be held a crime; much less could convict him of high-treason.

The impeachment of the commons was still less dangerous to the duke, if it be examined by the standard of law and equity. The house, after having voted, upon the queries of Dr. Turner, “that common fame was a sufficient ground of accusation by the commons,” proceeded to draw up a set of articles against Buckingham.

They accused him “of having engrossed many offices in his person; of having bought two of them; of neglecting to guard the seas, insomuch that many merchant ships had been taken by the enemy; of furnishing ships to the French king, in order to serve against the Huguenots; of being concerned in the sale of honours and offices; of procuring extensive grants from the crown; of obtaining many titles of honour for his kindred; and of giving physic to the late king without the knowledge of his physicians.” All these articles appear, from a careful comparison of the charge and reply, to be either frivolous or false, or both.

The only article of importance was, “that he had compelled the East India company to pay him the sum of ten thousand pounds; that he had confiscated some goods belonging to French merchants, on pretence of their being the property of Spanish subjects.” The trial was never brought to full conclusion; so that it is difficult for us to form any distinct opinion with regard to these articles: but it must be acknowledged, that the duke’s answer, in these particulars, as in all the rest, is abundantly clear and satisfactory.

In the mean while Charles having ordered sir Dudley Diggs, who had introduced the impeachment against Buckingham, and sir John Elliot, who had wound it up with great violence and vehemence, to be committed to prison; the commons immediately declared that they would desist from all farther business, till satisfaction should be given them for this violation of their privileges. Charles alleged in excuse, that those members, in their accusations of the duke, had dropped some seditious expressions touching majesty itself: upon enquiry it appeared, that no such expressions had been used; the members were discharged, and the king instead of gaining any advantage by this attempt, only exhibited a fresh instance of his arbitrary disposition, and exposed himself still more to the resentment of the commons.

The ill temper of the lower house seems to have infected the peers, though not to so great a degree. The Stuart family imitated their great predecessor Elizabeth in some of her weaknesses, and Charles, upon a suspicion that the earl of Arundel had consented to a marriage between lord Maltravers and the sister of the duke of Lenox, had ordered him, without expressing his offence in the commitment, to the Tower. The lords looking upon this as a breach of their privileges, began to consider the case, when Charles, according to his wonted but fatal policy, made the affair personal to himself, by ordering the lord-keeper to inform the house, "that the earl of Arundel was restrained for a misdemeanor which was personal to his majesty, and lay in the proper knowledge of his majesty, and had no relation to matters of parliament. Notwithstanding this message, the house continued to search for precedents, and the same message was renewed from the king by the lord-treasurer. The house still proceeded in their enquiry, and found themselves deprived of five proxies by the imprisonment of the earl of Arundel, and that there was but one precedent of a peer being committed, the parliament sitting, without trial or judgment of the peers in parliament. After some researches, the house presented a petition and remonstrance to his majesty, setting forth, "that it was their undoubted right, that no peer, sitting in parliament, is to be imprisoned without orders from the house of peers, unless it be for treason, felony, or refusing to give security for the peace." Many debates passed in the house of lords upon this petition, and upon sundry messages from the king about this privilege, which lasted from the fourteenth of March till the eighth of June: at length they voted to proceed upon no business, and even refused to hear the duke of Buckingham's defence (whose impeachment was then depending), until they were righted as to their privileges in that matter. This unusual firmness of the peers, which they seemed to have copied from the commons, at last produced the deliverance of the earl of Arundel. This was the second instance in which the spirit of the two houses had triumphed over the authority of the king; and it is hard to say, whether the unreasonable obstinacy or compliances of Charles did him most hurt.

The commons made another attack this session, which, had it succeeded, would have given a severe blow to the royal prerogative: they were forming a remonstrance against the practice of levying tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament. This article, together with the new duties laid on merchandize, composed near one half of the crown-revenue; and by stripping the king of these resources, they would have reduced him to a total dependence on his subjects. Charles being informed of these vigorous proceedings, immediately determined to dissolve the parliament. When this resolution was known, the peers, who had all along behaved with great loyalty and submission to his majesty, endeavoured to employ their good offices between him and the commons, and prepared a most excellent petition, intreating the king to allow the parliament to sit some time longer; but

Charles had such a dislike to this parliament, that he would not admit the lords into his presence to present their petition; and, on the fifteenth of June, caused the parliament to be dissolved by a commission under the great-seal. Shortly after, the king published a declaration concerning the reasons for the dissolution of this and the former parliament: and a few days after, he commanded all persons who had any copies of the commons remonstrances, to burn the same, on pain of his highest displeasure. The second proclamation contained very express commands not to preach or dispute upon the controverted points of Arminianism, either for or against them, as it only tended to breed contention.

Mean while an information was preferred, by the king's special command, in the Star-chamber against the duke of Buckingham, for applying a plaster to the late king: but it was so managed that the cause never came to a hearing.

As the king had received no aid from the parliament, he was reduced to great straits for want of money: he had a war with the house of Austria to maintain, besides supplying his allies with the promised succours, and to put his kingdom in a posture of defence; all this could not be done with the ordinary revenues, recourse was therefore to be had to expedients for raising money.

A fresh incumbrance happened from the king of Denmark, his majesty's uncle, whom he had engaged in a war with the emperor, but was entirely defeated on the twenty-seventh of August, by the Imperial troops, and lost all his baggage and train of artillery. This accident obliged Charles to support the Danish monarch, who was in a very ill situation, and could not avoid making peace with the emperor, unless speedily relieved. The method judged most proper to raise money on this urgent occasion, was by a general loan from the subject, according as every man was assessed in the rolls of the last subsidy.

The council on this occasion issued a proclamation in the king's name, wherein, among other articles, is the following very remarkable one: "If any person or persons whatsoever shall refuse to pay the duties, customs, subsidies, or imposts aforesaid, unto our farmers, collectors, or officers, in manner aforesaid, then our will and pleasure is, and we do farther grant, by these presents, unto the lords and others of our privy-council for the time being, or unto the lord-treasurer of England, or chancellor of the Exchequer, now or for the time being, full power and authority to commit all and every such person and persons to prison, who shall disobey this our order and declaration, there to continue until they, and every of them, so disobeying, shall have conformed and submitted themselves unto due obedience concerning the premises."

The reader is to observe, that this proclamation and those powers were only to be enforced "until such time as by parliament, as in former times, it might receive an absolute settling:" and in another part of the proclamation the taxes are ordered "to be received as fully as heretofore they have been levied, gathered, and renewed, by authority of parliament." From those clauses two things are fairly deducible; first, that there was no shadow of authority from parliament for levying these taxes; and secondly, that Charles expressly declared clared his proclamation to have the force of an act of parliament.

In order to advance the loan, care was taken to publish a list of such as had freely subscribed, for a good example to others; and all the peers and gentlemen were ordered to repair to their country-seats, that their absence might cause no delay or obstacle to the subscriptions. Sir Randolph Crew, lord chief-justice, shewing no zeal for advancing this loan, was removed, and his place given to sir Nicholas Hide.

This example of the king's displeasure was not, however, sufficient for the purpose; so that the court was obliged to use violent remedies in order to force those that were obstinate. The common people who refused to subscribe to the loan were enrolled as soldiers, and ordered to serve in his majesty's troops; as for persons of birth and rank, they were summoned to appear before the council, and, upon a second refusal to lend money, were confined to places at a great distance from their habitations; and such as refused to be so confined, were committed to the several prisons in London. Sir Thomas Wentworth, who was afterwards earl of Strafford, and a most zealous adherent to the king, was among the imprisoned.

At the same time, in order to fit out a fleet, the maritime towns were commanded, by an order of council, to equip a certain number of vessels: the city of London was rated at twenty ships. This is the first instance in Charles's reign of ship-money; a taxation which had been imposed by Elizabeth, but which, after being pushed some steps higher by Charles, occasioned such violent murmurs. The court had also means from whence they expected great advantages, but which proved more detrimental than beneficial to the king; this was to cause ministers to preach, as a Scripture doctrine, that subjects were obliged to obey the king's commands without examination. Among these preachers Dr. Sibthorp and Dr. Manwaring distinguished themselves. On this occasion, the king, by a lordly stretch of prerogative, sequestered Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, from his jurisdiction, and confined him to his house at Ford, for refusing to license the printing the sermons of these tools of arbitrary power.

While these things were transacting at home, the French king, in order to improve the difference between the Dutch and the Spaniards, and promote a war between them, concluded a treaty at the Hague, by the baron de Couper, concerning the equipping a fleet of twenty ships, under the admiral Hautin, with a design to block up Genoa by sea, while the constable Lesdiguières should besiege it by land; and the French ambassador in London obtained of king Charles an English man of war and seventeen merchant ships, to be employed in the same expedition; but shortly after these English ships were received into the pay of France, monsieur de Soubise, taking advantage of the French army's advance towards Italy, invited the protestant inhabitants of Rochelle to take arms against the French government, by whom they had of late been greatly oppressed; and he, with some ships he got together, seized on the Isle of Rhé, as also on several sail of French ships lying in the harbour. Lewis XIII. was so incensed at this act, that, abandoning his design upon Italy, he turned all his thoughts towards reducing the rebellious Rochellers: and this occasioned another treaty at the Hague, between d'Effesses, the French ambassador, and the States, which was concluded on the twelfth of April this year, whereby it was agreed, that the twenty ships under Hautin were to be employed against Rochelle and the prince de Soubise. The protestants of France, with just reason, took great offence at the Dutch, for giving their assistance against the Rochellers; but their alliance with France, and interests of state, prevailed over all other considerations with the selfish Hollanders. The French admiral, Montmorency, being thus strengthened with the Dutch fleet and the seven English ships, soon obliged Soubise to take refuge in the Isle of Oleron, and retook most of the ships from him; at the same time they formed the blockade of Rochelle by sea, whilst the French army marched to invest it on the land-side. Charles was greatly offended that the ships he had lent the court of France should be employed in this manner, having granted them upon condition only of their being used against the Spaniards; and, accordingly, sent an expostulatory message to the king of France, demanding restitution of the ships; and the French not returning a satisfactory answer, he caused a rich French ship, named the Newhaven, to be seized here in England. This occasioned great clamour in France; and that court, by way of retaliation, laid an embargo upon the English merchant ships and goods in their harbours; but in a short time matters were compromised, and the English ships were sent home: thus affairs remained upon a pacific footing for some time. But, towards the end of this year, the king, upon some disgust against the queen's chaplains and domestics, dismissed them all, after paying them their wages and salaries. The king of France, highly resenting this breach of the marriage articles, seized on all the merchant ships which lay in the river of Bourdeaux; and the English ministry laid hold of this event to engage Charles in a war with France, at a time they were sensible he hardly knew how to continue that he had begun against the house of Austria. The duke de Soubise, and Mr. St. Blancard, a gentleman of Languedoc, came over to England in the beginning of the following year, to manage this affair, and to engage Charles to assist the Rochellers with a fleet, who were now threatened with a siege.

It was not till the month of May that this fleet was fitted out: and now every thing was made ready for the expedition, it required no little art to draw up a declaration of war against France: which declaration was, however, at last, issued; and imported in substance, "That the house of Austria (conspiring the ruin of all those of the reformed religion throughout Christendom, as he said plainly appeared in the affairs of Germany) had such an influence upon the council of France, as to prevail with them to obstruct the sending of the count of Mansfeldt's army, contrary to promise, with whom the French should have joined forces, for the relief of the Palatinate and the German princes; which failure of performance in them proved the ruin of that army, the greatest part whereof perished, and was, by consequence, the loss of the whole protestant party in Germany."

"His majesty farther declared, that having, by his mediation, prevailed for a peace between the French king and his protestant subjects, and engaged his word that the protestants should observe the articles of agreement; nevertheless, the king of France, contrary to the said articles of agreement, blocked up their towns, garrisons, and forts, and had committed many spoils upon them, when they had done nothing in violation of the edict of peace. And that the king of France had committed an example of great injustice, in full peace to seize upon one hundred and twenty English ships, with all their merchandize and artillery: for which reasons, the king was resolved to send a powerful army and navy to require satisfaction."

The command of the fleet was then given to the duke of Buckingham, by whose instigation the rupture with France had been resolved upon: however, in his commission, no mention was made of France, but that the expedition was intended for the relief and restoration of the king of Bohemia and his family; and that the fleet was to be employed as well by way of offence as defence, as should be most conducive to the service of the said prince; which plainly shews its true destination was to be a secret.

This fleet, consisting of above an hundred ships, having on board seven thousand soldiers, sailed from Portsmouth the seventh of June, 1627, and on the twentieth of July appeared before Rochelle. At the duke's approach, the Rochellers shut their gates, for fear of a surprize, as having no notice an English fleet was to come so near them. Presently after arrived the duke de Soubise, with Sir William Becher, who told them, from the duke of Buckingham, that the king of England, out of compassion to their sufferings, had sent a fleet and army to their assistance; and if they refused his aid, he declared he was fully quit of his engagements of honour and conscience for their relief. The mayor replied, in the name of the inhabitants, that they most humbly thanked his majesty for his care of them, but being in strict union with all the rest of the protestants in that kingdom, they could not receive into the city the offered succours, without consulting their friends, and without the previous consent of the whole body of the Huguenots. The duke of Buckingham, finding by this answer it would be difficult to get his troops into Rochelle, directed his course to the island of Rhé, where Foiras commanded; who, at first, endeavoured to hinder the landing of the English troops; but, his forces being few, he was obliged to retreat to his citadel of St. Martin's, which was in a good state of defence. Had the duke understood the art of war, he would, without losing a moment, have marched to the fort, and by that means prevented Foiras from getting his provisions; but he spent so much time in landing his men, and in preparing to march, that Foiras had leisure to get a large quantity of provisions and ammunition into the place. At last the duke marched to St. Martin's, and besieged it in form, but with very little success; for Foiras, being a man of more experience than his antagonist, found means to keep him employed in the siege till November; he then sent the king word he should be master of it in eight days. Mean while, the French king, who had not expected this invasion, ordered his troops to march with all expedition towards the sea, and came in person to hasten the relief of the island of Rhé. When every thing was ready, count Schomberg passed into the isle at the head of six or seven thousand men, without any opposition from the English fleet, and immediately marched to St. Martin's; the siege whereof the duke of Buckingham raised with precipitation, being vigorously pushed by the French to the sea-side; and it was with great difficulty that he re-embarked the remainder of his troops. Thus ended the expedition to the Isle of Rhé, in which it is said near five thousand men perished, and amongst the rest major-general Burroughs, the best officer in England.

The shameful miscarriage of this expedition contributed still farther to inflame the ill humour of the people. Their liberties they believed were destroyed, illegal taxes imposed, their commerce, which had suffered extremely by the Spaniards, was in a manner ruined by the French war; all these misfortunes were imputed to the obstinacy of Charles, in following the counsels of Buckingham; a man, who neither by his birth, age, services, or merit, appeared to have any title to that unbounded authority which he now possessed.

It will readily be imagined, that neither the king or the duke were desirous of convoking a parliament, while the tide of popular discontent ran so rapidly against them; but, totally unable to procure the means of executing the other military operations they had in view without a considerable aid of money, necessity compelled them to have recourse to that disagreeable expedient; and it was at length resolved that Buckingham should be the first person to propose in council the assembling a new parliament; as it was hoped that by this popular act he might be excused and pardoned former offences, and regain some part of his lost credit with the nation. His advice was followed; and the duke having acted his part, the parliament was summoned, by the unanimous resolution of the council, to meet on the seventeenth of March following. Immediately after, warrants were sent to all parts, to release the gentlemen who had been imprisoned for the affair of the loan-money; and the king had the mortification to see almost all of them, to the amount of twenty-seven, chosen to serve as representatives in the ensuing parliament. Writs of summons were also sent to the archbishop of Canterbury, who had been confined to his country-house for refusing to license Sibthorpe's sermons, and to Williams, bishop of Lincoln, late lord-keeper, who was prisoner in the Tower for having opposed the court measures; and every thing was done that could be devised, to bring the great assembly of the nation together in good humour.

The two houses being met on the seventeenth of March, 1628, were addressed by Charles in a speech, in which he pathetically sets forth the necessities of the times, and requires the assistance of his parliament; but, with the same breath, he most impolitically uses the following expressions: "Every man must now do according to his conscience; wherefore if you (which God forbid) should not do your duties, in contributing what the state at this time needs, I must, in discharge of my conscience, use those other means God hath put into my hands, to save that which the follies of particular men may otherwise hazard to lose. Take not this as a threatening, for I scorn to threaten any but my equals, but as an admonition from him, who by nature and duty has most care of your preservation and prosperity."

When Charles had ended his speech, the lord-keeper began a long harangue upon the state of affairs in Europe, setting forth the dangerous power of the house of Austria, and the motives (which the reader has already seen in the declaration of war) of England's interposing between the French king and his protestant subjects. Having expatiated on those matters, he concludes his speech thus; "his majesty, as he has told you, hath chose this way of parliamentary supplies, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not because he is destitute of others, but because it is most agreeable to the goodness of his own gracious disposition, and to the desire and will of his people: if this be deferred, necessity, and the sword of the enemy, may make way to the other. Remember his majesty's admonition; I say, remember it."

These two speeches need no comment, since they plainly speak both the king's principles concerning the use of parliaments, and his intention in case he received not from the present parliament the satisfaction he expected; but, notwithstanding the provocation this great assembly received from this manner of treating it, the commons resolved to proceed with the utmost calmness and moderation, in redressing the grievances of the public, in restraining the exercise of arbitrary power, in fixing the limits of the royal prerogative, and in asserting the rights and privileges of the people.

But before they entered into debate, the two houses petitioned the king for a fast, which being over, the commons proceeded to business; when it soon appeared with what spirit they were met; for in settling the proper committees for the dispatch of business, great complaints were made concerning the influence of the deputy-lieutenants and some justices of the peace, particularly in Cornwall, in violating the freedom of elections by quartering soldiers, and other oppressions, upon electors who opposed the court: they then ordered all their members to lay before the house the names of the popish recusants within their several provinces of representation; and resolved to proceed upon the king's supply, but so as it should go hand in hand with the redress of grievances. The chief speakers upon this important debate were sir Francis Seymour, sir Thomas Wentworth (afterwards the famous earl of Strafford), sir Benjamin Rudyard, sir Edward Coke, Mr. Cromwell, sir Humphrey May, and Mr. secretary Cook; which two last were for postponing the redress of grievances, and immediately granting the supply. It would swell this work too much was I to insert all that was said on this great occasion; it will be sufficient to observe, that the speeches made by the gentlemen of the opposition are perhaps the finest extant in any language, and may be found in a collection intitled, "The Sovereign's Preservative and the Subjects Privilege," printed in 1657, to which Mr. Rushworth has been greatly obliged, and has copied from it great part of his Collection: it is from them that the English reader can collect the truest notion of the English constitution, and the noblest sentiments of liberty, both personal and political.

In the course of these debates, it was found that when sir John Hevingham, and some other gentlemen, imprisoned on the subject of the loan, brought their Habeas corpus, they were, notwithstanding, remanded back to prison, upon this principle, laid down by the attorney-general, that persons committed by the king and council, were never bailed till his majesty's pleasure was first known. This produced many long and warm debates upon the liberty of the subject; and on the third of April, the following resolution appears entered upon the Journals:

"First, Resolved upon question, that no freeman ought to be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by the command of the king or the privy-council, or any other, unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint, be expressed, for which, by law, he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained: without one negative.

"Secondly, Resolved upon question, that the writ of Habeas corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other, he praying the same: without one negative.

"Thirdly, Resolved upon question, that if a freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other, no cause of commitment, detainer, or restraint, being expressed, for which, by law, he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained, and the same being returned upon a Habeas corpus granted for the same party, that the man ought to be delivered or bailed: without one negative.

Fourthly, Resolved upon question, that the ancient and undoubted right of every freeman is, that he hath a full and absolute property in his goods and estate, and that no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other like charge, ought to be commanded or levied by the king, or any of his ministers, without common assent by act of parliament: agreed, nemine contradicente."

While these dispositions were making by the commons to defend their civil and personal liberties, they were equally zealous concerning religion, and both houses presented a petition to his majesty on the thirty-first of May, against recusants; who was pleased to return for answer, "That he recommended to them to think of a law against popery; and assures his parliament, that the lenity hitherto shewn to the English papists, was only with a view to procure suitable advantages to English protestants in popish countries, in which expectation he had been deceived; and promises, that unless he saw better fruits for the future, he would execute the laws against the papists to a greater degree of severity than was craved in that petition." This answer so pleased the commons, that they forthwith proceeded to the business of the supply; and in order to convince his majesty that they were sufficiently disposed to relieve his necessities, provided he would gratify them in their just demands, they voted him no less than five entire subsidies; whereof when secretary Cook informed the king, Charles asked him by how many voices it had been carried, "By one," replied the secretary; at which perceiving the king change countenance, "Sir, added he, your majesty hath herein the greater cause to rejoice, for the house was so unanimous as to make but one voice;" at which the king was exceedingly pleased; and charged the secretary to tell the house, in his name, "that he would deny them nothing of their liberties which any of his predecessors had granted."

The supply, however, thus voted, was not yet passed into a law; and the commons determined to employ the interval in providing some barrier to their rights and liberties: forced loans, benevolences, taxes without consent of parliament, arbitrary imprisonments, billeting soldiers, and martial law, which were the chief grievances the nation complained of, and against which a permanent remedy was to be provided by some act that was to receive the sanction of the whole legislature. On the fourth of April therefore, the commons resolved to desire a conference with the lords, concerning certain ancient and fundamental liberties of England; and four members, each of whom was to chuse two assistants, were appointed to manage the conference. The managers were sir Dudley Diggs, who chose for his assistants sir Benjamin Rudyard and Mr. Pym; Sir Edward Coke, who made choice of Mr. Rolles and Mr. Hackwill to assist him; Mr. Selden, whose assistants were Mr. Herbert and Mr. Whitby; and Mr. Littleton, who had with him Sir Robert Philips and Mr. Charles Jones. Thus the management of this conference, which may be said to be decisive of the laws and liberties of England, was committed to men of as much spirit and learning as ever the nation produced.

The king was no sooner informed of the intention of the commons than he employed every expedient in order to divert them from their purpose; and all the time the conference was depending, endeavoured to amuse them by repeated messages, begging them to leave off talking of grievances, and to proceed upon the supplies; promising, upon his royal word, that they should then receive all due satisfaction. It would tire the reader, should I repeat the particulars of all those messages which the commons received, with a seeming deference to the king's person, but with a manifest contempt of his menaces, and an invincible distrust of his promises. The peers, who, though during the whole of these violent struggles they assumed in the main a laudable impartiality, were yet, as is natural, somewhat prejudiced in favour of monarchy, began to apprehend that the commons would go too far in their projected reform, and therefore recommended to them to consider of his majesty's assurances, and depend upon them: this occasioned several debates, and many arguments were urged on both sides of the question; but sir Thomas Wentworth reconciled all parties, by saying, "That never house of commons, so far as concerned themselves, had greater confidence than the present in the goodness of their sovereign: but we are all ambitious, said he, that his majesty's goodness should descend to posterity, and we are accountable for a public trust. There hath been a public violation of the laws, by the king's ministers; and nothing can satisfy the nation, but a public reparation. Our desire to secure the subjects right by bill, will carry us no farther than what is contained in former laws, with some modest provision for instruction, performance, and execution." These sentiments were so agreeable to the whole house, that the secretary was desired to consider them as an answer to his message. And now the commons went upon two petitions for the king, one against billeting of soldiers, and the other, the famous Petition of Rights, which was the result of all the conferences they had held with the lords upon the point of personal liberty. As the subsidy-bill was not yet passed, Charles was greatly perplexed how to behave; but he was at last obliged to receive the petition concerning billeting of soldiers, which was drawn up in very strong and affecting terms, complaining of the miseries which the kingdom suffered by the subjects being obliged to lodge and maintain such numbers of dissolute fellows. Charles could not help expressing his discontent in pretty strong terms, upon their presenting this petition; and, instead of answering it, he exhorted them to proceed, without loss of time, upon the supplies. Their obstinacy increased in proportion to his impatience: they determined not to gratify the king till he had done them justice; and the Petition of Right being by this time finished, they sent it up to the lords for their perusal and concurrence. The upper-house, for reasons I have already given, desirous to abate the over-zeal of the commons, proposed the plan of a remonstrance more moderate, which they recommended to their consideration; but the lower-house was by no means satisfied with this plan, which they asserted would leave their liberties in a still more precarious situation than at present, and therefore absolutely rejected it; but not without giving the lords ample and satisfactory reasons for so doing: and all obstacles being finally removed, the Petition of Right passed the commons, and was sent up to the lords for their approbation, who immediately passed the same, without any material alteration. This petition, which may be called the second Great Charter of England, is of so great importance, and forms so essential a part of the English constitution, that we should deem ourselves inexcusable should we deny our readers the satisfaction of perusing it at full length, which they may do in the subjoined note*.

The

* This petition, as agreed to by both houses, stood as follows.

"I. Humbly shew unto our sovereign lord the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament assembled, that whereas it is declared and enacted, by a statute made in the reign of king Edward I. commonly called "Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo," that no tallage or aid shall be laid or levied by the king, or his heirs in this realm, without the good-will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm: and, by authority of parliament held in the twenty-fifth year of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that, from henceforth, no person should be compelled to make any loans to the king against his will, because such loans were against reason, and the franchise of the land: and, by other laws of this realm, it is provided, that none shall be charged with any charge or imposition called a benevolence, or by such like charge: by which the statutes before-mentioned, and other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not set by common consent in parliament.

II. Yet, nevertheless, of late, divers commissions directed to sundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have

The petition was delivered on the twenty-eighth of May, and on the second of June the king gave the following answer: "The king willeth, that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm; and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppressions, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the performance whereof he holds himself in conscience as well obliged, as of his prerogative." This answer proved very unsatisfactory to the parliament, for, on the seventh of June, after great debates in both houses, the lords desired a conference with the commons, and it was agreed that they should join together in a petition to his majesty, "for a clear and satisfactory answer to the Petition of Right, in full parliament." While these debates subsisted, another message came to the commons, acquainting them, that his majesty designed in a few days to put an end to the session, and pressing them not to enter on any new matter. This was occasioned by the commons vigorously prosecuting Dr. Manwaring, a favourite of the king's, whom they obliged to make an abject submission, and recant the detestable doctrines of absolute power and non-resistance, which he had preached up*: but more particularly by a motion made in the house by sir Edward Coke, for impeaching the duke of Buckingham as the author of many of those grievances under which the nation laboured. The commons, enraged at this message from the king, which they looked upon as prescribing to them their method of proceeding, immediately fell in with sir Edward's motion, and the matter was carried on so warmly, that a remonstrance was almost finished against the duke, when Charles, apprized of the storm that threatened his favourite, resolved, if possible, to divert it by gratifying their wishes with regard to the Petition of Right. Accordingly, on the seventh of June, he came to the house of peers, and have issued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places assembled and required to lend certain sums of money unto your majesty; and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an oath administered unto them, not warrantable by the laws or statutes of this realm, and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance and give attendance before your privy-council, and in other places; and others of them have been, therefore imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in several counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majesty, or your privy-council, against the laws and free customs of this realm.

III. And whereas also, by the statute called "The Great Charter of the Liberties of England," it is declared and enacted, that no freeman may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseized of his freehold or liberties, or his free customs, or be out-lawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

IV. And in the eight-and-twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, that no man, of what estate or condition soever that he be, should be put out of his land or tenement, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.

V. Nevertheless, against the tenour of the said statutes, and others the good laws and statutes of your realm, to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned without any cause shewed: and when for their deliverance, they were brought before a justice, by your majesty's writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the causes of their detainer, no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your privy-council, and yet, were returned back to their several prisons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to law.

VI. And whereas of late, great companies of soldiers and mariners have been dispersed into divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, against their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn, against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

VII. And whereas also, by authority of parliament, in the five-and-twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that no man should be fore-judged of life or limb, against the form of the Great Charter and the law of the land; and by the said Great Charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be judged to death, but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of this realm or by acts of parliament; and whereas no offender, of what kind soever, is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm: nevertheless, of late, divers commissions, under your majesty's great-seal, have issued forth, by which certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authority to proceed within the land, according to the justice of martial law, against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or outrage or misdemeanor whatsoever, and by such summary course and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is used in armies in the time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and put to death, according to law martial.

VIII. By pretext whereof, some of your majesty's subjects have been, by some of the said commissioners, put to death: when and where, if, by the laws and statutes of the land, they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed.

IX. And also sundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming exemption, have escaped the punishment due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused or forbore to proceed against such offenders, according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the said officers were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissions as aforesaid: which commissions, and all other of like nature, are wholly and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of this your realm.

X. They, therefore, humbly pray your most excellent majesty, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament: and that none be called to make an answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same, or for refusal thereof: and that no freeman, in any such manner as is before mentioned, be imprisoned or detained: and that your majesty would be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners, and that your people may not be so burthened in time to come: and that the aforesaid commissions, for proceeding by martial law, be revoked and annulled: and that, hereafter, no commissions, of like nature, may issue forth to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid; lest, by colour of them, any of your majesty's subjects be destroyed, or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land.

XI. All which they must humbly pray of your most excellent majesty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm: and that your majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, that the awards, doings, and proceedings, to the prejudice of your people in any of the premises, shall not be drawn hereafter into consequence or example: and that your majesty would be also graciously pleased, for the further comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, that, in the things aforesaid, all your officers and ministers shall serve you according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majesty, and the prosperity of this kingdom. Stat. 4 Car. I. cap. xiv.

* Manwaring had preached a sermon, which appeared, upon enquiry, to have been printed by the special command of his majesty; and, when examined, it was found to contain doctrines destructive of all civil liberty. It was there affirmed, "that though property was commonly lodged in the hands of the subject; yet, upon any urgent necessity, all property was transferred to the king; that the sovereign might impose taxes without consent of parliament; and that the divine law enjoined compliance with every demand, however unjust, which the prince should think proper to make upon the people."

pronouncing the usual form of words, "Soit droit fait comme il est désiré—Let it be law, as desired," gave full sanction and authority to the petition.

This concession was received with loud acclamations and public rejoicings; and the commons could no longer delay the bill of subsidies, which was immediately passed; but their ill humour did not abate: though they had granted the king this aid, yet they still retained a pledge in their hands, which, they imagined, would ensure the success of all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had not yet been granted by parliament; and the commons had artfully concealed their intention of attacking that branch of revenue, till the royal assent had been given to the Petition of Right, which they justly considered as of the utmost importance. They then boldly affirmed, that the levying tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament, was an evident violation of all the ancient privileges of the people; and they proposed to present a remonstrance to that purpose. They next resumed their censure of Buckingham's conduct, against whom they had conceived the most implacable hatred, and drew up a remonstrance of several late miscarriages in the government, in the conclusion whereof they asserted, "the exclusive power of the said duke, and the abuse of that power, to be the principal cause of all the evils and dangers therein maintained; and therefore they humbly submitted it to his majesty's wisdom, whether it can be safe for himself, or for his kingdom, that so great power, both by sea and land, as rests in him should be trusted in the hands of any one subject whatsoever."

On the seventeenth of June this address was presented to the king, with the bill of subsidies, at the Banqueting-house, at Whitehall, who received it with the most sensible chagrin, and afterwards gave the lower-house to understand, that he would shortly put an end to the session. The commons hereupon set about putting the finishing hand to the remonstrance against tonnage and poundage. Great was the indignation of Charles, when he heard of this remonstrance; and well knowing, by experience, what effects it would have, if completed by the commons and rejected by him, he resolved to cut the session short before it could be perfected: he therefore, on the twenty-second of June, while the remonstrance was reading in the lower house, suddenly came to the house of peers, and sending for the commons, prorogued the session to the twentieth of October. On this occasion he addressed himself to both houses in the following speech.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It may seem strange that I come so suddenly to end this session, therefore, before I give my assent to the bills, I will tell you the cause (though I must avow I owe an account of my actions to none but God alone.) It is known to every one, that awhile ago the house of commons gave me a remonstrance; how acceptable every man may judge, and for the merit of it I will not call that in question, for I am sure no wise man can justify it. Now, since I am certainly informed that a second remonstrance is preparing for me, to take away my profit of tonnage and poundage (one of the chief mainnances of the crown), by alleging that I have given away my right thereof by my answer to your petition.

"This is so prejudicial to me, as I am forced to end this session some few hours before I meant it, being willing not to receive any more remonstrances to which I must give an harsh answer.

"And since I see that even the house of commons begins already to make false constructions of what I granted in your petition; lest it be worse interpreted in the country, I now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof.

"The professions of both houses in the time of hammering this petition, was no ways to trench upon my prerogative, saying, they had neither intention nor power to hurt it.

"Therefore it must needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my subjects; yet, to shew the clearness of my intentions, that I neither repent nor mean to recede from any thing I have promised you, I do here declare, that those things which have been done, whereby men had cause to suspect the liberty of the subject to be trenched upon (which indeed was the true and first ground of their petition), shall not hereafter be drawn into example for prejudice, and in time to come (on the word of a king) you shall not have the like cause to complain.

"But as for tonnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to ask, never meant (I am sure) by me to grant. To conclude: I command you all that are here, to take notice of what I have spoken at this time, to be the true meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but especially you, my lords the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of the laws; for none of the houses of parliament, either joint or separate (what new doctrine soever may be raised), have any power either to make or declare a law without my consent."

The reader of himself will be apt enough to make reflections upon the infatuation which possessed both the king and commons in the latter part of this session. If, on one hand, Charles has been taxed with a design to render himself absolute, it must likewise be owned that the leaders in the parliament seemed bent upon infringing and reducing his undoubted prerogative. His confirmation of their rights and privileges was so well received in all parts of the kingdom, that the violent party began to fear the king would become popular; they therefore resolved, in drawing up the remonstrance, to insert in it every shadow or suspicion of a grievance, which might help to inspire the subject with an hatred and contempt of the sovereign. In short, I can by no means think the commons are to be justified in pressing their remonstrances before they saw some fresh invasion of their national liberty, or some fresh abuses of regal power, on which they could ground their proceedings. Possibly Charles, upon such forbearance of the commons, might have followed his too great propensity to arbitrary rule, and have given them cause of complaint; but I am inclined to believe, that had they borne these remonstrances, they would then have left all the blame with Charles, nor would the public have been so much divided in their sentiments, as they afterwards were, to the deluging their country country with the blood of her own sons and the utter overthrow of the constitution.

Rochelle had been for some time besieged by the French; and it appeared, by cardinal Richelieu's taking the conduct of it upon himself, that he intended to exterminate the Huguenots, whose whole dependance lay now upon Charles. In May, this year, the presence of Buckingham being necessary in parliament, at the pressing instances of the duke of Soubise, and deputies sent from Rochelle, the earl of Denbigh was dispatched, with a fleet, to the relief of this place; but neglecting to attack the French fleet, had returned with dishonour. In order to wipe out this stain, the duke of Buckingham resolved to take the command upon himself, and repaired to Portsmouth, where the fleet and forces were rendezvoused: but before he could set out on his expedition, he met with that fate from the hand of an assassin, which, had he survived much longer, he would probably have suffered from the general resentment of the nation. This assassin was John Felton, a gentleman by birth, who had been a lieutenant of infantry, and disappointed in his expectation of a captain's commission, which Buckingham had bestowed upon another. This man was a fanatic in religion, and in this case his revenge seems to have co-operated with his enthusiasm. The duke was walking with sir Thomas Fryer, through an entry, from one apartment to another, when Felton, coming behind him, stabbed him with a knife, which he left sticking in the wound; Buckingham exclaimed, "The villain hath killed me!" and, pulling out the knife, dropped down and died on the floor. The assassin might have escaped, but seemed to glory in his crime, and surrendered himself immediately to justice.

Charles was at a gentleman's seat, within four miles of Portsmouth (whither he had come, by his presence to hasten the preparations) when his favourite was killed, and he received the news of it while he was at church; but he was so intent in his devotions, that no discomposure appeared in his action, nor alteration in his countenance, till the service was over, when he threw himself on his bed, and poured forth a flood of tears, and the most passionate expressions, for the memory of his beloved Buckingham, whom he always cherished, and shewed his regard for, by a noble train of munificent acts towards his widow and family. When the first transports of grief were a little subsided, he sent Dr. Hutchenon, one of his chaplains in ordinary, to try if he could learn from the assassin by what inducement he had committed the horrid fact. Felton strenuously denied his having been dealt with by any one for that purpose, declaring his only motive to have been, that the duke had been declared an enemy to the common-wealth in the late remonstrances tendered to the king by the parliament; and this he persisted in, both at the time of his examination before the lords of the council and at his execution: that which excited this wretch to so horrid a murder, seems likewise to have influenced the people in general, who rejoiced at the death of the duke as of the greatest enemy of their country.

Thus in the flower of life, being but thirty-six years of age, fell George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, whose rise was sudden, his promotions rapid, and his end untimely. Notwithstanding the load of public censure heaped upon this great favourite and minister, there appears good reasons to induce us to believe that he meant well to both his master and his country; and that his chief misfortunes proceeded from jealousy in others, who thought the great and extensive power he enjoyed dangerous to the rights of a free people. It is possible, if he had lived a few years longer, he might have seen through the temptations of greatness, and have proved as great a pillar of this state as any that ever went before him. He was of a most noble and generous disposition: he seldom studied to conceal his resentments, either of love or hatred; in the former he was immoderate, in the latter he was not sanguinary; but once offended, he never could forget: his courage was great, but it sometimes transported him too far, for if he had a little yielded to the times, and withdrawn from those storms he could neither prevent nor allay, he might perhaps have found a milder fate.

The fatal event of the duke's death, which happened on the twenty-third of August, proved little or no obstacle to the proceedings of the fleet; the next day the command of the expedition was given to the earl of Lindsey; and they set sail from Portsmouth on the eighth of September; but by this time cardinal Richelieu had finished his famous Digue, or mote, which entirely blockaded Rochelle; and the English fleet being unable to force the barricadoe, or gain entrance into the harbour, were obliged to return without effecting any thing for the relief of the besieged, who, unable to hold out any longer, threw their gates open to the cardinal's army.

The ill humour this disgraceful expedition threw the nation into, made Charles think it improper to let the parliament meet according to their adjournment, in the month of October this year, and therefore he farther prorogued that assembly to the twentieth of January following; and in the mean time archbishop Abbot was admitted to kiss the king's hand, and commanded not to fail of his attendance at the council-table; which was done at this conjuncture to moderate the heats of certain ecclesiastics who made great disturbance in the church by their scholastical controversies concerning free-will, predestination, and the like. Both parties were countenanced by several bishops, and each of them would insist on their opinion being the true doctrine of the church, when in truth they were but the opinions of private men; for nothing can be called the doctrine of the church, that is not declared by the whole clergy lawfully assembled in convocation. These sectarists were distinguished by the names of Calvinists and Arminians: the Calvinists (which were the same with the Puritans) were countenanced by the commons in parliament and some few of the bishops; while the Arminians had the greater part of the episcopal order, and even the king himself, on their side, as they were zealous assertors of the prerogative royal and the court-doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. Charles, however, would gladly have put an end to these feuds, and reconciled both parties: with this view he caused the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England to be published, with a proclamation restraining all disputes on the points controverted: he also issued an order for calling in a book written by one Montagu, in the late king's time, called an Appeal to Cæsar, for which he had been made a bishop. At the same time Dr. Potter, a known Calvinist, was promoted to the see of Carlisle.

Not all those acts of concession on the part of the court could, however, mollify the acrimony of the opposition; for the parliament assembling on the twentieth of January, 1629, the grand committees, which are usually the first things settled at the opening of that assembly, were very busy and active in traversing whatever views they thought the council might have adopted: that of religion made great complaints of invasions upon the church, which they pretended was much endangered by the growth of popery and Arminianism. They solicited the king to proclaim a fast, and presented an address, containing a sort of apology for their preferring the affairs of religion to any other article of business in their deliberations. Buckingham, the great object of their hatred, being now removed, their resentment glowed with a double rancour against Laud, bishop of London, who, as the king's spiritual director, encouraged all his high notions of hierarchy and prerogative. He was branded as a superstitious ecclesiastic, chief of the Arminian sect, by whose interest Montagu, Cozens, Sibthorp, and Manwaring, had been pardoned, and even promoted to bishoprics, or rich benefices; and they exclaimed against him as an implacable foe, not only to the puritans, but also to the liberty of his country.

While the committee was thus employed in examining religious grievances, the rest of the house were no less active in their inquiries into the miscarriages in civil affairs. Though the remonstrance against tonnage and poundage had not been presented to the king, it was, however, public, and sufficient to shew the people what was the sense of the house of commons. Upon this foundation, three merchants, among others, refused to pay this duty to the king; one of them, by name Rolles, a merchant of London and a member of the house of commons, had refused it, as contrary to law; whereupon his warehouse had been sealed up by the officers of the customs; and Chambers and Vassal, the other two merchants, were condemned by the barons of the Exchequer, who ordered their goods to be detained. The affair of Rolles was, by the commons, adjudged a breach of the privilege of their house, for which the custom-house officers were summoned before the house, to answer their misdemeanor therein. The king, willing to support his authority, interposed in this matter, and sent a message to the house, informing them, that what had been done by the officers, was only in obedience to the orders they had received: "that as to himself, he did not mean to levy these duties as belonging to him by hereditary right, but out of a full persuasion that the house of commons, suitable to their large professions, would grant them by bill, which he desired they would dispatch, to put an end to the dispute."

The commons, however, were far from being satisfied with this acknowledgement of the king; they still insisted, as an indispensable condition, that he should entirely forbear the levying of those duties; after which they would take into consideration upon what terms they would restore to him a revenue, which he had once fairly resigned. On this occasion debates in the house ran very high, and they resolved to proceed to a remonstrance against the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, "not being granted by act of parliament." Charles finding the commons thus refractory, immediately adjourned them to the twenty fifth of February, and afterwards to the second of March. When they met again, the same affair was brought upon the carpet; and so eager were they to vent their passion, that they locked the door of the house, and gave the key to sir Miles Hobart, one of their members, to keep, and refused to admit the usher of the black rod, whom the king had sent with a message to them; whereat he was so much offended, that he sent for the captain of the band of pensioners, and the guards, to force an entrance. In the mean time the heads of a remonstrance were offered to sir John Finch, the speaker, to be put to the question, which he refused, declaring that the king had given him an order to adjourn the house to the tenth of March, and to put no question, nor admit of any debate; upon which he rose and left the chair. The whole house was now in an uproar; the speaker was forced back into the chair, and held in it by Mr. Denzil Holles, and sir Peter Hayman, till the following protestation was drawn up and read.

"Protestation of the House of Commons.

"I. Whosoever shall bring in an innovation of religion, or by favour seek to introduce popery, or Arminianism, or other opinions disagreeing from the true and orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth.

"II. Whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking or levying, of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall likewise be reputed a common enemy to the commonwealth.

"III. If any man shall voluntarily yield to pay the said subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, shall be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England, and an enemy to this commonwealth."

This being passed in a tumultuous manner, they rose before the pensioners and guards came, and the house was adjourned to the tenth of March. In the intermediate time a proclamation was drawn, but not published, for the dissolution of the parliament, and on the third of March, Denzil Holles, esq. sir Miles Hobart, sir John Elliot, sir Peter Hayman, John Seldon, esq. William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroude, and Benjamin Valentine, were ordered next day to appear before the council. These gentlemen had distinguished their zeal through the whole session, but more particularly on the last day: and Mr. Holles, sir John Elliot, Mr. Coriton, and Mr. Valentine, attended the council, but refusing to answer out of parliament, which was still sitting, they were committed close prisoners to the Tower. Warrants were then issued for apprehending the rest, and for sealing up their studies.

On the tenth of March the king came in his robes to the house of lords, who attended in theirs; and made a speech, in which he twice called the gentlemen in the opposition "vipers," and commended his own party, and the house of in particular for their dutiful demeanor; and then dissolved the parliament.

These

These are all the proceedings of this famous parliament, that are worthy either of praise or imitation. Their heats concerning religion, their protestations relating to it, and their bitterness against all who were suspected of what they termed Arminianism, were as unjustifiable and undutiful, as the noble stand they made for the personal liberties and properties of the subject, was memorable and glorious. However, Charles, that he might not seem to exert a despotic power of punishing those who headed the opposition against his measures, and to persuade the people that he intended to conform himself to the law as much as possible, appointed the judges to assemble, on the twenty-first of April, at Serjeant's Inn, where he caused certain questions to be proposed to them; and, according to their answers, ordered the attorney general to raise a process against the imprisoned members, for their violent, unlawful, and seditious behaviour in the house of commons. Alderman Chambers was prosecuted in the Star-chamber, for having said "that the merchants were more oppressed in England than in Turkey," and was condemned to an exorbitant fine, the payment of which reduced him to extreme poverty. Long was sentenced to pay two thousand pounds for having violated his oath in sitting as a member of the lower-house, after he had been sworn sheriff of Wiltshire. The imprisoned members demanded the privilege of the Habeas corpus; they were detained in confinement from March to October; and then the court of King's Bench decreed, that they should remain in prison during the king's pleasure: Elliot was moreover cast in a fine of two thousand pounds; Valentine in one of five hundred; and Holles obliged to pay one thousand marks.

Charles, deprived of all hopes of supply from parliament, was now obliged to conclude a peace with the two crowns against whom he had hitherto carried on a war, begun without necessity, and conducted without glory. The crown of France, though victorious over its protestant subjects, was weakened by civil dissensions among the princes of the blood: it was threatened by the greatness of the house of Austria, and upon the point of being engaged in a war with Italy; in short, Lewis wanted a peace as much or more than Charles did; and it was privately agreed, that the Venetians should interpose their good offices for a peace between the two crowns. Georgi and Castarini, the two ministers employed by the republic for that purpose, had therefore very little more to settle than mere matters of form in their negotiation. At last, on the fourteenth of April, the articles were agreed on; but contain nothing in them remarkable enough to claim a place here. In Charles's present circumstances, he could not pretend to insist on any terms for the Huguenots; and they were accordingly left to the mercy of their sovereign.

Peace was soon after made with Spain. It is said that Reubens, the famous Flemish painter, who was then in England, painting a kind of apotheosis of James, for the roof of the noble banqueting-house of Whitehall, was ordered by the archduchess to sound the inclinations of Charles.

This is by no means unlikely. The war, which about two years before had broke out in Italy on account of the successions to the duchies of Mantua and Montferrat, had been unfavourable to the Spaniards; and that court, suspecting they should be deserted by the emperor, and being assured of the dispositions of Charles for peace, gave a public character to don Carlos de Colomos, for putting an end to the negotiations which Reubens had begun. It required very little dexterity to conclude this peace; the articles of which only confirmed the former treaties we have already seen, and was sworn to on the seventeenth of December, sir Francis Cottington being sent to Spain to take that sharp oath and ratification of the same.

In this peace nothing was stipulated in favour of the prince Palatine, except that Philip III. promised in general to employ his good offices for the restoration of the elector. Charles, however, did not desist from his endeavours to procure some relief to that unhappy family; he had a great affection for his sister, and had supported her husband and her in a court at the Hague, at a vast expence; and had expended large sums, as subsidies, in her service. Having settled his plan of governing without a parliament, he now imagined it would be in his power to give them effectual assistance. With this view, in the Spring of the year 1630*, in conjunction with France, he brought about a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland, in hopes of inducing the former to undertake the cause of the protestants in Germany.

This was the famous Gustavus Adolphus, whose heroic genius, assisted by the wisest policy, rendered him, in a little time, the most celebrated monarch of the age. To encourage and support him in his intended invasion of Germany, Charles engaged to furnish him with six thousand men; but, that he might save appearances with the house of Austria, he employed the name of the marquis of Hamilton, a nobleman allied to the crown. Hamilton entered into an agreement with Gustavus; and, having levied these troops in England and Scotland, at Charles's expence, he landed them in the Elbe.

Soon after was fought the important battle of Leipzig; where the Imperial army, under count Tilly, was totally defeated by the victorious Swede. Gustavus proceeded in his conquests with such an amazing and rapid progress, as is scarce to be paralleled either in ancient or modern history; and, in a short time, made himself master of the greatest part of Germany.

Charles was all this while studying the means of raising money, and establishing his own power by making examples of those who durst oppose it. Among other methods practised by Charles to raise money, was that of appointing commissioners to compound with those who, though summoned at his coronation to come and receive the honour of knighthood, had neglected to appear. In the reign of Edward II. an old custom was enacted into a law, importing, that every man possessed of twenty pounds a year in land, should be knighted: almost all the succeeding monarchs had put this law in execution. Charles, considering the difference of value in money between that reign and the present time, summoned those only whose yearly rent amounted to forty pounds; yet, even this mitigation was deemed a hardship, because the value of twenty pounds in the days of Edward, was equal to four times that sum in the reign of Charles: a great number had therefore refused to obey the mandate, and these were now fined for their disobedience. A considerable sum was likewise exacted, by way of composition, from those who declined the order.

If these proceedings caused great discontents and murmurings among the people, they were not a little encreased by Charles's giving orders for tonnage and poundage to be levied with great rigour. The custom-house officers were empowered to enter houses, and break open warehouses, chests, and closets, to search for goods which had not paid the duty: and, on this pretence of searching, they committed numberless acts of fraud and oppression. In order to prevent the popular clamours from producing insurrections, the council issued orders for arming and reviewing the militia, that the people might be intimidated by their appearance; while, on the other hand, they were amused with public orders for putting the laws in execution against papists. At the same time, the king endeavoured to fill his coffers by granting exclusive privileges for the sale of commodities and provisions; so that the whole kingdom was filled with monopolies, to the unspeakable prejudice of trade and manufactures. Presbyterianism having made great progress in England, the king, by the advice of bishop Laud, sent instructions to the prelates of the kingdom, enjoining them, among other things, to take especial care that no puritan minister should be admitted into the church; and to discover all such as should neglect the rites prescribed by the canons. The presbyterians conceived the most implacable hatred against Laud, for this, and other instances of his enmity; and he severely felt their resentment in the sequel.

In the spring of the year 1631, Mervin Touchet, lord Audley in England, and earl of Castlehaven in Ireland, was tried before his peers, for rapes and practices upon the body of his wife, which he partly forced and partly invited others to commit; which out-did the most shocking ideas of lust and infamous contrivance; and was found guilty. He was a nobleman descended from the illustrious lord Audley, the friend and companion in all his wars to Edward III. He had been ingenious enough to debauch the mind, as well as prostitute the body, of his lady; for, after his execution, she was pardoned for adultery, in terms not very advantageous to her virtue. On this occasion, Charles shewed a seasonable piece of justice, as he would grant no other favour to the criminal, than to change his punishment from hanging into beheading. But neither this exhibition of impartiality, nor the great zeal which Charles discovered in repairing and rebuilding the cathedral church of St. Paul (which had been lately burnt down), atoned, with men of sense and property, for his other impolitical and unpopular measures. Laud was so much in favour with him, that he acted as if his head had been turned, by introducing into religious worship many popish fopperies: for the particulars of which the reader may consult the common collections and histories of the times.

In giving an account of the third parliament held in this reign, we have often mentioned sir Thomas Wentworth, knight of the shire for the county of York: this gentleman several times, in the house of commons, gave proof of his zeal for the maintenance of the liberties of the people, and the privilege of parliament. By this means he became formidable to the court; though he took care not to run into any excess with regard to the king and his minister; on the contrary, he always softened his opinion with some honourable and respectful expressions, though he seldom failed to oppose the pretensions of the court. As he was one of the greatest geniuses then in England, the king soon perceived that his parts and capacity might be very serviceable to him, if he could gain him to his interest; he endeavoured it, therefore, after, or perhaps before, the dissolution of the parliament, and succeeded so well, that Wentworth became one of the most zealous promoters of the royal authority. About the same time also were gained sir John Saville, who was made a lord, and comptroller of the household; sir Dudley Diggs, who was promoted to the mastership of the Rolls, and was also made attorney-general; and sir Edward Littleton, who was made solicitor. Sir John Elliot, some time before his death, was tampered with, but he was proof against the temptation.

As sir Thomas Wentworth, since his conversion, had shewed himself a zealous defender of the prerogatives of the crown, the king thought him the fittest person to be trusted with the presidentship of the council in the North; a court of judicature established at York in the reign of Henry VIII. for the relief of poor suitors in the counties of York, Cumberland, Northumberland, Westmoreland, and the bishopric of Durham, who could not afford to bring their causes into the courts of Westminster. This council had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but, besides some innovations introduced by James, Charles ventured, at this time, to enlarge its powers, and to invest it with a kind of civil jurisdiction, which, in some respects, was even unparliamentary. In consequence of this illegal measure, all the northern counties were deprived of the protection of the common-law, and subjected to an authority which was wholly arbitrary.

It was now the year 1632, in which the great Gustavus, continuing his victorious projects through Germany, at last brought the elector Palatine to Munich. This unfortunate prince now saw himself on the point of being restored to his palatinate, and even to the crown of Bohemia, by the hand of the conqueror; when, in the second battle near Leipzig, fought in the plains of Lutzen, on November the sixth, this year, Gustavus was slain in the midst of a victory he had already gained.

His death proved fatal to the palatine Frederic, who now despairing of any farther resource, fell into a fever, occasioned by his immoderate grief, which, in a few months, put a period to a life of continual crosses and disappointments. This year Wentworth was created viscount Wentworth, and sent over lord-lieutenant of Ireland; where affairs were still in great disorder, through the insolence of the Roman catholics, who greatly abused the royal clemency in relaxing certain penal statutes against them.

The king having now governed the nation three or four years without a parliament, began to find himself more at ease than he had ever been since his accession to the throne; and therefore chose this season of tranquility to visit his ancient kingdom of Scotland: he accordingly set out for that kingdom in the month of May, 1633, where he was received with great magnificence; and the Scottish parliament, assembled at Edinburgh, granted a larger subsidy than ever had been given to any other king of that realm. Charles inherited his father's design, of bringing religion in Scotland to a conformity with the English church; and bishop Laud accompanied him in his journey, to facilitate the execution of his scheme. As a preparatory step, he passed two acts in the Scottish parliament, the first intituled, "An act concerning the king's prerogative, and the habit of the clergy:" this was no other than the confirmation of a statute enacted in the preceding reign, empowering the king to give such directions as he should think proper, with regard to the dress of the clergy. The other ratified and improved all the statutes which had been made concerning the liberties and franchises of the true church of God, and of the religion at present professed in the kingdom. Both these acts met with opposition from the presbyterians; they looked upon the first as a prelude to the use of the surplice, which was an abomination to their eyes; and the words "at present professed," they considered as an equivocal expression, calculated to restore episcopal government. Their church was governed by provincial synods and general assemblies; but the bishops still subsisted, though without the least jurisdiction or influence. The bills were passed, but they produced heats and discontent in the nation.

The Scottish religionists were not mistaken in their conjectures; the king's purpose was really to introduce the rites of the English church, and re-establish episcopacy in its former power and splendor. Bishop Laud preached, in the royal chapel at Edinburgh, on the benefit of conformity, and the reverend ceremonies of the church. He proposed to the Scottish bishops, that the English liturgy should be received into their service. They objected to this proposal, that such a step would alarm the jealousy of the nation, which would be apt to look upon the English liturgy as the forerunner of English laws, and an encroachment upon the independency of the kingdom: they therefore desired that another might be composed for the use of the Scottish church, that should be the same in substance, but different in some immaterial particulars. The king embraced this advice, though contrary to the inclination of Laud: he was himself jealous of the independency of his native kingdom, and appointed a select number of the Scottish bishops to form a new liturgy for their own service. He erected Edinburgh into a bishopric, created the archbishop of St. Andrew's chancellor of the kingdom, and he admitted several other prelates to seats in the privy council, and in the college of justice; a very unseasonable mark of his regard for the hierarchy; for the bishops, by this promotion, incurred the hatred and envy of the noblemen, who, though they respected them in their ecclesiastical capacities, could not bear to see them in civil stations, to which they thought themselves better entitled.

Charles returning to England in the autumn of this year, bestowed the dignity of archbishop of archbishop of Canterbury (vacant by the death of Abbot in his absence) on his favourite Laud; who, by this accession of authority, was now enabled to support ecclesiastical discipline with great rigor: and to inflame the general discontent of the nation, the Book of Sports to be used on Sundays after evening prayers, was again ordered to be read in churches; and many ministers, for refusing to read it, were either suspended, deprived, or prosecuted, before the high-commission. The articles of visitation published by Neale, bishop of Winchester, one of Laud's party, were no other than so many traps, contrived for bringing all whom Laud hated into the ecclesiastical den, where they seldom met with mercy. Writers in prose and verse, in polemics and politics, were treated with the like severity; of which the reader will find particular instances in the collections of those days.

There is little more to add to the transactions of this languid year, unless it were to swell the work with proclamations, which now supplied the place of acts of parliament. As to the concerns of Charles's family, he had this year sent the earl of Ormond with a generous invitation for the queen of Bohemia and her family to come into England; but the loss that princess had sustained by the death of her husband, was too recent for her sorrows to suffer her to accept of the invitation for that time. It must not be forgotten, that on the thirteenth of October, this year, the second son of Charles, afterwards the unhappy James II. was born.

We shall begin the year 1634 with an account of a cause which came to a solemn hearing in the month of February, which made a great noise, and which shewed the extreme severity of the court against such as were thought to fail ever so little in the submission expected from them; the case was this: Mr. William Prynne, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, had composed a large quarto, of a thousand pages, which he entitled Histrio Mastix. Its professed design was to decry tragedies, comedies, interludes, music, and dancing; but the author had likewise directed his satire against hunting, public festivals, Christmas-keeping, bonfires, and May poles.

He had obtained a licence from archbishop Abbot's chaplain, for printing this book; yet he was indicted in the Star-chamber as a libeller. It was thought somewhat hard, that general invectives against plays, should be construed into satires against the king and queen, merely because they frequented these amusements, and because the queen sometimes acted a part in pastorals and interludes, which were represented at court.

The author, indeed, had taken occasion, in the most violent manner, to condemn the hierarchy, the ceremonies, the innovations in religious worship, and the superstitions introduced by Laud. In the course of his work, he gave such evident specimens of his fanaticism, or rather, indeed, of his frenzy, that his most proper punishment would have been to have sent him to Bedlam; but he was condemned to be put from the bar; to stand on the pillory in two places, Westminster and Cheapside; to lose both his ears, one in each place; to pay a fine of five thousand pounds to the king; and to be imprisoned during life.

The Dutch were at this time improving, equally with the English, in matters of commerce; and they were plainly rivals to one another in trade: flushed with success, the Hollanders, about this time, flatly asserted a right to fish on the British coasts, founded upon immemorial possession. Charles, shocked at the independent airs of that haughty republic, which had been nursed by the blood, and fed by the bounty, of England; and glad of a just and popular pretext for humbling her, resolved to fit out a fleet which should drive her subjects out of the Narrow seas. But the vigorous preparations necessary for this undertaking required to be supplied by a proportionable income, which Charles was by no means master of; he therefore referred it to Mr. Noy, attorney-general, to find out the ways and means; and Noy fell upon an expedient for raising an extraordinary supply, without the assistance of a parliament; which was, by the imposition of a tax upon the people, for furnishing a certain number of ships, for the defence of the seas. Noy died before the effects of his projects were known, after having engaged his master in an affair, which made him lose his people's confidence, and was one of the principal causes of his ruin.

The death of the attorney-general did not, however, hinder the king from putting his scheme in practice: to that end, writs were issued in October, this year, to all the port-towns and maritime counties of the kingdom, to furnish a certain number of ships, manned, victualled, and furnished with all necessary ammunition, for the defence of the realm. With these writs went instructions and directions, from the lords of the council, for the assessing and levying the ship-money. These instructions were directed to the sheriffs of the several counties; and by them it appears, that the ships assessed on the counties of Middlesex and Hertford were to cost three thousand pounds; and those who refused payment of their portion, were to be distressed, and their goods sold for the payment; and this without any respect of persons. The rest of those instructions contain only the particular manner of levying the tax, and gave very arbitrary powers to the officers of the peace. The writ being served on the lord-mayor of London, he immediately called a common-council, who voted the following petition to be presented to the king.

“ To the king's most excellent majesty,

“ The humble petition of your faithful subjects, the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, of your city of London, most humbly shewing,

“ That whereas your writ, bearing teste 20 Octobris last, commanded your petitioners, at their charge, to provide seven ships of war, furnished with men, victuals, and all warlike provisions, to be at Portsmouth the first of March next, and continue thence by the space of twenty-six weeks in your majesty's service, upon the defence of the seas, and other causes in the said writ mentioned.

“ Your petitioners do, in all submissive humbleness, and with acknowledgments of your sacred majesty's favours unto our said city, inform your majesty, that they conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants, and acts of parliaments (which they are ready humbly to shew forth) they are exempt, and used to be freed from that charge.

“ And do most humbly pray,

“ That your majesty would be graciously pleased, that the petitioners, with your princely grace and favour, may enjoy the same privileges and exemptions, and be freed from providing the said ships and provisions.

Notwithstanding the opposition of the city of London, Charles went on as if ship-money had been a matter of course, and not likely to give any disgust; and, his necessities increasing, he resolved that this tax should be extended to the inland, as well as the maritime, counties; but so great was the dislike that the nation shewed to this measure, which they thought to be against law, and a direct contradiction, on the part of Charles, of the Petition of Right he had granted in their favour, that the court thought itself under a necessity to quiet the people, by the use made of the money; for, in May of the following year, 1635, a fleet of forty sail was fitted out, under the command of the earl of Lindsey, admiral; sir William Monson, vice-admiral; sir John Pennington, rear admiral; and a squadron of twenty ships was fitted out, under the earl of Essex. The admiral's instructions were to secure the Narrow seas, and the trade of England; and, on the twenty-sixth of May, the fleet set sail, in quest of the French and Dutch fleets, who were joined off Portland, as if they would have fought the English fleets: but Richelieu was too well informed by his spies, not to know that the real design of Charles was to drive the confederates out of the Narrow seas, and to destroy the growing marine of France, whom he considered as the prompter of the Dutch in all their insolencies: he looked upon the preservation of the sea-ports in Flanders to the crown of Spain, as being now of importance to his own crown; and his people likewise began to be extremely uneasy at Richelieu's ambition. The united fleets, at the approach of that of England, withdrew towards their own harbours; and the English admiral sent after them a bark, on the coast of Brittany, to observe their motions; which were all this year so pacific, that the English remained undisputed masters of the Narrow seas, to the infinite benefit of the nation. For the court of Spain reverted now to its natural connexions with England, who this year had, in all probability, saved the Austrian Netherlands from being over-run; and the immense benefits which the commons of England received by this friendship with Spain, would, if any thing could, have made the people overlook the proceedings of the court in the case of ship-money.

The king finding some inconvenience in the management of his treasury by commissions, which he had appointed on the death of the lord treasurer Weston, earl of Portland, last year, gave the office to Juxton, bishop of London, a creature of Laud's, who had persuaded the king, that he could not make a better choice than of that churchman, who having no family to raise, nor dependants to provide for, might better manage the income of the treasury to his advantage than had formerly been done by those who sought only to create vast estates to themselves. We shall conclude the transactions of this year, with observing, that Laud attempted to bring all the foreigners settled settled in England to a conformity with her church, notwithstanding all the privileges and indulgences they had received from former princes, and the infinite benefit the nation acquired by their settling here. This attempt was vigorously opposed by the French and Dutch churches, who were joined by all the puritans; and they refused to pay any deference to Laud's authority, on account of the exemptions and privileges they had received from the crown. After many debates, Laud prevailed so far, that though the foreigners of the first descent were suffered to continue in their own way, yet, their descendants, born in England, of foreign parents, were ordered by the king, to repair to their several parish churches, under the penalty of being proceeded against by the ecclesiastical laws. In like manner, Laud endeavoured to oblige the factories abroad to conform themselves to the worship and exercise of the English church; but many of the merchants neglecting such conformity, he obtained the king's orders for it.

I shall only add, that Charles, prince elector Palatine, son of the deceased king of Bohemia, came this year into England, to visit his uncle, and to consult with him concerning his restitution to the Palatinate; and shortly after him arrived his brother, prince Rupert, whom, in the course of a few years, we shall find making a considerable figure, in the defence of Charles, against his rebellious subjects.

The great figure which Charles had made upon the seas in the year 1635, raised his hopes to a great pitch; and nothing could have defamed him, but his having made ship-money a tax assessable upon the inland, as well as the maritime, countries, and enjoined the collectors to levy it in the same manner, and with the same rigor, as if it had been a tax imposed by parliament: however, this expedient had, for the present, so far succeeded, that, in the spring of the year 1636, he was enabled to send to sea a fleet of sixty sail of large ships, which was the greatest naval force that England had ever seen of her own; the command of this fleet was given to Algernoon Percy, Earl of Northumberland, who, for the great attachment of his ancestors to the Stuart family, was, by Charles, created lord high-admiral of England. The earl, setting sail in May, came up with some of the Dutch ships, and sunk all he met who refused to leave the British coasts, and to discontinue their fishing. This spirited conduct struck such a terror into all Europe, that even the haughty Richelieu was obliged to drop his scheme of setting the Dutch and French up as rivals to the English upon the sea. The Dutch themselves applied to Charles in the most earnest manner; and, at last, consented to pay thirty thousand pounds for licence to fish that year, until a proper regulation should be made, by fixing an annual tribute for the like licence for the future.

But no advantages of commerce, reputation, or tranquility, could now make the people digest the odious tax of ship-money. Charles finding that doubts, difficulties, and dangers, multiplied every day, and was at length become so general, that there was an evident disposition in the nation, rather to submit to the insults of foreigners, than to chastize them at the expence of law and liberty; he endeavoured to remove all manner of objections, by getting the decision of the judges on his side; he therefore sent the case to be resolved by them, which he thus stated:

“Carolus Rex.

“Where the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, whether may not the king, by writ under the great-seal of England, command all the subjects of our kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such a number of ships, with men, victuals, and munition, and for such a time as we shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom, from such danger and peril, and by law compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness; and whether, in such a case, the king is not the sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided?”

To which they returned the following opinion.

“May it please your most excellent majesty.

“We have, according to your majesty's command, every man by himself, and all of us together, taken into serious consideration the case and question signified by your majesty, and inclosed in your royal letter; and we are of opinion, that when the good and safety of the kingdom is in danger, your majesty may, by writ under the great-seal of England, command all your subjects of this your kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such a number ships, with men, victuals, and munition, and for such a time that your majesty shall think fit, for the trafic, defence, and safeguard of this kingdom from such danger and peril; and that by law your majesty may compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness; and we are all of opinion, that in such case, your majesty is the sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.

This decision Charles took especial care to have published and circulated through the kingdom. Notwithstanding this opinion, one Mr. Hampden, being taxed in twenty shillings, for an estate he had in Buckinghamshire, resolved to stand suit rather than comply with an imposition so contrary to the laws of the realm and the liberties of the subject. The cause was pleaded in the court of Exchequer, before all the judges, with great solemnity; and was, undoubtedly, the most important dispute that ever was handled in any court of justice; for the business was to ascertain or destroy one of the most valuable privileges of the subject; as such it was considered by every sensible individual of the nation; it became the universal topic of conversation, and people expected the issue with the most anxious impatience. After several hearings, protracted from November till June, the judges decreed that Mr. Hampden should pay the tax; and the whole kingdom was filled with indignation. Burton, a divine, and Bastwick, a physician, were condemned by the Star-chamber to the same punishment which Prynne had undergone, for having published seditious and schismatical libels: and Prynne himself, for a second offence, was sentenced to pay a fine of five thousand pounds, and lose the mutilated remainder of his ears*.

While the interesting affair of Mr. Hampden and ship-money was depending, the public uneasiness was farther encreased by a torrent of divisions in the church of Scotland.

Charles resolved to perfect his designs with respect to religion as well as the state; episcopacy had not been abolished in Scotland at the time of the reformation before Mary Stuart, but the protestant bishops had always been kept in subjection by the presbyterians. The Scots were governed by a kind of republic of priests, who were all upon an equality with one another: this was the only country, perhaps, in the world, where riches and honours did not make the higher clergy powerful. The bishops retained their seats in parliament, their honorary rights, and the revenues of their sees; but they were pastors without flocks, and peers without credit. The Scottish parliament, which was wholly composed of presbyterians, only suffered the bishops to retain their dignity, in order to debase them. The ancient abbeys were all in the hands of seculars, who had seats in parliament in virtue of the title of abbot. By degrees, the number of these titular abbots was diminished. James I. (and VIth of Scotland), restored episcopacy, with all its privileges. The king of England was not acknowledged as head of the church of Scotland; but being born in that country, and having lavished English money in pensions and places to several of its members, he was more master at Edinburgh than at London. The presbyterian (or, as it is called, the general) assembly, still subsisted as before, notwithstanding the restoration of episcopacy; these two different bodies were always threatening each other; and the synodic republic generally got the better of the episcopal hierarchy. James, who looked upon the bishops as a body devoted to the crown, and the presbyterians as enemies to the regal prerogative, thought that he should be able to reconcile his Scottish subjects to episcopal government, by bringing their church to a perfect conformity with the English. With this view he had, in the year 1616, obtained an act of the general assembly, for the compiling a liturgy, or book of common-prayer, which was to be first presented to the king, and, after his approbation, universally received through the kingdom. This book was accordingly framed, and sent up to the king; who having perused and considerably altered it, in conjunction with his English clergy, it was returned to Scotland, to be recommended to the use of that church. His death prevented the accomplishment of his design, which his son resumed; and in order to effect this purpose with greater ease, he endeavoured to encrease the authority of the prelates, and had even made an attempt to revive the first institution of the college of justice, that divided equally between the clergy and laity the whole judicial authority.

The liturgy which Charles, of his own authority, intended to introduce into Scotland, was copied from that of England; but, not to shock the pride of his ancient subjects by a servile imitation of their southern neighbours, he caused a few alterations to be made in it, by the assistance of archbishop Laud and others, and in that form transmitted it to the bishop of Edinburgh, with orders to begin the use of it. Easter-day, 1637, was by proclamation, appointed for the first reading of the service; but, in order to sound the dispositions of the people, the council postponed the matter till the twenty-third day of July, and they even gave notice the Sunday before of their design to commence the use of the new liturgy. As this intimation had been received quietly, they imagined that they might safely proceed in their purpose, and accordingly, in the cathedral church of St. Giles, the dean of Edinburgh, arrayed in his surplice, began the service; both archbishops, many of the privy-council, and others of the best quality in Edinburgh, being present.

But no sooner had the dean opened the book, than a number of the meaner sort, with clapping their hands and outcries, made a great uproar; and one of them, called Jane or Jannot Gaddis, flung a little folding stool, whereon she had sat, at the dean's head, saying, "Out, thou false thief! dost thou say the mass at my lug!" which was followed with so great a noise and confusion, that none could hear or be heard; whereupon the bishop of Edinburgh stepped into the pulpit, and, hoping to appease the people, by putting them in mind that the place in which they were was holy ground, and by intreating them to desist from the profanation of it, they were the more enraged, throwing at him cudgels, stools, and what else was at hand, even to the endangering his life. Upon this the bishop of St. Andrew's, the chancellor, called down the provost and bailiffs of the city from their seats to their assistance, who (not without some difficulty) put the unruly people out of the church, and made fast the doors. This done, the dean proceeded to read the liturgy, the multitude the mean while rapping and pelting the windows with stones, to disturb the service; but, notwithstanding all their clamour the service was ended; though not the people's rage, who waiting the bishop's retiring to his lodging, so assaulted him, as (had he not been rescued by a strong hand) he had probably perished by their violence.

The same morning the service-book was read in the next church to St. Giles's, though not without noise and tumult, yet not so great as in the latter: in the Gray Friars church, Mr. Ramsey refused to read it, and was afterwards suspended for the same; but the elect bishop of Argyll, his colleague began to read it, but was so menaced, cursed, and exclaimed against, that he was forced to give over.

In the college-church of Rollock, one of the preachers, who the Sunday before, at the intimation of the reading, had much commended the book, and undertaken this day to read it, upon notice how it was received at the church of St. Giles, broke the promise he had made to read it, chusing rather to incur the censure of those of his fraternity, than to offend the multitude, whose favour he sought: but he was likewise suspended. The morning this passed, the council assembled at the lord-chancellor's lodgings, and sent for the provost and bailiffs, to advise with them how to prevent the like tumults in the afternoon; which they promised to endeavour, and was so effected that the book was read in the church of St. Giles, and some other churches, without any such disturbance as it had in the morning; only the bishop of Edinburgh, in his return to his lodging, was rudely treated by the populace.

No person of any rank was concerned in these violent proceedings, and every one affected to condemn the licentiousness of the giddy multitude: it was judged imprudent, however, to hazard a new insult, by any fresh attempt to read this liturgy, and the populace seemed for the present to be perfectly satisfied; but when it was known that the king, notwithstanding representations made to him on this head, still persisted in his resolution of establishing that worship, men began to contract a more inveterate prejudice against it; and the concourse of all ranks of people to Edinburgh on the first of October (the day on which the term begins there) was so great, that the council began to fear another riot, and published proclamations, signifying that the council should be transferred to Dundee; commanding all strangers to quit the city; and prohibiting a book, written against the English and popish ceremonies imposed upon the church of Scotland. These proclamations rather fomented than allayed the flame then begun; and the day after their publication, October 18, the populace broke out into the most violent disorder: they assaulted the bishop of Galloway, the earl of Traquair, lord high-treasurer, in the streets, and chased them into the chamber where the privy-council were sitting, and attacked the council itself: they treated the town-council in the same manner; and had it not been for the interposition of some popular lords, who had great influence with them, they would probably have proceeded to acts of the most desperate outrage. In this sedition the actors were of some better condition than in the former; though no person of rank seemed, as yet, to countenance them. Nevertheless the spirit of the people appeared so alarming, that the earl of Traquair repaired to London, in order to acquaint the king more fully of the matter: but Charles, listening only to the counsels of Laud, a man who seemed born for his destruction, resolved to carry every thing with a high hand, and to punish severely the authors of the late tumults, and ordered the earl of Traquair, on his return to Scotland, to publish a proclamation "declaring his abhorrence of popish superstition, and his intention to introduce nothing but what should tend to the advancement of religion in the kingdom of Scotland." He afterwards sent another to the council, which had been removed to Stirling, signifying his being willing to pardon the crime which the people had committed, in assembling, composing, signing, and presenting such petitions to the chancellor, provided they would return to their own houses, and live for the future as good and faithful subjects. He forbade them to assemble again, on pain of treason; ordered that no person should presume to approach Stirling without permission; and commanded all the noblemen, gentlemen, and others, not belonging to the council, or courts of justice, to quit that town in six hours; otherwise they should be declared traitors.

In the mean while the council had removed to Stirling, at a greater distance from Edinburgh.

Immediately after the publication of the proclamation, the earl of Hume and the lord Lindsey, accompanied by many other noblemen and a great concourse of people, repaired to the market-cross (of Stirling), and, without regarding the presence and authority of the council, read publicly a protest, importing, "that they insisted upon presenting their grievances to the king: that they would not submit to the bishops or judges, until they should have acquitted themselves of the crimes laid to their charge: that no proclamation, or act of council, resolved upon in presence of those prelates, should prejudice the protestors: that none of their associates should be exposed to any dangers in their lives and fortunes, nor incur any penalty, civil or ecclesiastical, for having refused to acquiesce in the said acts, books, canons, rites, jurisdictions, and proclamations, composed and published contrary to the decrees of the general assembly, or against the laws of the realm: that in case this dispute should occasion any disorder, it should not be imputed to them, inasmuch as the council refused to receive a remonstrance and declinatory; which they had lately presented; and that their petition tended to nothing but the maintenance of the true religion in Scotland and to the honour of his majesty." The same protest was read at Linlithgow and Edinburgh.

This was the first time that the men of quality had appeared to countenance the proceedings of the people; but the spirit of discontent, which had been gradually spreading among all ranks of men, now blazed out at once, and the authority of the king and council were treated with equal contempt; for the next step of these mutineers was to establish four tables, as they called them, at Edinburgh; one was composed of nobility, another of gentry, a third of ministers, and a fourth of burghesses: the table of gentry consisted of several subordinate tables, according to their different counties; orders were issued by them, and every where executed with the most implicit obedience. Among the very first acts of this new-fangled institution was the Solemn League and Covenant, as if all laws, divine and human, were about to be abolished; and thus the natural desire of the great to support their own schemes on one side, and the fury of popular opposition on the other, lighted up the flames of civil war, which soon after desolated this wretched island.

The Solemn League and Covenant was no sooner published, than the people ran in crowds to subscribe it, and it was signed by almost all the persons of consequence in the kingdom, except the privy-counsellors, the judges, the bishops, and those who enjoyed places under the crown. There was prefixed to it the confession of faith of the kirk of Scotland, which had been signed by the late king James and his household, when he was about fourteen years of age, and had been renewed ten years afterwards: then, after a long recital of the acts of parliament, and a great deal of jargon against popery, and in praise of presbyterian purity and of protestant persecution on religious accounts, this instrument mentions the coronation-oath, which obliges the king "carefully to root out of his empire all heretics and enemies to the true worship of God, who shall be convicted by the true spirit of God of the aforesaid crimes:" and then it declares the true worship of God and the regal authority to be so strongly joined, as that they had the same common enemies, and did stand and fall together. The associates then proceeded to declare, but in general terms, against all innovations in religion that had been introduced since the establishment of presbytery in that country; but without taking notice that the chief of those innovations had as much sanction, both from ecclesiastical and civil authority, as that establishment had, if not more. They then proceeded as follows to the material part of this association "We promise and swear, by the great name of the Lord our God, to continue in the profession and obedience of the foresaid religion; that we shall defend the same, and resist all those contrary errors and corruptions, according to our vocation, and to the utmost of that power which God hath put in our hands, all the days of our life. And in like manner, with the same heart, we declare before God and men, that we have no intention nor desire to attempt any thing that may turn to the dishonour of God, or to the diminution of the king's greatness and authority; but, on the contrary, we promise and swear that we shall, to the uttermost of our power, with our means and lives, stand to the defence of our dread sovereign the king's majesty's person and authority, in the defence and preservation of the foresaid true religion, liberties, and laws of the kingdom; as also to the mutual defence and assistance of every one of us of another, in the same cause of maintaining true religion and his majesty's authority with our best counsel, bodies, means, and whole power, against all sorts of persons whatsoever; so that whatsoever shall be done to the least of us for that cause, shall be taken as done to us all in general, and every one of us in particular: and that we shall not directly or indirectly suffer ourselves to be divided or withdrawn, with whatsoever suggestion, combination, allurements, or terror, from this blessed and loyal conjunction; nor shall cast in any lett or impediment that may stay or hinder any such resolution, as by common consent shall be found to conduce for some good ends: but, on the contrary shall, by all lawful means, labour to further and promote the same. And if any such dangerous and delusive motion shall be made to us, by word or writ, we, and every one of us, shall either suppress it, or, if need be, shall incontinent make the same known, that it may be timeously obviated. Neither do we fear the foul aspersions of rebellion, combination, or what else our adversaries, from their own craft and malice, would put upon us, seeing what we do is so well warranted, and ariseth from an unfeigned desire to maintain the true worship of God, the majesty of our king, and the peace of the kingdom, for the common happiness of ourselves and posterity."

I thought it indispensably necessary to give the reader some idea of this famous Solemn League and Covenant, which was so much extolled by its admirers, and decried by its opposers. Some writers have been pleased to represent it as a justifiable national effort, in defence of religion, and liberty; as the establishment of episcopal authority in Scotland had, according to them, been imposed by arbitrary power, the recognition of the people obtained by compulsion, in diametrical opposition to the sense of the nation: but, by the favour of these gentlemen, the civil liberties of the Scots had, so far as can be found by records, never been attacked by power; nor had prerogative (as in England) encroached upon the privileges handed down to them by their ancestors. The story of this famous Covenant lay in a kind of latent defeasance to the royal authority, when not employed in defence and propagation of what they called, or fancied, the true religion; the king must not only comply with all the absurdities of the associators, but he must draw the sword against every man who should presume to differ from them in point of religion. This was a matter so endless, that it is plain the Covenant, considered as an act of the people, independent of the royal authority, was calculated for a pretext to withdraw their obedience from lawful government, by giving them the power to prescribe their own terms for their return to it: nor can I apprehend the reproach or censure of men of candor and enlightened understanding, in declaring it as my opinion, that it was as daring an insult as ever was offered to a king, and as rebellious a measure as ever was formed by a people. But to return from this digression, which I hope the reader will the more readily pardon, as it is meant to remove the mist of prejudice, and weaken the power of sounds, which are too often found to captivate the vulgar and unwary.

It was not then known who fomented the disturbances in Scotland, that prepared the way for the tragical end of Charles I. It was cardinal Richelieu, the most daring and most insolent minister that perhaps ever appeared in Europe. He had formed connexions with the prince of Orange and the States General for reducing the house of Austria; but despairing of success, unless he could prevail on Charles to stand neutral, he sent the count d'Estrades to England, the last year, to offer Charles his own terms, if he would engage in the interests of France; but having received a refusal from that monarch, rather more haughty than politic, it had exasperated him. There is a letter of the cardinal to d'Estrades (dated December 2, 1637,) in which are these remarkable words: "before the end of twelve months, the king and queen of England shall repent their having refused the offers you made them from his majesty, and shall soon know that I am not despicable." He had a priest, one Chambers by name, and by birth a Scotchman, who was his almoner; this man he sent to London and Edinburgh, in order to stir up a spirit of discontent among the presbyterians, partly by his rhetoric, and partly by the proper application of certain sums of money: all which is incontestably proved by the above letter.

It was now the year 1638. The king began to be apprehensive for the consequences of the commotions in Scotland; he therefore sent the marquis of Hamilton as his high-commissioner, and empowered him to treat with the covenanters, and offered them, in his name, a suspension of the canons and the liturgy, until they could be introduced in a fair and legal manner. Nothing is so despicable as a hated government when it becomes impotent: the covenanters, now sixty thousand strong, knew that Charles possessed no regular forces in either of his kingdoms; and therefore, when Hamilton proposed their renouncing and abolishing the Covenant, as a rebellious and undutiful association against their sovereign, they plainly told him, that "they could not acknowledge that they had ever departed from their obedience; and for their Covenant, they would rather renounce their baptism than abate one syllable thereof." Hamilton, finding all his endeavours to re-establish quiet ineffectual,

effectual, returned to London, made another journey to Edinburgh, returned again to London, and was immediately sent back with still more satisfactory orders, importing, "that the king revoked the Liturgy, the Book of Canons, the High Commission, and the Five Articles of Perth; that, for the future the bishops should be censurable by the general assembly; that all subjects of Scotland should subscribe the confession of faith, with an oath annexed, very different from that of the Covenant." Then he convoked a general assembly at Glasgow, for the month of November; and a parliament at Edinburgh, to meet in May of the following year. The tables protested against the proclamation, because the new oath, obliging them to maintain the religion at present professed, would operate in favour of the innovations which had been confirmed by acts of parliament. An accusation signed by a great number of noblemen, gentlemen, ministers, and burghers, was presented by the presbytery of Edinburgh against the bishops, alleging, "that they had not adhered to the conditions on which the general assembly at Montrose, in the preceding reign consented to their being admitted to parliament." By these they were obliged only to act as deputies of the church; to propose nothing without express orders of the church: to consent to nothing but what should be to the advantage of the church, on pain of deprivation; and to be accountable to the general assembly for their conduct in parliament. When the day of meeting arrived, the commissioner plainly perceived that the lay interest predominated in the assembly, in the number of elders that were returned; and all that he could do for the service of the king, was to encourage and promote disputes, that would furnish him with a pretence to dissolve them. The bishops presented a declinatory, pronouncing the assembly null; and the commissioner entered a number of protests against their proceedings: at length, finding them determined to sit in judgment upon the bishops, he on the seventh day of their session, dissolved the assembly as illegal, "because they had not introduced lay elders to vote in their deliberations; because the members had been chosen by lay elders, contrary to custom; because those few members to whom the tables were averse, had been rejected, without reason; and the bishops were in danger of being tried by those who were their professed enemies." Notwithstanding this sentence of dissolution, the assembly of Glasgow continued itself by virtue of its own authority, and passed acts, by which they not only condemned the liturgy, canons, and high-commission, excommunicated fourteen bishops, and abjured episcopal government; but they likewise presumed to reverse divers acts of parliament in favour of episcopacy, and to annul the subscription of those who had signed the confession of faith, according to the king's order; nay, they even explained that confession as virtually implying an abolition of episcopacy. The commissioner published another explanation, to prove that episcopacy did subsist, and that every person who signed the commission was bound to support it: and this again was answered by the assembly. In a word, the whole fabrick, which Charles and James, in a long course of years, had been rearing with so much care and industry, was at once thrown to the ground; the Covenant was also ordered to be subscribed by every one, under pain of excommunication.

The marquis seeing all things tending to a present rupture, sent to desire leave of the king to return to England, which he obtained: but before he went he saw an end to the Glasgow assembly, which broke up after having, by their own authority, ordained annual assemblies, the first whereof was appointed to meet at Edinburgh, the first day of July in the following year. As soon the marquis was gone the associators drew up a declaration, addressed to all good Christians of England, to justify their intentions and actions, which had so many undutiful expressions in it, that it was suppressed by the king's authority, who published a declaration to satisfy his faithful subjects of the seditious practices of those in Scotland who had, under pretext of religion, designed the subversion of his royal authority; which was commanded to be read in all churches.

Such was the state of affairs in Scotland at the end of the year 1638. As to the transactions in England, they are hardly worth mention, but so far as they relate to Scotland.

On the last of October this year, Mary de Medicis, widow of Henry IV. of France, and mother to the reigning monarch, Lewis XIII. having, by the cabals of cardinal Richelieu, the prime minister, been driven out of France, came into England, where she met with a noble reception from Charles and his queen. While she staid here, she was lodged in the king's palace of St. James's; but finding the king likely to be involved in great trouble to reduce his rebellious subjects in Scotland, after some months stay she departed for Holland.

Laud this year commenced a prosecution against Williams, bishop of Lincoln, late lord-keeper, to whom he was an implacable enemy; and, upon the shameful pretence of his having concealed a letter written to him by one Mr. Osbaldiston, in which mention was made of a "little urchin" and "a great man" which Laud interpreted to have been himself, was fined eight thousand pounds for receiving libellous letters: and Osbaldiston, who was master of Westminster school, by flight escaped his censure, which was, to have his ears nailed to the pillory, before his own school, and to be deprived of all his preferments, and fined five thousand pounds to the king. This unjustifiable severity swelled the load of popular clamour against Laud.

The laws of historical truth will not permit me to conceal, that Charles appears to have no great sincerity in the concession he had made to the Covenanters; and that he waited only for a fair opportunity to retract them. He had, for some months, by Hamilton's advice, been making warlike preparations, though with infinite caution and secrecy. When we consider the intriguing genius of rebellion, and that Charles had commissioned his arms and ammunition from Holland, we can scarcely suppose the heads of the Covenanters not to have received, both from France and England, information of Charles's designs: this may account for their proceedings during the latter part of the preceding year, and the beginning of 1639, when they began to make vigorous preparations for war on their side. They sent for succours to such of the neighbouring princes and states from whom they could expect any assistance.

sistance. They also invited home many eminent commanders of their nation from Sweden and Holland, to take employment in their armies; many of whom, at the beginning of the year came to them: they seized upon the castles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton, and all other places of strength in the kingdom; and took out of Dalkeith all the king's arms and ammunition, laid up there the year before by the marquis of Hamilton. Next they chose Alexander Lesly, an old experienced officer, to be captain-general of their armies, to whom all the chief of the confederates (who took arms) solemnly swore obedience in all orders of war; and he swore in like manner faithfully to exercise his charge. The marquis of Argyll was sent to take care of the frontiers opposite to Ireland; the earl of Montrose had the charge of Aberdeen and the most northern parts; and colonel Monro was sent towards the Borders of England, to keep all things quiet till the levies were perfected.

When Charles found that his designs were discovered, and had received the copy of their last declaration, he lost all patience, and formed a resolution of proceeding openly in the way of arms, and on the twenty-sixth of January, 1639, a writ was sent to the nobility to attend the royal standard at York. On this occasion the king had recourse to the English clergy, and even to the catholics of the kingdom, who equally hated the presbyterians, and only furnished the king with money, because they looked upon this as a religious war. The English nobility in general shewed great alacrity for his service; and those who secretly wished well to the Covenanters were obliged to dissemble, and vie with the others in forwardness; but nothing could exceed the generosity and loyalty of those noblemen who composed the king's privy-council, who, on this occasion, contributed the greatest part of their fortunes for their master's service. Laud and the marquis of Hamilton signalized themselves particularly by their contributions; and Wentworth, the lord-deputy of Ireland (about the same time created earl of Strafford) alone gave twenty-thousand pounds; he also drew down a body of men towards the sea-coasts of that kindom, opposite to the earl of Argyll's country, who had now joined the Covenanters, and thereby prevented a very dangerous junction between the disaffected of both kingdoms. Charles himself, by regular œconomy, had amassed a sum of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which he reserved for any sudden emergency; and by all these means he was enabled to equip a very considerable fleet and army: the former consisted of sixteen large ships, was furnished with five thousand land forces, and was commanded by the marquis of Hamilton, who had orders to sail to the Firth of Forth, and to make a diversion in the forces of the enemy.

The army amounted to about twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and was conducted by the earl of Arundel, a nobleman of great family, but distinguished neither for his military nor political abilities; the earl of Essex, a man of strict honour, and extremely beloved by the soldiers, acted as lieutenant-general; and the earl of Holland was general of the horse.

The king himself repaired to the camp, and summoned all the noblemen of England to attend him. The whole had rather the appearance of a splendid court than a military armament; and in this situation, carrying more show than real force with it, the army arrived at Berwick on the twenty-eighth of May, with the king at its head, and there encamped. The Scottish army, which was nearly equal in number to that of the king, marched, at the same time, under general Lesly, towards the borders of England, and encamped within four miles of Berwick.

The king had, in the beginning of this year, set forth a declaration, containing his reasons for this expedition, in which he displayed the insolent treatment he had met with from the Covenanters, and his own readiness to heal the disorders of the state, in such terms, that it had a wonderful effect in his favour in Scotland. The marquis of Huntley declared for him, and this was no small accession of strength, for Huntley had a large estate, but a much larger following; and was looked upon to be the only nobleman who could balance the numbers which Argyll could bring into the field. But, to the inexpressible misfortune of Charles's affairs, this nobleman was at this time, when he was most wanted, taken from his sovereign; for the marquis of Montrose, having enticed him to a conference, and positively refusing to sign the Covenant, he and his eldest son were sent prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh. This unlucky accident was generally attributed to Hamilton, who having secured Holy Island to the king's obedience, had entered the Forth, and published a proclamation from Charles, offering pardon to the rebels who should lay down their arms, but with orders to prosecute all others with fire and sword. Hamilton continued a shameful inactivity; and, while in Holy Island, he received a visit from his mother, a most rigid Covenanter. This, with the general tenor of his conduct, made many of the king's friends suspect his integrity; and the Scots themselves were commonly heard to say, "they knew the son of such a mother would not do them hurt."

The troops under Lesly were but ill armed, for they had not three thousand musquets amongst them all; so that, notwithstanding their vapouring, they were much better prepared for a treaty than a battle. But their countrymen about the king's person and in his army, most infamously betrayed him, by magnifying the strength of the rebels, and at the same time giving them intelligence of every thing that was transacted between Charles and his council; and the king seeing his noblemen and followers as generally averse to the prosecution of the war, expressed his wishes for an opportunity to terminate it without bloodshed. The Covenanters, apprized of his inclinations, wrote in a very humble strain to the earls of Arundel, Essex, and Holland, imploring their good offices with his majesty, and protesting that nothing was farther from their thoughts than any design to invade England. Essex, who both hated and despised the Scots, would not deign to answer their letter, which he sent to the king: but the other two noblemen were differently affected; they thought the Covenanters had reason on their side, and turned their thoughts towards a pacification. When those letters had produced their effect, the lord Dumfermling arrived from the Scottish camp with a trumpet, and presented to the king an humble application, beseeching his majesty to appoint commissioners for a treaty. Charles desired that the last proclamation he sent to Edinburgh should be read in the Scottish army; general Lesly complied with this request; and then he appointed six commissioners to treat with the insurgents. The conferences soon produced the following convention for peace, which was signed on the seventeenth of June.

Scottish

“ I. The forces of Scotland to be disbanded and dissolved within twenty-four hours after the agreement of the king's declaration.

“ II. The king's castles, forts, and ammunition, to be delivered up, after the said publication, so soon as he shall send to receive them.

“ III. His ships to depart presently after the delivery of the castles; and in the mean time no interruption of trade.

“ IV. All persons goods and ships detained by the king since the first of November, to be restored.”

“ V. No meetings, treatings, consultations, or convocations, of any of the Scots, but such as are warranted by act of parliament.

“ VI. All fortifications to desist, and to be remitted to the king's pleasure.

“ VII. To restore to every one therein, liberties, lands, houses, goods, and means whatsoever, taken and detained from them by whatsoever means, since the first of November last.”

The next day the king, on his part, signed a declaration, in which he was pleased to confirm all that had been granted by the marquis of Hamilton, and “that all matters ecclesiastical shall be determined by the assemblies of the kirk, and matters civil by the parliament, and other inferior judicatories established by law; which assemblies shall be kept once a year, or as shall be agreed upon by the general assembly, and our commissioner for the time being.”

“ That a free and general assembly be kept at Edinburgh the sixth day of August next, where we intend (God willing) to be personally present; and thereafter a parliament the twentieth of August, and there an act of oblivion to be passed; and that upon their disarming and disbanding of their forces, dissolving and discharging all their pretended tabernacles and conventicles, and restoring to the king all his castles, forts, and ammunition, as also his royal honours; and to every one of his good subjects, their liberties, lands, houses, goods, and means whatsoever, taken and detained since the late pretended general assembly; the king will, presently thereafter, recall his fleet, and retire his forces, and cause restitution of their ships and goods, taken since the aforesaid time.”

The pacification being thus agreed, the king sent for some of the Scots lords, and informed them, that he had given orders to the marquis of Hamilton to draw off the fleet, and did intend to have been at Edinburgh at the opening of the assembly; but that he had received letters from the queen, which intimated a necessity of his presence in London about some parliamentary affairs; but he would depute the earl of Traquair, with full power and authority, as his high commissioner, to hold the assembly and the parliament.

It was generally thought, that the concessions made by the king would have brought the malcontents to a perfect submission, but they soon appeared to have entertained very different thoughts, and to have entered into treaty only to temporize, and that the overtures they made for a pacification were partly out of deference to their correspondents in England, and partly with a view to fix the odium of any subsequent rupture upon the king and his council, for they did not punctually perform any one article; they disbanded their troops in such a manner that they could be re-assembled with the utmost facility and dispatch. A great part of the walls of the castle of Edinburgh being fallen down, and the lord Ruthven, who held that fortress for the king, setting about to repair the breach, the covenanters would not suffer the workmen and materials to enter; at the same time that they themselves went on repairing the strong holds in their hands, continuing their meetings and consultations, and terrifying or prosecuting all who were not their friends; and, in order to get the populace still more on their side, they published and dispersed a scandalous libel, intitled, “ Some conditions of his majesty's treaty with the subjects of Scotland before the English nobility.”

This paper consisted of eight heads, which were pretended to be drawn out of notes taken upon the several discourses held with the king about the subject of his declaration: the matter of it was highly scandalous, and derogatory to the king's honour; for all the substance of the royal declaration was thereby altered, and the intention of it perverted. This affair gave Charles great disquiet; and on the fourth of August he called a council, in which the paper was read; and the counsellors who had been present at the conference upon the treaty, unanimously agreed, that the contents of the paper were “ notoriously false, and contrary to what his majesty clearly expressed at the pacification.” His majesty likewise declared (as appears by the minutes of the council which were afterwards turned into a proclamation) “ That before his coming from Berwick, he shewed a copy of this scandalous paper to the earl of Lindsey, the earl of Holland, master treasurer, and master secretary Cook, who fully concurred in the aforesaid opinion with the lords; all which lords, and particularly the earl of Holland, avowed the falseness thereof before the faces of those Scottish lords who were believed to be the divulgers of it (the lords of the council of Scotland being the likewise present); all which considered, the whole board became humble petitioners to his majesty, that this false and scandalous paper might be publicly burned by the hangman; and that his majesty's pleasure might be published by proclamation, “ that no person or persons hereafter, of what degree or condition soever, presume to keep any copy thereof; but that within five days after the said proclamation published, every such person and persons shall deliver to the next justice of the peace, at his or their dwelling, all and every copy and copies thereof; the same to be by the said justices of peace immediately brought or sent to one of his majesty's principal secretaries, on penalty of incurring the uttermost of such punishment and penalties as by the law of this realm are to be inflicted upon those that keep such scandalous and seditious papers.”

Upon the sixth of August (old stile), the general assembly met at Edinburgh, according to the royal proclamation, and sat till the twenty-fourth: the chief matters were, the confirmation of the act of the Glasgow assembly, the abolishing of episcopacy, the five articles of Perth, the high-commission court, the liturgy, and the book of canons; and it ended with an address of thanks to the king, for his indulgence towards them, in the his majesty would not only abstain from levying ship-money, but even consent to its being utterly abolished, in any manner they should judge convenient. Vane, inspiring Charles with an idea of making this proposal, seems to have been perfectly well acquainted with the disposition of the members of the house of commons, and how favourable it was to his design of embroiling the king with them. This proposal produced violent debates: the commons thought no argument, more unfavourable, could possibly be urged for a supply, than an offer to abolish ship-money; a taxation the most illegal, and the most dangerous, which had ever, in any reign, been imposed on the nation: and they imagined, that, by bargaining for the remission of that duty, they would seem, in a manner, to acknowledge the authority by which it had been levied; or, at least, give encouragement for assuming new claims of a like nature, in hopes of resigning them on like advantageous terms: and, for these reasons, they resolved to pay no regard to the king's solicitations, but to continue the examination and redress of the public grievances.

Things were now come to the crisis Vane wished for: Charles was incensed to the highest degree at the unreasonable obstinacy of the commons; and this treacherous member, taking advantage of his perturbation, insinuated that he had it from good authority, that in a day or two the commons intended to pass a vote against the war with Scotland; and Charles unhappily believing the report, which, by all that appears by the journals of the proceedings of the house, was entirely groundless, repaired on the morrow (being the fifth of May) to the house of peers, where he dissolved the parliament. The marquis of Hamilton has not escaped the censure of some well-informed historians on this action, which in the end proved fatal to Charles, in order to embroil the king's affairs, to confirm the Scots, and distract the English, with a view to work his own advantages on both.

Indeed no step could have been taken more proper to exercise the reigning spirit of discontent among the people, who usually repose the most entire confidence in their representatives, and expect from them the redress of all their grievances. But as if this had not been thought enough to ruin Charles in the minds of his subjects, he was, by his violent counsellors, prevailed on to renew those acts of arbitrary power which, from former experience, he might have learned were so dangerous and unpopular. Bellasis and sir John Hotham were cited before the council; and refusing to give any account of their conduct in parliament, were thrown into prison. Crew, the chairman of the committee of religion, was ordered to deliver up all the complaints and petitions presented to the committee; and on his refusing to produce them, he was sent to the Tower. The studies and even the pockets of the earl of Warwick and lord Brooke were searched, before the expiration of privilege, in hopes of finding some treasonable papers.

Though the parliament was dissolved, the convocation continued sitting, under the name of a synod, to the twenty-ninth of May, and enacted certain canons. Among these there was one that obliged all ecclesiastics, and such as had received degrees in the universities, to take an oath, importing, that they approved of the doctrine and discipline of the church of England; and that they never would consent to any alteration of the church-government, by archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c. After having settled their canons and this oath, which they had no legal power to impose, they granted a large subsidy, for the maintenance of the Scottish war, and then separated.

The dissolution of this parliament was by the people thought to be the work of the archbishop of Canterbury; this raised the popular hatred against him to the highest pitch: and on the ninth of May a paper was posted upon the Old Exchange, by one John Lilburne, exciting the apprentices to rise and rife his house at Lambeth on the Monday following; of which the archbishop having notice, made provision of some quantity of arms and ammunition for his defence. In the dead of the night preceding the appointed day, five hundred of the rabble beset his house, and strove to force an entrance, but were repulsed, and forced to depart with only denouncing their anger in seditious language against him, and breaking the windows of his palace. The next day many of them were apprehended, and confined in the White Lion prison, in Southwark: but within three days after, a number of their accomplices assembled, broke open the prison, and rescued them: nevertheless one of the ringleaders of the first riot was retaken, arraigned, condemned, hanged, drawn, and quartered on the twenty-first of May.

It seemed as if Charles had studied to set all ranks of people against him, for instead of soothing the city of London in the present delicate situation of circumstances, he prosecuted it in the Star-chamber for certain misdemeanors committed at Londonderry, in Ireland, which had been peopled by the city, and condemned it in a very heavy fine. He continued to raise all the taxes which had been so loudly inveighed against in parliament. Such a conduct in an absolute prince would have occasioned a revolt among his subjects, much more in a limited monarch. Unsupported by his parliament, he was now obliged to have recourse to the generosity of individuals, and so much interest did he possess among the courtiers and ministers, that above three hundred thousand pounds were subscribed in a few days.

The earl of Northumberland had been appointed general of the king's army, now augmented to twenty thousand men, the earl of Strafford lieutenant-general, and lord Conway general of the horse; but Northumberland being about this time seized with a dangerous illness, could not take upon him the command; as to Strafford, it seems his presence was absolutely necessary in England, to direct the affairs of the council; Charles therefore went himself in person so soon as the queen, then great with-child, was delivered of her son Henry, who was born at Oatlands, on the twentieth of July. But in the mean time the army was ordered to march northward; and lord Conway marched with the van some days before the rest could come up: and as he was advancing, news was brought him, that the Scottish army, under general Lesly, was marched to Dunce, not far from Berwick, where they had taken up their quarters the preceding year. Upon this advice he ordered the army to hasten towards Newcastle; but before they reached that place, intelligence came that the Scottish army had entered England on the twentieth tieth of August. The king received advice of this on his way to York, and dispatched orders to Conway to do what he could to impede their march till the army could come up. Upon this Conway called a council of war, the result of which was, that they should seize the pass at Newborne upon Tyne, to prevent the Scots possessing themselves of Newcastle, where sir Jacob Astly had newly entered with his regiment, but had not time to erect any fortifications. The king made all the haste he could; but by that time he reached North Allerton, about two days march on this side Newcastle, the lord Conway sent to him an account of the defeat of the forces under his command, which he received at Newborne, on the twenty-seventh of August.

In consequence of their success at Newborne, the Scots entered Newcastle without opposition: as for Conway, he retired with precipitation to Durham, and thinking himself not safe in that place, returned to North Allerton, where he found the main army, which also retreated to York. In the mean while, the Scots entered Newcastle peaceably and under the most solemn protestation of friendship, which they soon violated by treating the inhabitants of the town and neighbouring country in all respects as a conquered people; nor does it even appear that any precautions were taken by the English officers to prevent the king's magazines of powder and ammunition from falling into the hands of the enemy.

Charles arrived at York on the twenty-third of August: and, after assembling the gentlemen there, he and the earl of Strafford did all they could to animate them to the service of their country. They had advanced as far as North Allerton with their whole army, when they heard of lord Conway's defeat, on which they retreated to York, that they might be joined by the troops that were marching from Newcastle to Durham; and the whole to all appearance, composed a very fine army.

It was doubtless mortifying to Charles to be reduced to submit to the insolence of rebels, and hold a parley with the avowed enemies of his royal state and dignity; but what could he do? he saw a visible coldness in the officers and common men of his army, which gave him the most dreadful apprehensions that they would not fight against the Scots: the great county of York, instead of raising men for his service, presented a petition against his measures: in fine, he saw no other method of stopping the progress of the Covenanters, than by complying with their proposal.

While these things were in agitation, an address was presented from the city of London, petitioning for a parliament, as the only method of healing the distempered state. This petition encouraged the earls of Bedford, Essex, Hertford, Warwick, Bristol, and Mulgrave, the lords Say and Seale, Howard of Escrick, Bolingbroke, Mandeville, Brooke, and Paget, to present another of the like tendency. In these, and a thousand other distracting circumstances, the only expedient that Charles and his friends could think of, was somewhat between a parliament and a council, and was revived from very remote antiquity; this was, to summon a council of the English peers at York.

On the twenty-fourth of September this great council met, and Charles opened it with a speech, in which he demanded their advice upon two points: the first was, what answer to be given to the rebels, and in what manner they were to be treated; the second, how to get money for keeping his army together until a parliamentary supply should be raised. After various debates, it was resolved to name commissioners for treating with the Scots; these were, the earls of Bedford, Hertford, Essex, Salisbury, Warwick, Bristol, Holland, and Berkshire, viscount Mandeville, the lords Wharton, Paget, Brooke, Pawlet, Howard, Saville, and Dunsmore: the earls of Traquair, Morton, and Lanerk, were named as assistants to these commissioners, to remove any difficulties that could arise from their ignorance of the constitution and affairs of Scotland; and secretary Vane, Mr. Lewis Stuart, and sir John Burroughs, were to assist in like manner upon the part of the English commissioners. It was first proposed, as most consistent with the king's dignity, that the treaty should be held at York; but the Scots, not so much from any real apprehensions they had of danger, as to increase the odium against Strafford, refused to come to any place where he had power; and, after various consultations, Rippon was appointed to be the place of meeting. All this while the inhabitants of the northern counties, that had been laid under contribution by the Scots, made dreadful complaints to Charles of their oppression; and, in order to keep the English army together, instructions were given by the great council to the earls of Manchester, Pembroke, and Clare, the viscount Camden, with the lords Coventry and Goring, to treat with the city of London for the loan of two hundred thousand pounds. The commissioners for the Scots were the earl of Dumfermling, lord Loudon, sir Patrick Hepburn, sir William Douglas, Mr. Smith, Mr. Wedderburn, Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Johnston.

The conferences were opened at Rippon on the first of October, and the Scots commissioners presented the following propositions, in the form of a petition: "That his majesty would be pleased to cause the acts of the last general assembly to be ratified in parliament: that the castle of Edinburgh, and all places of strength in Scotland, should be employed for no other purpose but the defence of the kingdom: that the Scots in England and Ireland should not incur any penalty for having subscribed the Covenant, nor be subjected to oaths or subscriptions contrary to the laws of the realm: that the authors of these troubles should be punished as incendiaries, according to their demerits: that the ships taken from the Scots should be restored with all their merchandize; and all damage to be repaired: that they should be indemnified for all the losses they had sustained since the beginning of the troubles: that the proclamations declaring them traitors, should be revoked; and that his majesty would, with the advice of the English parliament, withdraw the garrisons from the frontiers: that a free communication and commerce between the two nations be restored." They likewise demanded, in an insolent manner, forty thousand pounds per month for maintaining their army, during the treaty. Charles would gladly have consented that both armies should have been disbanded, but he could not prevail; and he now saw that nothing advantageous to him could result from the interview at Rippon: he therefore endeavoured to transfer the conferences to York, where the great council continued sitting; but he was again disappointed through the refusal of the Scots. His own commissioners pressed him to remove the treaty from Rippon to London, to which he was obliged to comply, and also to a cessation of arms, by which the Scots were assured of maintenance for their army; and the river Tees was made the boundary for both parties. This cessation was concluded on the twenty-sixth of October, and the commissioners returned to York, where Charles found himself obliged to ratify all they had done in granting the demands of the Scots. Thus was this unhappy prince humbled, to receive law from his rebels, and directions from his subjects.

Charles finding the general sense of the nation was so declared for a parliament, had in his speech to the great council acquainted them that he intended to summon one to sit on the third of November ensuing, and writs had accordingly been issued out for that purpose. There remained, therefore but a short time for him to return to London before the meeting of the parliament, which he did, leaving Strafford, who had joined his army, to provide for the peace of the North; and an army of rebels, whom he paid, to domineer in the bowels of his country; for it was understood that the Scottish army was neither to return, or be disbanded, till the treaty, begun at Rippon, was finished at London.

The parliament met, according to its summons, on the third of November, and the commons chose Lenthall, a lawyer of some reputation, for their speaker. The parliament at meeting was unusually numerous, every member looking upon this conjuncture as a national crisis: the speech of Charles, as usual contained reflections on the incredulity of those who had refused to trust to his personal assurances: he recommended to his parliament, first to drive out the Scottish rebels, and then he promised them a redress of grievances; and lastly he recommended to them to provide money for the payment of the army, which otherwise must be disbanded, while that of the rebels was kept on foot.

It would swell these sheets too much, were we minutely to set down the several steps taken by this parliament in the pursuit of the favourite object of humbling the kingly authority; we shall content ourselves with given a summary account of their proceedings, but so as not to omit any material incident worthy the knowledge of the reader. And here we shall beg leave to premise a general reflection on the characters and circumstances of men and things at this juncture.

The long intermission of parliaments had produced many mischiefs and inconveniences in the government, by the remissness of some and the rigor of others, in church and state, which inflamed the zeal of many good patriots of both houses to be very urgent for the redress of their errors: the eye of the whole nation was fixed on the proceedings of a parliament summoned at so critical a juncture, and during such general discontents as now rent the whole nation; a parliament which was to complete every thing left unfinished by former parliaments. Notwithstanding the vigorous efforts of the courtiers and ministers, the elections had run almost entirely in favour of those in the opposition: the members were generally bent upon an alteration in the government; the few moderate men amongst them sought only to ascertain the liberties of the nation; others resolved to humble the royal prerogative; and there was a more violent party that extended their views to an utter extirpation of the hierarchy and monarchical government, but these at first carefully concealed their designs under the profession of rigid presbyterianism, and were afterwards known by the name of Independents. The two latter parties were in confederacy with the Scots, and sought, by fomenting the distractions of the state, to lift themselves into places of power and trust: the pursuit of these things made them exceed the methods and proceedings of their predecessors, and, by inspiring jealousies, countenancing and procuring tumultuous petitions and assemblies by menaces and force, they often obtained the accomplishment of their purposes, contriving without-door in private meetings, what they designed to carry within. The success they met with in these their proceedings enlarged their views and extended their ambition; it bred thoughts in them they had never entertained before; and this was that which drew on the ruin of the king, and with him, for some time, the subversion of all monarchy: but many of those who were in the beginning most active for reformation, had not in their prospect the calamity that ensued, and too late repented the error of having lent their assistance to those actions, when they could no longer stem the tide that the breath of violence and disaffection had swelled to so great an height. These matters will more plainly appear as we proceed in the history of this reign, whose horrors we are now about to describe.

The earl of Strafford was considered as the first minister of state, both on account of the great interest which he had with his master, and his own uncommon abilities. By a concurrence of untoward circumstances he had exposed himself to the hatred of all the three nations, which composed the British empire. The Scots, whose authority was now very great, regarded him as the capital enemy of their country, and one, whose councils and influence they had most reason to dread. He had persuaded the parliament of Ireland to furnish large supplies, in order to prosecute a war against them: he had raised an army of nine thousand men, with which he threatened to invade their western coast: he had compelled the Scots, who lived under his government, to renounce the Covenant, which they so much adored: he had in Ireland denounced the Scottish Covenanters rebels and traitors, even before the king had taken any such step against them in England: and he had ever given his opinion against the late treaty and suspension of arms, which he considered as dangerous and dishonourable. So highly were the Scots incensed at all these measures, that they had absolutely refused to send commissioners to treat at York, as was first proposed; because, they said, the lieutenant of Ireland, their capital enemy, being general of the king's forces, was there possessed of the chief command and authority.

Strafford, first as deputy, then as lord-lieutenant, had managed the affairs of Ireland for the space of eight years. His government had been extremely vigilant and active, but very far from being popular. His authority and influence, however, during the time of his prosperity, had kept his enemies in awe; but no sooner was he seized with adversity, then the concealed aversion of the Irish blazed out at once, and the parliament of that kingdom employed every expedient in order to aggravate the charge against him.

All the grievances which the English had suffered for a number of years, were universally ascribed to the pernicious councils of Strafford; because he was known to be the minister whom the king most favoured and consulted.

Though descended from an ancient family, and born to a considerable estate, his sudden and great elevation was not exempted from envy; and his former associates in popular measures, finding that he owed his advancement to the desertion of their cause, pursued him with the most implacable hatred, and resolved to exert their utmost efforts in order to effect his ruin*.

The first five days of this session was taken up in settling the five standing committees for grievances, religion, courts of justice, trade, and privileges and elections; and in several declamatory speeches against the maladministration of government, both in church and state, the chief part of which were ascribed to the councils of the earl of Strafford and archbishop Laud: fanaticism seems to have taken possession of the minds of almost all ranks of people: at this time religion was become an universal fashion; the most eloquent speakers in the house introduced a kind of holy cant and jargon into their speeches, and all their allusions being scriptural, stamped them with an air of prophecy or inspiration.

The Scottish commissioners were now arrived in London, in order to put a finishing hand to the treaty that had been begun at Rippon. These had many conferences with their friends of the house of commons; and it was agreed by them, that the earl of Strafford should be impeached at his first coming to the house of peers, for he was as yet at York. This measure was thus suddenly resolved on, to prevent an impeachment that nobleman had ready against Mr. Pym and some others of the leading members of both houses, for holding intelligence with the Scots, which he intended to have offered in the house of peers as soon as he had taken his seat amongst them. It was the tenth of November, early in the morning, while the house of commons was in a debate about papists, that it was certainly known that Strafford was come to town; upon this a motion was immediately made, "that no member should leave the house; that the outward room, or lobby, be kept clear from strangers; and the outer door, upon the stair-head, be kept locked;" and all this upon pretext of examining Newton and Grey, two messengers, who had been concerned in taking up and discharging papists. This secrecy was somewhat interrupted by a message from the lords, who demanded a meeting with the commons, which the latter refused; and Pym and Clotworthy, with the other enemies of Strafford, were so vehement in their speeches, and so quick in their dispatch against him, that his impeachment, upon the notoriety of the facts contained in it, was carried up that very day by Pym, who at the bar of the house of peers accused him of high-treason. The earl was thereupon required to withdraw, and it was very warmly debated by the peers, whether he should be imprisoned on a general accusation as this was, without any particular act of treason charged against him; but, upon the question, it was carried in the affirmative, and the earl, upon being called in, was put into the custody of the black-rod, until the house of commons should exhibit a more particular charge against him.

The next day the commons, considering the great pressures of the northern counties by the two armies that lay upon them, resolved that two hundred thousand pounds should be raised for their maintenance; and, till it could be regularly levied, one hundred thousand pounds were borrowed in the city of London, upon the credit of some of the members of the house of commons. Many petitions from all parts were now brought in for redress of grievances, and to be relieved against orders and decrees of the Council-table, Star-chamber, and High-commission court; which were referred to the proper committees: several persons also were released out of prison upon their petitions, among whom were Prynne, Burton, and Bastwick: and a while after, by the intercession of the lords with the king, Williams, bishop of Lincoln, was also freed from his imprisonment in the Tower, and admitted to resume his seat in the upper-house. In the mean time the king, willing to be rid of the Scottish army, hastened the commission to the lords who were employed in the treaty of Rippon, or any ten of them, to treat with the Scottish commissioners, or any seven of them, to take into consideration their demands, and compose all differences arising thereupon; which commission was passed under the great-seal of England on the twenty-third of November: and in a short time after the Scots presented their demands, which were eight in number; and afterwards they put in seventeen heads, wherein one (and that not the least considerable) was, that some Scotchmen of respect might enjoy places of trust about the king, queen, and prince. This was that which all their pretences aimed at, notwithstanding all their zeal to the reformation of religion: and though all they desired else was granted, they never attained to their ends in this; for the troubles which they raised, did not only bring after them a misery to this nation, but them also, and the ringleaders of them wanted not their part thereof: sir Francis Windebank, secretary of state, was aimed at, as one of the great delinquents in the opinion of the parliament, being suspected in his religion, a great favourer of the priests of the Romish church, for whom he had obtained many reprieves, and was thought to be guilty of misdemeanors of a higher nature; but he, thinking himself not sufficiently provided to ride out the approaching storm, made his escape into France, where he died a Roman catholic. In the consideration of grievances, the charge imposed upon the subject for providing and furnishing of ships, and the assessments for raising money for that purpose, commonly called ship-money, were voted by both houses to be against the laws of the realm; and all proceedings in the case, both at Council-table, Star-chamber, and courts of justice, declared null and void.

The debate of ship-money led the house to consider of the first occasion of raising it, which was, because the parliament immediately preceeding the last, was dissolved without granting the supplies the king expected from them; and from hence they were led into an enquiry of several violations of the privileges of parliament, by the commitment of divers members, and a judgment against them in the King's Bench: and then all the inconveniences were summed up, that happened through the long intermission of parliaments; to provide against which, it was resolved to bring in a bill for establishing triennial parliaments. The debates took up many days, and whilst these consultations were held for the reformation of the civil state, the Scottish commissioners, who acted in concert with the puritan party, were not idle in their endeavours to alter the hierarchy or ecclesiastical state: by the fanatical discourses of themselves and their emissaries they so worked upon the minds of the deluded people, that a great number of petitions were presented to the commons against ecclesiastical discipline, the ceremonies of the church, and the government of it by bishops: amongst which was one presented by alderman Pennington, subscribed by fifteen hundred citizens of London. This petition did not a little alarm the moderate party in the house of commons, who were not unwilling to have the abuses of church-government reformed, but could not approve of the alteration of that government itself; so that, after some debate, the petition was ordered to lie upon the table for farther consideration. The puritans however, though unsuccessful in this effort, fell a while after upon another expedient, more plausible, which was an inquisition into the legality of the new canons, the oath, and the tax upon the clergy, which had been created and imposed by the convocation, after the parliament had been dissolved, and it was voted by a great majority, "That such an assembly had no power to frame constitutions, canons, or any other acts, without consent of parliament; that the late canons contained matters contrary to the king's prerogative, the fundamental laws of the kingdom, the rights of parliament, and the liberty and property of the subjects; that therefore they tended to sedition, and were of the most dangerous consequences."

The very same day that the canons were thus voted down (December 17) the commons appointed a committee of thirty-nine members, to enquire who were the principal promoters of those canons, and to prepare an impeachment against the archbishop of Canterbury, for having endeavoured to overturn the laws and religion of his country. The Scottish commissioners, who acted in concert with the puritan party, at the same time presented to the lords an accusation against that prelate, charging him with being the author of all the troubles in Scotland, by imposing the book of canons and the liturgy upon the natives of that kingdom, and exciting a war between his majesty and his subjects. The archbishop being likewise impeached by the commons, was taken into custody, and afterwards committed to the Tower. Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, being suspected of a design to quit the kingdom, was obliged to give security for ten thousand pounds. The lord-keeper Finch being threatened with a prosecution, fled into Holland and was declared a traitor by a vote of the house of commons, and the king committed the seals to the custody of sir Edward Littleton. Brampton, Davenport, and Crawley, three of the judges, were obliged to give bail. Such was the method taken to overawe the king's ministers: but what still more contributed to intimidate his adherents, was the practice of passing votes against any part of their conduct as contrary to law. From want of power, rather than inclination, to resist, the king was obliged to remain a passive spectator of all those violent proceedings. He hoped to regain his lost authority by a little flexibility, but herein he was mistaken: he imagined that the parliament would assist him in taking vengeance upon the Scots for their irruption into England; but instead of that, this very parliament made them a present of three hundred thousand pounds, to defray the expences they had been at in carrying on a civil war. He flattered himself likewise with suppressing the puritanical party in England: almost all the members of the house of commons were puritans. He had a tender affection for the earl of Strafford, who had devoted himself so generously to his service; and the commons soon after obliged him to sign the fatal warrant for his death, and thereby shew his subjects the way to shed blood still more precious.

We have already observed, that the States had proposed to Charles a marriage between his eldest daughter and the young prince of Orange. In the beginning of the year 1641, this prince renewed the demand, and the ambassadors had orders to propose to Charles, at the same time such a league as should be found most conducive to the interests of both people. Charles readily agreed to both propositions, and the articles of marriage were soon drawn up; but he thought proper to impart the whole to the house of peers, which he accordingly did, and the marriage was shortly after concluded, to the great satisfaction of the public.

About this time, or a few days before, the particular charge against the earl of Strafford was carried up to the lords by Mr. Pym, under twenty-eight articles. They had, on the twenty-eighth of November, in the preceding year, exhibited some general articles, to which he could not be forced to answer; but upon this farther impeachment the lords required him to answer to the whole: and though the charge was very long, yet were the commons so pressing for his answer, that, by the twenty-fourth of February, he delivered it to the lords. It appears that the Irish house of commons had by this time sent over a committee to assist in the prosecution of this unfortunate nobleman, who had been their governor; and, in a word, the three kingdoms seemed bent upon his destruction. Upon the carrying up the impeachment last-mentioned, he was taken out of the custody of the usher of the black-rod, and committed to the Tower. He moved the lords to have counsel allowed him, which was much opposed by the commons; but his accusation being found to have many points of law in it, he was at length indulged with a grant of his request.

The bill for triennial parliaments having passed both houses, was, on the sixteenth of February, offered to the king, under the title of "An act for the preventing inconveniencies happening from the long intermission of parliaments," and at the same time the commons presented an act for the relief of his majesty's army and the northern parts of the kingdom, to both which the king gave his royal assent. No act that had ever passed seemed better calculated for preserving the liberties of the subject, than the act for triennial parliaments; for it it provided, "that in case the king should refuse to summon a parliament at the time therein limited, the chancellor or keeper might issue out writs to summon the peers, and for election of the commons; and if the chancellor or keeper should not do it, any twelve of the peers might summon the parliament; and if the peers should omit the issuing out of summons, the sheriffs in counties, and other magistrates, respectively, might cause elections to be made; and if the sheriffs should refuse, the freeholders in the counties might make elections of members; and the members so chosen were, under great penalties, obliged to attend:" with many other clauses to accomplish the end designed by the act.

It must be confessed, that this act had in it several expressions too much reflecting upon the prerogative; but Charles seems by this time to have been sensible of the many mischiefs arising from the too long intermission of parliaments, and seems to have resolved to communicate more freely and frequently in that way with his subjects. In a word, his so readily giving his assent to this act was highly pleasing to the people in general, who every where expressed their satisfaction by bonfires and other rejoicings: both houses also waited upon the king at Whitehall, with an address of thanks on the occasion. On the same day these bills were signed, the charge against the archbishop of Canterbury was carried up to the lords by sir Henry Vane, the younger, whereupon Laud was ordered to be sent to the Tower; but, upon his humble suit to the lords, his commitment was respited to the first of March.

The Scottish commissioners were all this while exerting their utmost endeavours for the overthrow of the hierarchy, and the introduction of their presbyterian discipline into the church of England, and had, by their confederates, made an active party in the house of commons, which was almost filled with puritans, who took every occasion of aspersing the bishops, and in their speeches spared not the episcopal order itself. The city petition, already mentioned, was now taken a second time into consideration, and, in the course of the debates, several motions were made for entirely abolishing the order of bishops: among those who argued for this measure, none distinguished themselves with so much vehement eloquence as Nathaniel Fiennes, the younger son of the lord Say and Seale; but the lord Falkland, the lord Digby, and many other noblemen of consummate integrity and deep erudition, so warmly opposed the motion, and by the strength and eloquence of their reasoning, so far prevailed, that the order of episcopacy was yet preserved, though its power was much lessened by a vote passed in the house of commons, preparatory to a bill, resolving, "that no bishop shall have any vote in parliament, or any judicial power in the Star-chamber, nor bear any sway in temporal affairs; and that no clergyman shall be in the commission of the peace."

About this time Charles, who seems to have had nothing else in view but the restoring the confidence of his subjects, by endeavouring to satisfy his parliament and smooth his measures, agreed to several considerable alterations in his court: he admitted into his council the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Essex, Bristol, and Warwick, the lords Say, Saville, and Kimbolton; Juxon, bishop of London, had, with less envy than could be expected, for some years held the treasurer's staff, but he now resigned it. Oliver St. John was appointed solicitor-general: the king intended that Denzill Holles should have filled the places of secretary of state, vacated by the flight of Windebank; that Pym should be made chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of the lord Cottington, who resigned for that purpose; lord Say, master of the wards; the earl of Essex governor, and Mr. Hampden tutor, to the prince of Wales: but the marquis of Hamilton, who had a great esteem for Strafford, whom Charles ardently wished to have preserved, persuaded the king that the delaying these promotions would be a strong bait in Strafford's favour, or that it was necessary to make some previous terms before the vacancies were filled up, for securing his life. This advice was fatally followed, and blasted the whole scheme: thus Charles lost the opportunity of at least making the opposition easy, by those popular acts, for that time, if not for ever.

The sops with-held from the Cerberusses of the party, and the sacrifices Charles had already made, did not one moment retard the prosecution of Strafford. That nobleman was considered as the chief support of the prerogative; the commons looked upon him as an apostate; the Scots, as the implacable and avowed enemy of their country. On the thirtieth of January, twenty-eight fresh articles had been given in against the earl, the particulars of which are foreign to a general history; it is sufficient to say, that they charged him with having exercised illegal power and oppressions in many instances, both as president of the North and as lord lieutenant of Ireland; with having been the cause of the war with the Scots (whom the commons had lately ordered to be styled on all occasions "our brethren of Scotland"), against whom he had unjustly irritated his majesty; with having levied an army of Irish papists to enslave the kingdom; and with having advised the king to establish an absolute government on the ruin of the constitution.

Westminster-hall was formed into a large court of judicature for the important trial; the earl of Arundel presided as high-steward, the peers sat in their robes as judges, the commons appeared as accusers, on which account it was determined that the impeachment should be managed by commoners: these were George lord Digby, (an Irish peer), John Hampden, esq. John Pym, esq. Oliver St. John, esq. sir Walter Erle, knight, Geoffrey Palmer, esq. John Maynard, esq. and John Glynn, esq. Whitlock was appointed chairman of this committee: we must not forget that the bishops declined being present, agreeable to the canon law, which forbids their assisting at any trial for life: at the upper end of the hall was a chair and cloth of state for the king, and on each side a close gallery, in which his majesty and the queen sat in private. The trial began on the twenty-second of March: the articles of accusation were enforced with all the virulence of malice. The earl behaved with great dignity, courage, and composure; his defence was noble, spirited, and effectual; he acquitted himself of every accusation, except a few acrimonious expressions, and some instances of indiscretion, which ought to have been forgiven, as the infirmities of human nature. Nothing had appeared against him to justify the charge of treason, when, on the twelfth of April, Pym produced in the house of commons a paper of some notes taken by secretary Vane, of opinions delivered at the council-table. Young Vane pretended he had found them by accident in his father's cabinet; and, as they were thought to bear testimony against the earl, his accusers the next day read them openly at his trial. They were entitled "No danger of a war with Scotland, if offensive, not defensive." The earl had advised the king to borrow a sum of money: he said his majesty was absolved by all rules of government, as having tried all legal ways, and been repulsed; and that he had an army in Ireland, which he might employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience. The earl, in his defence, observed "that it was hard measure to be prosecuted, under the notion of treason, for opinions given in council: that his using the expression 'this kingdom' was not proved, as the marquis of Hamilton, the earl of Northumberland, the lord-treasurer, and the lord Cottington, who were present at the board, declared upon their honours that they never heard him speak such words. But, granting he had used the expression, the word this could not rationally imply England, which had not been guilty of disobedience; but Scotland, which was the immediate object of their deliberation, and in a state of actual rebellion." After making this answer, he re-capitulated the several parts of his former defence, and in his conclusion said, "My lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of these dear pledges a saint in heaven hath left me." Here he made a pause, pointing to his children and shedding some tears: then proceeded in these words; "What I forfeit myself, is nothing; but that my indiscretion should extend to my posterity, woundeth me to the very soul.—You will pardon my infirmity: something I should have added, but am not able, so therefore let it pass.—And now, my lords, for myself; I have been taught, by the blessings of the Almighty God, that the afflictions of this present life are not to be compared to the eternal weight of glory which will be revealed hereafter; and so, my lords, even so, with all tranquility of mind I freely submit myself to your judgment; be it life or death, 'Te Deum laudamus.'" The very chairman of the committee says, this great and good person spoke with such pathetic grace and eloquence as moved the hearts of all his auditors (a few excepted) to pity and remorse.

The accusation and defence lasted eighteen days: Strafford, in his replies was obliged to reserve a seeming respect for his most implacable enemies, the Scottish nation and the Irish parliament. He took only a short time to answer each article urged against him, yet he made such a noble and satisfactory defence, that the commons saw it impossible, by a legal prosecution, ever to attain their purpose against him. But the death of Strafford was considered as a matter of too great importance to be left unaccomplished. A bill of attainder was therefore introduced into the lower-house immediately after the conclusion of this pleadings, which passed the house on the twenty-first of April, after very warm debates, fifty-nine votes only dissenting, and was immediately sent up to the lords. On the first of May the king went to the house of peers, and, in a speech, earnestly requested both houses that they would not proceed severely against the earl of Strafford, whom, in his own conscience, he said, he could not condemn of high-treason; but declared at the same time, that, for his misdemeanors, he should never serve him or the kingdom in any place of trust, "no not so much as a constable."

This speech was highly offensive to those who thirsted for the blood of this nobleman; and they were so hot in the pursuit of their designs, that the commons voted it a breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill depending before the house. At the same time they employed their emissaries without doors to spread about the city, and other parts of the town, papers containing the names of the fifty-nine members who voted against the bill of attainder: those names were affixed to public places, under the denomination of Straffordians and betrayers of their country, and thus exposed to the fury of the ungoverned multitude, made at this time so mad and violent, that, on the third of May, vast numbers from the city appeared at Westminster, armed with swords and cudgels, crying aloud for justice against the earl of Strafford; and such as were suspected of attachment to that unfortunate nobleman, were afraid to appear in public. About eighty peers had constantly been present at Strafford's trial, but so much were they intimidated by the popular tumults, that only forty-nine were in the house of lords when the bill of attainder was introduced; yet even nineteen of these had the courage to vote against it: a strong presumption that, had liberty of debate been allowed, the bill would have been rejected by a great majority. A new discovery, made about this time, increased still farther the fury of the people, and hastened the fate of the devoted Strafford: some principal officers of the king's army, partly from their attachment to the crown, and partly from an aversion to the parliament, had formed a plan for engaging into the king's service the troops under their command; with this view they entered into an association, bound themselves by an oath of secrecy, and maintained a close correspondence with the king's servants: the form of a petition to the king and parliament was composed, and it was resolved to procure the subscription of the army to this petition, in which, after representing the great danger to which the ancient constitution of the kingdom was subject, by the insolent proceedings of certain factious and turbulent spirits, the army offered to come up and protect his majesty and the parliament, "so shall the nation (as they allege in conclusion) not only be vindicated from present innovations, but be secured from the future which are threatened, and which are likely to be more pernicious than the former." The draught of this petition was transmitted to the king, who unhappily was persuaded to countersign it, as a mark of his approbation. One of the parties concerned (Goring), imagining the affair could not be kept long a secret, discovered the whole to the lords Newport and Dungarvon, and they to Pym, who instantly imparted the matter to the house. This discovery could not fail to excite the most violent indignation among the people. It was now given out that there was a wicked concert, a most dreadful plot, between the court and the army, to cut the throats of the parliament, and of all those who stood up for their liberties. The puritanical faction among the commons naturally improved this singular singular advantage: they instantly got the house to vote, that a protestation should be signed by all the members, to maintain the protestant religion against popery, to defend the king's person, the power of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the subject; and the commons, by their sole authority, issued orders that it should be subscribed by the whole nation.

It is incredible with what alacrity this protestation was taken, and what a spirit it raised against the earl of Strafford. A bill was next brought in for continuing this parliament, which should not be prorogued, adjourned, or dissolved without the consent of both houses, until the grievances should be redressed; but have credit to take up money. There can be no doubt, that by this bill the parliament dissolved the constitution, and henceforward are with justice to be considered as a faction against the commonwealth. The same day (Friday May 5), the commons sent to the king, desiring access to him, which was granted; and, about four o'clock, they attended in the Banqueting-house, at Whitehall, where they presented to him the bill of attainder against the earl of Strafford, and that for the continuance of the parliament, with an intimation that the present state of the kingdom would not admit of delay; and therefore they humbly besought him to give the royal assent to those bills: the king told them they might expect his answer on Monday, and so dismissed them.

Where ever the king turned his eyes he saw no remedy nor relief: his case, it is certain, called aloud for pity; he was racked with the pangs of conscience, about putting to death a minister whom he had esteemed, and whom he believed to be innocent; not a counsellor about him, Juxon excepted, had the courage to speak their mind, and all concurred in maintaining (a most manifest falsehood) that the king ought to satisfy his people in this demand, which would, it was presumed, finally content them. The good bishop, with a virtuous resolution, becoming the sacred character he bore, advised the king, if in his conscience he thought the bill unjust, by no means to give his assent to it. Strafford, informed of the extreme perplexity his royal master was in, carried his loyalty to such a height as to write a letter to the king exhorting him to consent to his death. "In this (said he) my consent will more acquit your majesty to God, than all the world can do besides. To a willing mind there is no injury. And as, by God's grace, I freely forgive all the world, with a calmness and meekness of infinite contentment to my departing soul; so, sir, to you, I can resign the life of this world with the utmost cheerfulness, in the just sense of your many, great, and exceeding favours." Charles had the weakness to take this trusty servant at his word, and he assented to pass the act, though he thought he was doing what merited eternal reproach here, and the vengeance of a just God hereafter; for it appeared that Charles, notwithstanding his passing the bill, had violent pangs about Strafford, since we find that, on the tenth of May, he sent the prince of Wales to the house of peers with a letter, in which he enjoined them to interpose their good offices with the commons, in order to procure a mitigation of Strafford's sentence, or at least a short delay; but, to the indelible disgrace of loyalty, humanity, and every social or religious virtue; both his requests were flatly refused: could he, indeed, expect any other from the spirit of that opposition? A committee of twelve lords was appointed to satisfy the king, that even a delay of this illustrious criminal's execution would endanger his own and his family's safety; and Charles, with a reluctance to be felt but not described, yielded to the necessity of the juncture, and it was resolved that the earl should die on the twelfth of May.

He was assisted in his last moments by archbishop Usher, but was barbarously denied the comfort of speaking with Laud; and on the day appointed was brought to Tower-hill, where his head was cut off. It is hard to say whether he shewed himself more pious or brave in his death, or whether he was more blameable or laudable in his life; but it is certain, that, however great his personal failings or political demerits were, the abilities and virtues he possessed, with the penalty of his head which he paid, ought to claim the pity of impartial posterity for his fate, which, to his dying day, sat heavy upon his royal master. Even a few weeks after Strafford's execution, this very parliament, as if conscious of the iniquity, at least illegality, of his sentence, passed an act for restoring his children in blood and honour, and invested them with the possessions of their father's estates.

The commons having thus, by the death of the earl of Strafford, removed the grand obstacle, as they imagined, to their intended reformation of the state, proceeded to prosecute their projected plan with the utmost industry and vigour. All the taxes which the king had imposed, the Star-chamber and High-commission court, the extension of the forests, and the practice of imprisoning those who refused to comply with such impositions, were voted contrary to law, and the greater part of monopolies suppressed. The judges had hitherto enjoyed their patents only during his majesty's pleasure; the commons now petitioned the king to grant them patents during their good behaviour: and Charles was persuaded to comply with their request. The marshal's-court, which took cognizance of offensive words, and was extremely arbitrary in its proceedings, was for that reason, suppressed. The stannary courts, which exercised jurisdiction over the miners of Cornwall, being liable to a like objection, underwent the like fate. The council in the North, and that of Wales, were both abolished on the same principles. The authority of the clerk of the market, who had a right to inspect all the weights and measures throughout the kingdom, was transferred to the mayor, sheriffs, and ordinary magistrates. In a word, if we examine the proceedings of this memorable parliament during the first period of its operations, we shall find that we are indebted to it for many valuable liberties we enjoy at this day.

The treaty with the Scots being brought to a conclusion, Charles allowed the parliament of Scotland to assemble, and declared his intention of assisting at it in person. The commons, suspecting that he designed to put himself at the head of his army in the North, on pretence of his visiting his kingdom of Scotland, demanded a conference with the lords, and proposed that both armies should be disbanded before his departure, which the king at their request, postponed till the tenth of August,

Both.

Both were accordingly disbanded at the same time, and the Scots returned to their own country, very well satisfied with their expedition. Then the king set out on his journey; but their distrust still subsisting, the parliament proposed that a committee from both houses should attend the king in Scotland, on pretence of conferring with the Scottish parliament, though in reality to be spies upon his majesty's conduct. The earl of Bedford being nominated as one of the peers, declined the office, so that lord Howard of Esrick was the only member of that house who undertook the journey; and of the commons the committee consisted of Nathaniel Fiennes, sir William Armye, sir Philip Stapleton, and John Hampden. The commons still continued sitting, and took several grievances into consideration; then they resolved to adjourn from the ninth of September to the twentieth of October. This resolution was no sooner taken, than a great number of members from both houses retired to the country; and some rigid presbyterians took this opportunity to propose an alteration in the Book of Common Prayer, which was so vigorously defended by Mr. Hyde (afterwards earl of Clarendon), that no step was taken on the subject. The lords, during this dispute, voted that the Common Prayer should be used without any alteration. This vote produced a conference between the houses: the commons desired the lords would concur with them in publishing a declaration for suppressing all the late innovations in the church, and all diversions on the Lord's Day. The lords, on the other hand, demanded the concurrence of the commons in publishing an order of their house, prohibiting all change in divine worship as established by law: the lower-house absolutely rejected this proposal, and ordered their declaration to be printed and published through the whole kingdom; they at the same time appointed a committee of forty-three members to manage affairs of importance during their adjournment; the lords established another for their house, and then the parliament adjourned to the twentieth of October.

The king, attended by the duke of Lenox, lately honoured with the additional title of duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hamilton, and lord Willoughby, set out for Scotland on the tenth of August. On his arrival at Edinburgh, he was received there with great demonstrations of affection by the people; and, in return for this reception, he confirmed not only the articles of the treaty between the two nations by act of parliament, but all his former concessions also, and all such things as had been transacted by them in their general assemblies; and likewise, the more effectually to gain their esteem, he conferred titles of honour and dignity on some, and places of power, trust, and profit, on others; amongst these the marquis of Hamilton was created duke of Hamilton; and general Lesly was created earl of Leven, who was so transported with the sense of the king's favour and bounty to him, that he often protested, and once, at Perth, upon his knees, in the house of the earl of Kinnoul, that he would never bear arms against the king.

A while after, some information was given to the marquisses of Hamilton and Argyll, that there was some design upon their persons, which made them for some few days withdraw themselves from the parliament and retire from Edinburgh: but their persons were of such quality and estimation in Scotland, that great pains were taken to discover the grounds thereof; and, after full examination by the parliament, they themselves and the great council were satisfied, that the information given to them could not be made good to the proof of any design against their persons; but the king, who was a little reflected upon in the first information, could not conceal his resentment of this carriage in Hamilton; and when he delivered his patent to the duke in parliament (according to the custom of that nation), he told him he had not deserved to be mistrusted by him, for he knew well, when he was accused to him of high-treason, he permitted him even to be in his bed-chamber. This reproof made no great impression upon the new duke, though he seemed outwardly much troubled for having given the king so just a cause of displeasure; yet, upon the first report of the business at London (without staying to hear the opinion of the parliament of Scotland, who had fully examined it) strange interpretations were made upon the matter, as highly and nearly concerning the peace of England; and a sudden resolution was taken, first by the committee during the recess, and after by the parliament, to have a guard for the defence of London and Westminster; and both houses of parliament instilled fresh apprehensions of danger into the minds of the people, when they were so lately freed from the fears of two armies.

While Charles resided in Scotland, he employed all his time and endeavours to compose the troubles of that kingdom; and he was now preparing to return to England, in order to perfect the same salutary work here, when he received intelligence of a rebellion which had broke out in Ireland. The catholics of that country thought they had found the fairest opportunity of shaking off the English yoke; and religion and liberty, those two sources of the greatest actions, hurried them into a design the most cruel history hath recorded. They plotted to rise throughout all the provinces in one day, and murder every protestant in the kingdom, after having surprized the castle of Dublin, which, though the grand magazine of the kingdom, and a place of such importance, was provided with no more than fifty men for its garrison. The execution of this scheme was delayed till the approach of winter, that there might be greater difficulty of transporting troops from England. Cardinal Richelieu had promised the conspirators a considerable supply of men and money, and many Irish officers had given assurance that they would heartily concur with their catholic brethren as soon as an insurrection should be raised. The design upon the castle of Dublin, which was to have been put in execution the twenty-third of October, was prevented by a timely discovery of the plot to the two lord-justices, the very night only before; and thus the capital was preserved; but the bloody part of the conspiracy was past prevention, for the conspirators were in arms the day affixed in all the counties of the kingdom, and actually massacred upwards of forty thousand defenceless protestants. It would shock the feelings of humanity to describe the particulars of this bloody tragedy; it may suffice to say, that death was the slightest punishment which those bigoted and blood-thirsty catholics inflicted upon the unhappy protestant victims.

Charles

Charles received intelligence of this insurrection by a messenger dispatched from the North of Ireland. He forthwith imparted the matter to the Scottish parliament, and demanded immediate succours for the suppression of the rebels, but the Scots referred the business to the English parliament, alleging, with justice, that Ireland depended upon England, who would undoubtedly provide for its security. The king therefore returned in haste to London, where, to his infinite mortification, he found that the Irish catholics, in excuse for this barbarous massacre, pretended to have received a commission from the king himself to take up arms; and thus Charles, who was soliciting assistance against them, both from his English and Scottish subjects, saw himself accused of the crime he was endeavouring to punish. The frenzy of the Irish gave their enemies infinite advantage: had they applied to Charles for relief from their grievances, had they drawn the sword in the just defence of those natural liberties, which no difference between papists and protestants ought to affect, and had they not at once rushed into barbarities which no provocation can justify, Charles might have found an asylum in them, and they a protector in him: for though I am as strongly convinced as any the most zealous partizans of that monarch's memory, that he detested the massacre of innocents that had been committed, yet I am entirely satisfied that he did not at all in his heart disapprove of their taking up arms upon the principles they professed: if they could have submitted to have been directed by him, I am farther of opinion, that, had they not put off the characters of men, he would have thought a public indulgence in matters either of religion or liberty, much safer with a papist than a puritan or presbyterian.

The king arrived in London on the twenty-fifth of November. The house of commons thinking, or at least pretending to think, that he was concerned in the Irish rebellion, sent but very slender supplies of men and money to that kingdom; and at the same time resuming the dispositions in which they had parted, they discovered in every vote their determined resolution to extend their own authority, and to abridge the power of the sovereign; and this they thought could not be so effectually brought about as by exasperating the people against the government. With this view, a few days after his arrival from Scotland, they presented to him at Hampton-court, that remonstrance which has made so much noise, and which was soon after productive of the most important consequences: it was not addressed to the king, but was plainly declared to be an appeal to the people; and the severity of the matter was exceeded only by the acrimony of the style. It was, indeed, a recapitulation of all the wrong measures and provoking steps that Charles had committed ever since the commencement of his reign, for which he had so severely atoned by the concessions he made, and the mortifications he had undergone. Amongst other things, they pointed strongly against the popish lords and the English prelates in the house of peers, to whom they attributed all the difficulties they met with from the peers in their measures. In conclusion, they petitioned the king for farther restraints and punishments upon the papists and their favourers; and they told him plainly, that unless he made use of such ministers, both at home and abroad, as they could confide in, they would give him no support: they even let his majesty know, that he was to guess at their meaning, though they neither named nor impeached persons; and that it was enough to disqualify any man for his service if they distrusted him, or if he had ever been known to defend or countenance those who had been questioned in parliament.
